HERCULANEUM, her-cu-la'-ne-um, an ancient city of Italy, 6 miles E. of Naples, situate at the base of the north-western declivity of Mount Vesuvius, near where the modern Portici now stands. It was destroyed by an eruption of the volcano in the year 79; and its site had long been a matter of doubtful discussion, as it had been completely buried under volcanic substances to a depth of 70 feet. At last a peasant, in the year 1711, digging a well in his garden, found some pieces of fine marble. The ground was subsequently excavated, and the ancient city discovered, in the exact state in which it was when buried under the volcanic eruption. Many valuable antiquities were found, calculated to convey a most accurate idea of the domestic manners of its ancient inhabitants.

HERCULES (in Greek, Herakles and Alcides), her'-cu-lee, the most celebrated hero of the Grecian mythology, and, according to the myth, the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Alcmena, daughter of Electryon and wife of Amphitryon. Juno (Hera), out of jealousy, sent two serpents to devour him; but the infant strangled them in his cradle. He early distinguished himself by feats of strength and valour; he slew the lion of Cithæron, and delivered Thebes from paying tribute to Erginus, king of Orchomenos. Obliged by his destiny to serve Eurystheus, king of Mycenæ, he performed, under his commands, a number of perilous adventures, the principal of which are known under the name of the "Twelve Labours of Hercules." He was, first, to bring the skin of the Nemæan lion; secondly, to kill the hydra; thirdly, to catch the hind of Artemis; fourthly, to bring the Erymanthian boar alive to Eurystheus; fifthly, to cleanse the Augean stable; sixthly, to drive away the water-fowl of Lake Stymphalis; seventhly, to bring the Cretan bull; eighthly, to fetch the mares of Diomedes; ninthly, to take from Hippolyta, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle; tenthly, to bring the oxen of Geryon from the island of Erythea; eleventhly, to obtain the golden apples of the Hesperides; twelfthly, to conduct Cerberus from the infernal regions. He, moreover, delivered Herione from a marine monster; separated the mountains of Calpe and Abyla, which formerly were a single mountain, and thus formed the "Pillars of Hercules;" killed the centaur Nessus; delivered Prometheus from his chains on Mount Caucasus; took Troy, to punish King Laomedon for his perjury; and performed a host of other brilliant exploits. Having carried off Iole, daughter of Eurytos, king of Œchalia, he was about to wed that princess, when Dejanira, his wife, finding herself about to be forsaken, sent him a tunic dyed with the poisoned blood of the centaur Nessus, thinking to regain his affection by that means. Hercules had no sooner put on the garment, than it adhered to his skin and caused him the most cruel torments. To end these he kindled an immense fire on Mount Œta, with the intention of burning himself alive; but a cloud came down and he was carried away to Olympus, where he became immortal and married Hebe. On earth Hercules had several wives, the principal of whom were Megara, whom he killed in a fit of passion; and Dejanira, who was the mother of Hyllus. (See HYLLUS.) He loved Omphale, and spun at her feet to obtain her favours. He had been driven from his hereditary dominions by Eurystheus, and after his death, his descendants, the Heraclidæ (see HERACLIDÆ) made numerous attempts to reconquer them, but were unsuccessful till the year 1104 B.C. The great number of exploits which have been attributed to Hercules have led to the belief that there were many heroes of that name. Varro enumerates so many as 44; Diodorus says there were three, and Cicero counts six; but some modern scholars consider him an allegory of the sun, his twelve labours representing, according to their version, the twelve months, or the twelve signs of the zodiac.

HERCULES, "Pillars of," the classic name for the two rocks forming the entrance to the Mediterranean Sea at the Straits of Gibraltar (see HERCULES). The most general opinion identifies them as Gibraltar and Ceuta.

HERCYNIAN FOREST, her-sin'-e-an, a name given by ancient writers to the wooded mountain ranges of Central Germany.

HERDECKE, hair'-dek-e(r), a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, on the right bank of the Ruhr, 27 miles W. of Arnsberg. Manf. Woollens and ironware. There is a trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 3,100.

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON, hair'-der, German philosopher, who studied at Konigsberg under Kant. At the age of 20 he was appointed assistant professor and preacher at the cathedral school of Riga. He published several works which attracted attention, and became acquainted with Goethe, who greatly admired him, and obtained for him the appointment of court preacher and consistorial councillor at Weimar. He wrote numerous works on theology, philosophy, and literature, and is allowed by the best critics to stand in the very first rank of German thinkers.

Born at Morungen, East Prussia, 1744; died at Weimar, 1803.

HEREDIA, he-re'-di-a, a town of the republic of Costa Rica.

HEREFORD, her'-e-ford, a city, parliamentary and municipal borough, and the capital of Herefordshire, on the left bank of the Wye, which is here crossed by a stone bridge of six arches, 19 miles N. of Monmouth. It is situate in a beautiful and richly cultivated valley, and has broad streets and well-built houses, although many of them are old. The charitable institutions, hospitals, and almshouses are numerous. The cathedral, built in William the Conqueror's time, on the site of an older edifice, burned in 1056, is in the form of a cross with a small transept towards the E., and a chapel; the N. porch is particularly admired; but the incongruous W. front, rebuilt in 1786, impairs the general effect of its beauty. The entire length is 335 feet, and the width 174 feet. The cathedral was restored in 1863. St. James's, built in 1868, is a handsome church. All Saints is a fine church, and there are three others. The college, and the shire and county halls, are among the more prominent public buildings. There are an infirmary, a lunatic asylum, and free grammar-school. The town was anciently fortified with a wall and ditch, and defended by a large castle. Only a small part of the wall remains; and the site of the castle, called the Castle-green, forms now an agreeable promenade, and is much admired. Manf. Gloves, hats, flannels, and cutlery, all to a small extent. There are five annual fairs; that held in October is the largest in the county for cattle and cheese. Pop. 19,822.—A station on the Great Western railway.—During the Saxon era, the Welsh inflicted considerable damage on this city; it also suffered greatly in the wars of the barons, and under the Plantagenets. During the civil war, it held loyally to the cause of the king, and was one of the last places to yield to the parliament.

HEREFORDSHIRE, her'-e-ford-sheer, one of the western counties of England, on the borders of Wales. It is bounded N. by Shropshire, S. by the counties of Gloucester and Monmouth, E. by Worcester, and W. by Brecknock and Radnor. The aspect of the county is throughout rich, beautiful, and picturesque in the extreme; gentle eminences rising in every direction, with intervening valleys, everywhere covered with plantations, orchards, and meadows, inclosed with hedges and rows of trees, and the soil in the highest state of cultivation. On the eastern borders of the county are the Malvern Hills, on the western, the Black Mountains. Remarkably healthy.

Rivers.—The chief are the Wye, Frome, Lugg, Arrow, and Teme.

Pro.—The soil of Herefordshire is everywhere of uncommon fertility, arising partly from the subsoil of limestone on which it chiefly rests; it is mostly a deep, heavy red loam. Wheat and barley, apples, pears, and hops, are all of excellent quality. The apple crop is larger than that of any other county, and a very large quantity of cider is made. The cattle are held in the highest estimation, and the breed of sheep is also famous.

Minerals.—Red and yellow ochres, and tobacco-pipe clay. Fuller's earth is dug near Stoke, and iron ore occurs on the borders of Gloucestershire. There are mineral springs on the slopes of the Malvern hills.

Area.—835 square miles.

Pop.—121,042.

Chief Towns.—HEREFORD (the capital) and LEOMINSTER.

Parliamentary Representation.—Three members are returned for the county, two for the city of Hereford, and one for Leominster.

HERENCIA, a Spanish town, 40 miles N.E. of Ciudad Real, in the province of the same name, near the confluence of the Valdespino with the Giguela. Manf. Soap, chocolate, and cloth. Pop. 6,400.

HERENTHAL, hé'-ren-tal, a town of Belgium, province of Antwerp, on the Little Nethe, 20 miles E. of Antwerp. It is an ancient town, and was formerly of considerable importance. Manf. Woollen cloth, hats, leather, and cordage. Pop. 4,900.

HERENTHOUT, hé'-ren'-tout, a village of Belgium, province of Antwerp, on the Wimfe, 18 miles S.E. of Antwerp. Manf. Woollen cloth, candles, and cordage. There is a trade in butter. Pop. 2,600.

HERFORD, hair'-ford, a Prussian town in Westphalia, on the Werre, 17 miles S.W. of Minden, on the frontier of Lippe-Detmold. It is walled, and has one Roman Catholic and three Protestant churches. Manf. Carpets, yarn, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 13,596.

HERICOURT, hé'-re-cour, a town of France, department Haute-Saône, on the left bank of the Luzenne, 30 miles E. of Vesoul. There are a church, in which both Roman Catholics and Protestants worship, and an old castle. Manf. Cotton prints and hosiery, leather, earthenware, bricks, and glue. Pop. 2,800.

HERIOT, GEORGE, her'-e-ot, founder of Heriot's Hospital in Edinburgh, was the son of a goldsmith. He became a member of the Edinburgh Incorporation of Goldsmiths in 1588; received the appointment of goldsmith to Queen Anne of Denmark (consort of James VI. of Scotland), and subsequently to the king. He came to England on the accession of James to the English throne, and acquired during his residence in London a considerable fortune as court jeweller and banker, the greater part of which he bequeathed to the town council and ministers of Edinburgh for the foundation and endowment of a hospital for the maintenance and education of the sons of poor deceased or decayed burgesses. "Heriot's Hospital" was accordingly erected at a cost of £30,000. At the present time 180 boys are maintained and educated in it, and the revenues being more than sufficient for the purposes of the hospital, sixteen "Heriot Schools" have been erected in different parts of Edinburgh. The hospital building was completed in 1649 after a design by Inigo Jones. George Heriot figures conspicuously as a character in Scott's novel "The Fortunes of Nigel."

Born at Edinburgh, 1563; died 1624.

HERISAU, her'-e-so, a town of the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, 5 miles N.W. of Appenzell, beautifully situated on the right bank of the Glatt, at the confluence of the Brühlbach. It has an arsenal, court-house, orphan-asylum, public library, and a large church with an ancient tower. The heights are traversed by fine public walks, and on the summits are the ruins of old castles. Manf. Muslins, cotton, linen, leather, and paper. Pop. 11,082.

HERISTAL, THE HOUSE OF, hair'-is-tal, whence sprang the Carlovingian dynasty. It was founded by Pepin the Young, lord of Heristal, steward of the palace under Thierry III., and afterwards duke of the Francs. (See FRANCE.)

HERISTAL, a Belgian village in the province of Liege, on the left bank of the Maas, immediately below the city of Liege. It is occupied principally by workmen employed in the coal mines and the iron and steel works of the district. Pop. 7,000.

HERITIER DE BRUTELLE, CHARLES LOUIS L', hai-rit'-e-at, a French government official, who devoted himself to botanical researches. In 1786, Dombey, having brought from Peru and Chili an inestimable collection of plants, L'Heritier undertook to publish a description of them, which was executed at London, under the title of "The Flora of Peru." On his return to Paris, he published a work with the singular title of "Flora of the Place Vendôme." He was assassinated, but his murderers were never discovered.

Born 1745; died 1800.

HERKIMER, her'-ki-mer, a county of New York, United States. Area, 1,745 square miles. Pop. 42,669. The capital is Herkimer.

HERKIMER, a township of New York, United States, on the left bank of the Mohawk. Pop. 2,400.

HERLICIUS, DAVID, German physician and astrologer, who published daily predictions of the weather.

Born 1558; died 1636.

HERMANDAD, The (Brotherhood), an association of the principal cities of Castile and Aragon, directed especially to the suppression of the increasing power of the nobles, and the maintenance of public security. The first Hermandad was established in Aragon, in the middle of the 13th century, and in Castile about 13 years later. For nearly two centuries the Hermandad exercised a beneficial influence throughout Spain; but at the close of the fifteenth century, public order having been firmly established, the Brotherhood was reduced to an ordinary police, and as such, with various modifications, it has continued until the present.

HERMANGARDE, her'-man-gard, the second wife of Charlemagne, daughter of Didier, king of the Lombards. She was divorced in 771, after being married a year.

HERMANN, hair'-man, liberator of Germany from the Romans, a prince of the Cherusci, called by the Roman writers Arminius. Having served in the Roman army, and acquired a thorough insight into the arts of war and policy, he headed his German countrymen in their revolt against the despotism of the Roman viceroy, Quintilius Varus, whose force he annihilated (9 A.D.). Five years afterwards he was hardly pressed by the Roman army, under Germanicus, who was however recalled to Rome, A.D. 17, without having achieved any permanent and decisive victory. After the retreat of the Romans, violent internal feuds broke out, in the course of which Hermann was slain by his own relatives. He is celebrated in the "Annals" of Tacitus as the deliverer of Germany; and in 1875 a colossal statue, placed on a hill near Detmold, was unveiled, intended as a national recognition of the services which he rendered to his country. (See BANDEL.)

Died 21 A.D.

HERMANN, JOHANN GOTTFRIED JAKOB VON, German philologer. He studied at Leipsic, and Jena, and in 1798 obtained a professorship in the former town, which he retained until his death. He published a large number of works relating to classical literature, and his editions of the Greek tragedians are well known. In 1815 he received the decoration of the order of merit, and in 1835 was admitted a foreign associate of the French Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres.

Born at Leipsic, 1772; died 1848.

HERMANN, KARL FRIEDRICH, German philologer and archæologist, studied at Heidelberg and Leipsic, and took doctor's degree when only in his 20th year. In 1832 he became professor of philology at Marburg, and in 1842 professor of classical eloquence and director of the philological seminary at Göttingen. His works are very numerous and valuable.

Born at Frankfort-on-Maine, 1804; died 1856.

HERMANSTADT, or HERMANMIESTETZ, hair'-man-stat, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the right bank of the Chrudimka, 5 miles W. of Chrudim. There are a handsome parish church, three synagogues, and a castle, with garden and park. Manf. Worsted and tiles. There is a stone quarry in the vicinity. Pop. 2,700.

HERMANNSTADT, hair'-man-stat, a town of the Austrian empire, in Transylvania, situate at an elevation of 1,300 feet above the sea level, in a picturesque valley on the Zibin, an affluent of the Aluta, 54 miles S.E. of Klausenburg. It is composed of an upper and a lower town, which communicate by flights of steps, and three suburbs. The streets are spacious, and the houses handsome. It has a convent and monasteries, a fine gothic cathedral, built in the 14th and 15th centuries, containing many interesting monuments, several churches, an orphan-hospital, a barracks, and theatre. Manf. Woollens, linens, hats, leather, paper, combs, earthenware, and tobacco; and a large trade is carried on, particularly with Turkey. Pop. 19,000.

HERMAS, her'-mas ('pastor,' or, 'the shepherd'), a father of the Church, who is said to be the same mentioned by St. Paul in his epistle to the Romans. He is supposed to have died at Rome. "The Shepherd," the work after which he is named, is still extant, and was translated into English by archbishop Wake, in 1693.

Lived in the 1st century.

HERMES, her'-mees, the Grecian name of Mercury, who was regarded as the god of speech and eloquence. (See MERCURY.) Several divinities of the Egyptian, Greek, Carthaginian, Chaldean, and Etruscan mythologies, are comprised under this name.

HERMES TRISMEGISTUS, "the thrice grand," an Egyptian priest and philosopher, who instructed his countrymen in the cultivation of the olive, in language, writing, geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, and medicine. Many translations of his works have been published, but they are generally considered to be apocryphal.

HERMIT ISLAND, her'-mit, an island of the South Pacific, 10 miles N.W. of Cape Horn. It is of irregular form, about 12 miles long from east to west. The southern extremity forms the bold promontory known as Cape Spencer, and there are several conical peaks more than 1,700 feet high. the natives are of diminutive stature, and of a very low order of civilization. Lat. 55° 50′ S. Lon. 67° 55′ W.

HERMOGENES, her-moj'-e-nees, of Tarsus, surnamed Xyster, a rhetorician, who, at 15 years of age, is said to have taught Greek oratory at Rome, and whose lectures had been attended by the emperor Marcus Aurelius. He wrote several works on oratory, which were edited and translated into Latin, by Heeren, in 1812. At 20 he is said to have become a lunatic, and to have lingered in this condition to an advanced age.

Lived in the 2nd century.

HERMOSILLO, her-mo-sil'-lo, a town of Mexico, in the state of Sonora, on the river Sonora, 60 miles E. of the Gulf of California. The discoveries of gold in the north of the state raised it from a military station to a large town. In the environs are a beautiful park and gardens. The trade is chiefly in wheat and flour. Pop. 14,000, including about 3,000 Indians.

HERNAD, hairn'-had, a river of Hungary, an affluent of the Theiss. It rises on the northern frontier of Hungary, on a branch of the Carpathians. After a course of about 150 miles, it enters the Theiss on the right bank. The Golnicz, Sago, and Tareza, are contributory streams.

HERNANI, hairn-a'-ne, a town in the north of Spain, province of Guipuscoa, 9 miles N.E. of Tolosa. There are a large and handsome church, a college, and townhouse. Manf. Linen, hardware, and phosphorus. A trade in fruit is carried on. Pop. 2,300.

HERNE BAY, hern bai, a watering-place in Kent, 5 miles N.E. of Canterbury, near the mouth of the Thames. Pop. 3,100, exclusive of visitors.

HERNOSAND, or VESTERNORRLAND, hair'-no-sand, a province of the north of Sweden, comprising the ancient provinces of Angermanland and Medelpad. The chief occupations of the inhabitants are cattle-rearing and fishing. Area, 9,650 square miles. Pop. 181,808.

HERNOSAND, the capital of the above province, on the W. coast of the island of Hernö, in the Gulf of Bothnia, joined to the mainland by a bridge, 230 miles N. of Stockholm. It has an ancient church, gymnasium, and botanical garden. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 3,300.

HERO, hé'-ro, a priestess of Venus, famous in poetic legend for her love of Leander, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to Sestos, on the coast of Thracia, to visit her, she directing his course by holding a torch on the top of a tower. One stormy night he was drowned, his dead body was cast on the shore, and Hero threw herself from the tower.

HERO, or HERON, OF ALEXANDRIA, a celebrated mathematician and natural philosopher. He was the author of numerous mechanical contrivances; amongst them "Hero's fountain," a steam engine on the principle of Barker's mill; and a double forcing pump used for a fire engine.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

HEROD, her'-od, spoken of as "the Great," was the only son of Antipater, the Idumean, who appointed him governor of Galilee. Antony appointed him tetrarch, and afterwards king of the Jews. He governed with savage cruelty, and sacrificed his wife Mariamne, her grandfather Hyrcanus, and brother Aristobulus. At the birth of our Saviour he caused all the infants of Bethlehem to be massacred, in hopes that He would fall among the number. He also put to death his sons Alexander and Aristobulus, so that Augustus said "It was better to be Herod's hog than his son." He rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and executed other great architectural works. He married ten wives.

Born at Ascalon, in Judæa, 70 B.C.; died in the same year as the birth of Jesus Christ.

HEROD ANTIPAS, the son of the above, succeeded his father as tetrarch of Galilee. He divorced his wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, and espoused Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, on which Aretas declared war against him. Herod sacrificed John the Baptist to the cruelty of Herodias, and his conduct occasioned the Jews to revolt. He went to Rome, hoping to obtain the title of king of the Jews, but failed in his object, and died in exile. This is the Herod to whom our Saviour was sent by Pilate.

Born 4 B.C.; died 39 A.D.

HERODIAN, he-ro'-di-an, a Greek historian, who was a native of Alexandria, but lived the greatest part of his life at Rome. He wrote a Roman history, in Greek, in eight books, which was edited by Bekker, and published at Berlin, 1826.

Lived in the 3rd century.

HERODOTUS, he-rod'-o-tus, a celebrated Greek historian, surnamed "the Father of History," who in his youth, while his country was oppressed by the tyrant Lydamis, travelled in Greece, Africa, Asia, and Europe, gathering materials for his great work, and noting the manners and customs of the people whom he visited. On his return, he assisted in expelling the tyrant; but meeting with ingratitude from his countrymen, he retired into exile, and occupied himself with the composition of his great work. He is said to have read the commencement of it at the Olympic games, 456 B.C., when it was received with universal applause. His History is comprised in nine books, to which his countrymen, in their admiration, gave the names of the nine Muses. Its principal subject is the internal struggles of the Greeks; but he has introduced episodical narratives of the histories of the Persians, Medes, Egyptians, and other peoples. He is universally considered as the most trustworthy of all ancient historians, a love of the marvellous being his only drawback; his elegant and harmonious style approaches poetry.

Born at Halicarnassus, 484 B.C.; died 406 B.C.

HEROLD, LOUIS JOSEPH FERDINAND, hai'-rold, French musical composer. He studied at the Conservatoire de Musique, and afterwards in Italy. He wrote many operas, the best known of which are "Lampa," and the "Pré aux Clercs."

Born at Paris, 1791; died 1833.

HEROPHILUS OF CHALCEDON, he-rof'-i-lus, an ancient physician, who was an accurate anatomist, and is said to have discovered the lacteal vessels. It is asserted that, in order to increase his knowledge of anatomy, he dissected living criminals.

Lived in the 3rd and 4th centuries B.C.

HEROSTRATUS. (See ERATOSTRATUS.)

HERRARA, hair-rai'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Badajoz, 70 miles N.E. of the town of that name. To distinguish it from some smaller towns, it is known as Herrara-del-Dugue. Manf. Coarse cloth and frieze. There is a trade in grain and cattle. The ruins of a Roman castle are in the vicinity. Pop. 2,800.

HERRENBERG, hair'-ren-bairg, a town of Wurtemberg, circle of Schwarzwald (Black Forest), and the source of the Ammer, 18 miles S.W. of Stuttgart. There are the remains of an old castle. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, and hosiery. Pop. 2,200.

HERRERA, ANTONIO, a Spanish historian. He wrote several valuable works illustrative of the history of Spain and Portugal.

Born at Cuellar, 1549; died at Madrid, 1625.

HERRERA, FERNANDO DE, a celebrated Spanish poet, surnamed by his contemporaries "the Divine." He was a voluminous writer of songs, odes, elegies, &c. A collected edition of his works was published at Seville, in 1582.

Born at Seville about 1516; died about 1589.

HERRERA, FRANCESCO, El Viejo (the elder), an eminent Spanish painter of the 17th century. Some of his best works are in the Louvre. His Last Judgment, painted for the church of St. Bernard, at Seville, and the Holy Family, and Outpouring of the Holy Spirit, in the church of St. Ines, in the same city, are highly esteemed. He was also a worker in bronze.

Born 1576; died 1656.

HERRERA, FRANCESCO, El Mozo (the younger), son of the above, was also an artist of some note, especially for his fish pieces. He executed the paintings in the dome of the choir of St. Felipe and the chapel Our Lady of Atocha, in Madrid.

Born 1622; died 1685.

HERRICK, ROBERT, her'-rik, a celebrated English poet, of whom very little is known, except that he was vicar of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, for twenty years, from which he was ejected by Cromwell, but reinstated by Charles II. He wrote sacred and amatory verses, displaying in both a luxuriant fancy, with an elegant quaintness. His poems were collected and published in 1648, under the title of "Hesperides," and have been since many times reprinted.

Born 1591; died 1674.

HERRNHUT, hairn'-hoot, a town of Saxony, circle of Bautzen, 18 miles S.E. of the town so named. It was founded in 1722 by a number of Moravians, driven from their home by the persecution of the Jesuits. Under the protection of Count Zinzendorf they established themselves in security, and assumed the name of Herrnhuters ("the Lord's watchmen.") It is the head quarters of the sect of Moravian brothers, and the town is distinguished for order and cleanliness. Manf. Linen, calico, ribbons, leather, and japanned ware. Pop. 12,000.

HERRNSTADT, or WAZCIOVZ, hairn'-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, at the confluence of the Herta with the Bartsch. The former river is crossed by a bridge; the latter, by three. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church. Manf. Linen, beetroot sugar and tobacco. Four annual fairs are held, and there is a trade in flax and cattle. Pop. 2,500.

HERSBRUCK, hairs'-brook, a walled town of Bavaria, in middle Franconia, on the right bank of the Pegnitz (crossed by four bridges), 17 miles S.E. of Nürnberg. Manf. Leather and tiles. There is a trade in hops. Pop. 2,300.

HERSCHEL, Sir William, hersh'-el, the astronomer, was the son of a clever musician of Hanover, and followed, for some time, the profession of his father. In 1759 he went to London, and, for several years, gained a scanty livelihood by giving lessons in his art. Becoming organist at Halifax in 1765, and of a chapel in Bath in 1766, his condition was much improved. In the latter place he began to turn his attention to astronomy, and attained to a considerable degree of proficiency in its pursuit. Being unable to purchase a telescope, he, in 1774, proceeded to make one for himself. After many disappointments, he at length succeeded in constructing a Newtonian telescope of five feet focal length. This instrument was a most valuable adjunct to his studies, and, in 1781, he announced his discovery of a comet, but which soon turned out to be a planet. This discovery made him famous, and he was appointed private astronomer to George III., at a salary of £400 a year. He removed to Slough, near Windsor, and henceforth his abode "became one of the remarkable spots of the civilized world." After having finished more than one large instrument, he constructed the most powerful telescope then known, and, after four years' labour with these instruments, he made the most unexpected and important discoveries. A new planet,—Uranus, in 1781; its satellites in 1787; two new satellites of Saturn in 1789; the rotation of Saturn's ring, and that of Jupiter's satellites, are among the principal of his invaluable discoveries. Sixty nine of his memoirs on astronomical subjects are contained in the Transactions of the Royal Society; and his papers on the construction of telescopes remain unsurpassed even at the present day. He became an F.R.S., and afterwards president of that learned body. He was also knighted, and received the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Oxford.

Born at Hanover, 1738; died at Slough, 1822.

HERSCHEL, Caroline Lucretia, was sister of the above. She came to England to reside with her brother, while he was engaged as organist at Bath. From the first commencement of his astronomical pursuits, she attended him in both his daily and nightly studies. In the intervals of her labours under her brother's direction, she observed the heavenly bodies on her own account. She discovered seven comets, and, in 1798, published, with her brother, "A Catalogue of Stars, with a Correction of Flamsteed's Observations." On the decease of her brother, she returned to Hanover, where, for twenty years longer, she continued to labour at her scientific pursuits. The Royal Society voted her their gold medal, and she was also an honorary member of the same. She lived to the age of 98 years, and amused herself with writing her "Recollections," a most interesting work, published in 1876.

Born at Hanover, 1750; died 1848.

HERSCHEL, Sir John Frederick William, the son of William. From his earliest years he was distinguished for his mathematical powers, as well as his love for physical science. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1813 became senior wrangler. In 1820 he published a treatise on the calculus of finite differences. He then applied himself to the study of astronomy, and, on the death of his father, continued in the path of discovery pointed out by him. In 1825 he commenced observing the heavenly bodies with his father's instruments and after his method. This pursuit, in which he was assisted for some time by Sir James South (see South, Sir James), lasted during eight years, and produced the most brilliant results. In his work, observations of 2,306 nebulæ and clusters are contained. The Royal Astronomical Society voted him its gold medal for his observations of the double stars. In 1830 he published a "Treatise on Sound," and a "Treatise on the Theory of Light," as well as the "Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy," published in Lardner's Cyclopædia, for which series he also contributed his excellent treatise on Astronomy, in 1836. In 1834 he sailed for the Cape of Good Hope, in order to make observations of the southern heavens; and for four years, at his own expense, uninterruptedly watched the skies, and nine years after his return, he, in 1847, published the results of his labours. His honourable career was appreciated by the learned men of all nations; the Royal Astronomical Society voted him, a second time, its gold medal; he was made D.C.L. of Oxford; and, in 1848, he became president of the Royal Astronomical Society. His "Outlines of Astronomy," and "Manual of Scientific Inquiry," made the profound science he adorned popular with a large section of the reading public, and have been translated into most of the European languages. On the coronation of Queen Victoria he was made a baronet, and in 1850 received the appointment of Master of the Mint, which he was compelled to resign in 1855, on account of ill health.

Born at Slough, near Windsor, 1790; died 1871.

HERSFELD, an ancient town of Hesse-Nassau, in Northern Germany. It is situated on the left bank of the river Fulda, 32 miles S.E. of Cassel. The ruins of an old cathedral, built in the 12th century, and burnt by the French in 1761, still remain. Manf. Woollen cloth (very extensive), serges, worsted, leather, and soap. Pop. 6,500.

HERSTAL, or HERISTAL, hair'-stal, a town of Belgium, on the left bank of the Meuse, 3 miles N.E. of Liege. Manf. Iron and steel goods. Pop. 11,275.—It was formerly a strong place, and from it Pepin d'Heristal, the progenitor of Charlemagne, took his title.

HERTFORD, har'-ford, a parliamentary and municipal borough, market-town, and capital of Hertfordshire, on the Lea, which is here navigable for barges, 21 miles N. of London. It contains three parish churches (All Saints, an ancient cruciform building, restored in 1873), several chapels, a corn exchange, town-hall for the quarter sessions and county courts, gaol and penitentiary-house, and market-house. There are a branch of Christ's Hospital, London, and a grammar-school. Hertford is a very ancient town; the castle, now much modernized and a private residence, was founded in 905. In the reign of John it was seized by the French dauphin, and, under Edward III., the kings of France and Scotland were secured in it. Pop. 7,585.—A station on the Great Eastern and Great Northern railways.

HERTFORD, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 11,843. Winton is the capital.

HERTFORDSHIRE, har'-ford-sheer, a county of England, bounded S. by Middlesex, N. by Cambridge and Bedford, E. by Essex, from which it is partly divided by the river Lea, and W. by Buckingham and Bedford. Its boundaries are chiefly artificial, and extremely irregular. The soil of Hertfordshire is naturally barren; but its vicinity to the metropolis, and the consequent facility of obtaining abundant supplies of manure, has contributed to fertilize and enrich it; so that it is a very considerable agricultural county, while the mildness and uncommon healthiness of the climate, with an agreeable diversity of surface, have made it a favourite county to reside in. A ridge of chalk downs, a branch of the Chiltern hills, skirts the northern boundary. It has an elevation of 800 or 900 feet above the level of the sea, and divides the waters of the Ouse on the north, from those which flow southward through the county to the Thames. The woodlands are extensive.

Rivers.—The principal are the Ouse, the Lea and its branches, the Maran, Beane, Rib, and part of the Stort; the Colne and Ver. The New River rises in the county.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, oats, turnips, and hay for the London market.

Manf.—Straw-plaiting and paper are the most considerable. A large trade in malt is carried on.

Pop.—202,990.

Chief Towns.—HERTFORD, ST. ALBAN'S, WATFORD, BUNTINGFORD, RICKMANSWORTH, and WARE.

Parliamentary Representation.—Three members are returned for the county and one for the borough of Hertford.

HERTOGENBOSCH, hair-to'-gen-bosch. (See BOIS-LE-DUC.)

HERTSBERG, EWALD FREDERICK VON, hairts'-bairg, Prussian statesman, whose merit recommended him to a situation in the department of foreign affairs at Berlin, and he afterwards became secretary to the Prussian embassy at Vienna. Frederick the Great made him counsellor of legation, in which capacity he distinguished himself as a profound politician. In 1752 his essay on the population of the Marche of Brandenburg obtained the prize from the Academy of Sciences at Berlin. He was employed to draw up every state paper and memorial of consequence, and was gradually advanced to the first offices in the kingdom, and to the rank of nobility.

Born 1725; died 1795.

HERTZ, HENRIK, hairtz, Danish poet. He was of Jewish descent, but joined the Protestant Church when 34 years of age. He wrote anonymously several clever vaudevilles and comedies, and a collection of imitations of the styles of popular writers, which attracted great attention. He afterwards wrote in his own name dramatic poems and lyrical dramas, one of which, "King René's Daughter," has been translated into English, and was produced on the London stage.

Born in Copenhagen, 1788; died 1870.

HERVAS, hair-vas', a town of Spain, province of Caceres, 75 miles N.E. of the town of that name. It is badly built, and the streets are narrow and crooked, but there are a fine church, a large town house, and a beautiful almeda or public promenade. Manf. Linen, coarse cloth and baize, and the place is famous for the immense quantities of pork sausages made. Pop. 2,600.

HERVE, hair'-vai, a town of Belgium, province of Liège, 10 miles E. of the town of Liège. There are two good churches and a college. Manf. Leather, woollen cloth, and soap. There is a large trade in butter and cheese. Pop. 3,900.

HERVEY, JAMES, her'-ve, a writer of numerous popular books on theological subjects, with a Calvinistic leaning. In 1746 he published his "Meditations among the Tombs," and "Reflections in a Flower-Garden," which being well received, he added another volume. In 1755 appeared his "Theoron and Aspasia; or, Dialogues and Letters on Important Subjects," in 3 vols., 8vo, well written, but Calvinistic. The profits of his works, which were considerable, he applied to charitable purposes.

Born 1714; died 1758.

HERVEY, LORD JOHN, politician and author. He was son of the Earl of Bristol. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1720, married the beautiful Molly Lepell, maid of honour to the Queen. He wrote some political pamphlets, was member for Bury, and one of the supporters of Sir Robert Walpole, and was appointed Lord Privy Seal in 1740. He is best known by his gossiping and rather scandalous "Memoirs of the Reign of George II.," published in 1848. He was an intimate associate of the royal family, and was terribly satirised by Pope as "Sporus," "that thing of silk, that mere white curd of ass's milk," and in the bitter couplet describing his supposed influence over Queen Caroline:—

> "At the ear of Eve, familiar toad, > Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad."

Born 1696; died 1743.

HERZBERG, hairts'-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, on the left bank of the Sieber, 38 miles S.E. of Hilderheim. An old castle is now converted into a court-house. Manf. Woollens and linen, paper, and fire-arms. Pop. 3,800.

HERZBERG, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 59 miles N.E. of Mersburg, on the Black Elster River. Manf. Earthenware. There is a trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 4,000.

HERZEGOVINA, hairt'-ze-go-ve'-na, a dependency of the Austrian empire, separated from Turkey by the Treaty of Berlin of 1878. It is bounded N. by Bosnia and by the Principality of Servia, S. by Scutari, one of the administrative divisions of European Turkey, and by the Principality of Montenegro, the whole territory forming a natural fortress; on the W. it is shut out from the sea (except at the port of Klek and the Gulf of Cattaro) by the Austrian Province of Dalmatia. The extreme length from coast to coast is about 220 miles, the average breadth about 50 miles. Herzegovina occupies a considerable portion of the great mountain system called the Dinaric Alps, the great backbone or waterparting which divides the drainage of the Black Sea from that of the Adriatic, and which towards the north-west near Konjitz separates the river Drina and its tributaries from the Narenta, passes along the northern and eastern boundaries of Montenegro, and finally flows to the eastward of Prisrendi. The country is intersected in every direction by off-shoots from the main range, which divide the surface into a great number of secondary valleys, generally of small extent and difficult of access. The northern or Black Sea slope is more rugged than the southern or Adriatic slope; it is divided into a greater number of glens and valleys, the streams are more numerous and longer, and the mountains in general are covered with magnificent forests; there is very little level ground, and that little is chiefly devoted to pasture. The river Drina and its tributaries occupy the greater portion of this slope. The Drina in its lower course is a deep and rapid river, and particles of gold have been found in its bed. On the Adriatic slope the mountains, which are chiefly limestone, are bare and rocky. The vegetation, as might be expected, is scanty, scorched in the summer by a blazing sun, and blasted in the winter by violent winds. The rivers on the slope are the Narenta and the Trebinshitsa, with their tributaries. All of them are small, and some of them run for long distances under ground; the Trebinshitsa, for instance, disappears totally from view for a distance of seven miles through the limestone hills.

The chief towns are MOSTIR (the capital) and Trebinje.

Pop.—Including Bosnia, 1,158,440, chiefly Slavs, who settled in the Eastern empire. There are about 56,000 Musselmans, 101,000 belonging to the Greek church, and 49,000 Roman Catholics.

History.—The district, known under Venetian rule as the dukedom of St. Saba, was, after two centuries of sanguinary contention, annexed to the Ottoman empire in 1697, by the treaty of Carlowitz. It has been the scene of frequent insurrection, and an outbreak in the autumn of 1875 was the prelude to the serious complications of the following year. (See BOSNIA and TURKEY.)

HERZEN, ALEXANDER, hairts'-en, an eminent Russian politician and political writer. After leaving the university of Moscow, in 1834, he was charged with having assisted at a seditious meeting of students, and, although he was not present at it, he was condemned, after some imprisonment, to banishment under surveillance at Viatka. On the death of his father, in 1846, he became possessed of considerable estates, and was granted leave to travel in 1848. In Italy, and afterwards in Paris, he openly expressed his republican ideas, and shared in the acts of his party at the latter place. Soon after, he found it expedient to take up his residence in England, where he published his memoirs, under the title "My Exile," and set up a journal in Russian, called "The Polar Star," in which the suppressed poems of the Russian poet Pushkin, as well as the opinions of the exiled republican leaders of the continent, were put forth to the northern world. In 1865 he removed to Geneva, where he continued the publication of his paper, but it became unpopular in consequence of its advocating the cause of the Poles in their last rising, and had to be given up.

Born at Moscow, 1812; died at Paris, 1870.

HESDIN, hes-dan(g'), a fortified town of France, department Pas de Calais, beautifully situate on the Canche, 14 miles S.E. of Montreuil. Manf. Stockings, soap, and leather. Pop. 3,200.—The modern town was founded by Charles V. of France, at some distance from the old one, which Philibert Emmanuel, general of the emperor, had taken the preceding year, and destroyed.

HESIOD, he'-si-od, an ancient Greek poet. He was the first who wrote on agriculture; his poems being entitled "The Works and Days." His "Theogony" is valuable as affording an account of the ancient mythology; his "Shield of Hercules" is only a fragment of a larger work. The best edition of Hesiod is that of Ruhnken, 1796; and his poems have been translated into English by Thomas Cooke.

Born in Bœotia, probably in the 8th century B.C.

HESIONE, he-si'-o-ne, in Greek legend daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and sister of Priam. Neptune, in his anger against her father for having failed in a promise towards him, sent a monster to ravage his country. The oracle consigned her as an expiatory victim to it. Hercules delivered her as she was about to be devoured by the monster; but not obtaining the reward promised by her father, he carried her off, and gave her in marriage to his friend Telamon. The abduction of Hesione became the Trojan pretext for the carrying off of Helen by Paris.

HESPERIDES, hes-per'-i-dees, in Greek mythology the daughters of Atlas and Hesperis,—Eglea, Arethusa, and Hypeathea, who possessed a beautiful garden, filled with apples of gold, and guarded by a dragon with a hundred heads. Hercules, by order of Eurystheus, killed the dragon, and brought away the golden fruit. (See HERCULES.)

HESS, HEINRICH HERMANN JOSEPH, hess, Baron Von, Austrian general. He entered the army in 1803, greatly distinguished himself, especially by his scientific ability, and rose to the rank of field-marshal lieutenant in 1842. He was quarter-master to the army in Italy under Radetsky, in 1848. His services were of great value, and he received several decorations. In 1849 he was made a baron, field-marshal, and chief of the emperor's staff. He commanded two army corps in Hungary, Galacia, and Transylvania, in 1859. At Solferino his services were so conspicuous, that the emperor raised him to the rank of field-marshal. In 1861, he was nominated member of the Upper House of the Reichsrath, and in 1862 was created chancellor of the order of Leopold. His funeral was at the public expense, and was attended by the emperor and the chief notabilities of the State.

Born at Vienna, 1788; died 1870.

HESS, HEINRICH MARIA VON, German painter. He was the son of a well-known line-engraver, and studied at the Munich academy. In 1821, king Maximilian Joseph of Bavaria sent him to Rome to complete his studies, and on his return to Munich, he was made professor of painting in the academy. He decorated, with splendid frescoes, the basilica of St. Boniface, and executed other important works. He was for several years director of the royal painted-glass works at Munich. He is considered to be one of the foremost modern painters of Germany.

Born 1798; died 1863.

HESSE, WILLIAM, Prince of, hes'-se, celebrated as a patron of learning, and for his studies and observations, during many years, of the heavenly bodies. For this purpose he built an observatory at Cassel, and called to his assistance two scientific men, Rothman and Byrge. His observations were printed at Leyden, in 1618.

Born about 1545; died 1597.

HESSE-CASSEL, hes'-se kas'-sel. (See HESSE-NASSAU.)

HESSE-NASSAU, a province of Prussia. It includes the old state of Hesse-Cassel, or Electoral Hesse, the greater part of Nassau, and part of Hesse-Homburg. In general the surface of the country is hilly, and even mountainous, the chief of which are the Habichtswald, the Thuringenwald, the Hundsrück, the Reinhardwald, and the Kellerwald. The greatest elevation is about 3,000 feet. The climate is generally mild, except in the mountainous districts.

Rivers.—The Werra, the Fulda, the Diemel, the Maine, the Edder, the Schwalm, and the Lahn.

Pro.—Oats, wheat, maize, rye, barley, potatoes, lint, and tobacco. Some of the best wine of Germany is made. Fruit of every description is abundant, and the pasturage is good. Cattle-rearing, therefore, forms the most important branch of rural industry.

Minerals.—Abundant; copper, silver, iron, lead, cobalt, salt, vitriol, alum, pitcoal, marble, and basalt. There are many good mineral springs in the hilly districts.

Manf.—Considerable; they mostly consist of Osnaburgs, flannels, cotton and silk velvets, carpets, iron and steel goods, paper, pottery, beetroot sugar, chemicals, wooden wares, and jewellery.

Pop.—1,554,376, mostly Protestants.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The province is divided into the districts of Cassel and Wiesbaden. The chief towns are CASSEL (the capital), WIESBADEN, and FRANKFORT.

History.—Hesse-Cassel was one of the two main divisions of the old duchy of Hesse, formed by the union of several minor branches at the end of the 17th century. The other was HESSE-DARMSTADT, Hesse-Cassel, or Electoral Hesse, was a limited monarchy, the sovereign bearing the title of the electoral prince of Hesse. The last elector, Friedrich Wilhelm, had many difficulties with his subjects, and having taken sides with Austria in the war of 1866, a Prussian army entered his dominions, and they were annexed to Prussia in the September of that year.

HESSE-DARMSTADT, or grand duchy of HESSE, a state of Germany, ranking as the seventh in the German empire. It is divided into two nearly equal portions by a part of the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau. The northern part is intersected by the mountain ranges of the Vogelsburg and branches of the Taunus and Westerfeld ranges, and on the eastern part of the southern division is the Odenwald range. The hilly regions are fertile, and the valleys are very rich and productive. The climate is cold and bleak in the mountainous districts, but very pleasant and healthy in the valleys and plains, except in some marshy districts near the Rhine.

Rivers.—The principal, after the Rhine and the Maine, are the Lahn, the Edder, Nidder, and Wetter.

Pro.—Wheat, buckwheat, oats, millet, potatoes, fruit, flax, hemp, hops, and tobacco. Choice wines, among them the well-known Neirsteiner, Laubenheimer, Bodenheimer, and Ingelheime, are produced. The country is essentially agricultural, and cattle-rearing forms an important branch of rural industry.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, copper, salt, limestone, and slate are the principal. In Dorheim the coal is mostly mined; in the Odenwald and Upper Hesse, the iron; and at Wimpfen, the salt.

Manf.—Linen and hempen fabrics, silk, paper, straw-plait, tobacco, papier-mâché, hardware goods, and chemicals.

Area.—2,866 square miles.

Pop.—936,340, of whom about 640,000 are Protestants, 240,000 Catholics, and 26,000 Jews.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are three provinces, Upper Hesse, Startenburg, and Rhenish Hesse. The chief towns are DARMSTADT (the capital), MAINZ, GIESSEN, BINGEN, and WORMS.

Constitution and Government.—Hesse is a limited monarchy. The legislative power is vested, in part, in two chambers, called the Upper and the Lower House of Representatives. The former is composed of the princes of the reigning family, the heads of a number of noble houses, the Roman Catholic bishop, the chief Protestant superintendent, the Chancellor of the University of Giessen, and a number of life-members, not exceeding ten, nominated by the grand-duke. The lower house consists of 6 deputies of noble landowners; 10 deputies of towns; and 34 representatives of villages and rural districts. The executive is represented by a ministry divided into four departments, namely, of the grand-ducal house and foreign affairs; of the interior; of justice; and of finance.

History.—Hesse-Darmstadt became, at the end of the 17th century, the second main branch of the house of Hesse, the rulers bearing the title of landgraves. The title of grand-duke was given them by Napoleon I., in 1806, together with a considerable increase of territory At the congress of Vienna this grant was confirmed, after some negotiations.

HESSE-HOMBURG, formerly an independent landgraviate of Germany, now a part of the kingdom of Prussia, included in the provinces of Hesse-Nassau and Rhenish Prussia. It consists of two separate districts, at a considerable distance from each other, Homburg and Meisenheim, the latter much the larger. The chief towns are HOMBURG and MEISENHEIM. The landgraviate was annexed to Prussia in 1866. Pop. 30,000.

HESYCHIUS, he-sik'-e-us, a Greek grammarian, a native of Alexandria. He was the author of a Greek lexicon of great value.

Lived in the 4th century.

HESYCHIUS of Miletus, surnamed "the Illustrious," a historian of the 6th century. He wrote a work on eminent teachers; another on the city of Constantinople, and a general history from the earliest times, now lost.

Lived in the 6th century.

HETTSTADT, hat'-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Wipper, 31 miles N.W. of Merseburg. Manf. Vitriol, tiles, and vinegar. There are large copper works. Pop. 4,000.

HEUSDEN, hoos'-den, a walled town of the Netherlands, province of North Brabant, 8 miles N.W. of Bois-le-Duc. There is a good harbour. Pop. 2,100.

HEUSDEN, a village of Belgium, on the right bank of the Scheldt, 4 miles S.E. of Ghent. Manf. Linen. Pop. 2,600.

HEUELIUS (or HEVEL, or HÖVELKE), JOHANN, he-ve'-le-us, an eminent astronomer, came of a distinguished family. He studied mathematics with great ardour, but devoted himself chiefly to astronomy, and built an observatory in his native town, Dantzic, for the purpose of making accurate observations, the result of which he published in 1647, under the title of "Selenographia; or, a Description of the Moon;" to which he added the phases of the other planets, as observed by the telescope. This work was followed by many others, the most distinguished of which was his "Cometographia," published in 1668. Besides the above works, he was the author of "Uranographia," 1690, and "De Naturâ Saturni."

Born 1611; died at Dantzic, 1687.

HEVES, a small Hungarian town, in the country of Hungary, 60 miles E. from Pesth, in the midst of a hemp and flax growing district. Pop. 5,700.

HEXHAM, hex'-ham, a market-town of England, in Northumberland, situate a little below the junction of the North Tyne with the South, 20 miles W. of Newcastle. This town is chiefly remarkable for the antiquities with which it is surrounded, and the historical events connected with it. The neighbourhood abounds with ruined castles, monuments of battles and heroes; with Roman relics, altars, inscriptions, &c. The abbey church of Hexham was founded in 674, and was destroyed by the Danes. The present church (recently restored) is a cruciform structure of mixed Norman and Gothic architecture, with remains of the old monastic building erected in the 7th century. Manf. Coarse worsteds, hats, and tan gloves. Well attended cattle markets are held. Pop. 5,919. —A station on the North-Eastern railway.—In 1464, a battle was fought in the neighbourhood between the houses of York and Lancaster, in which the Yorkists gained the victory. As an interesting historical event, it may be remarked, that it was in flying from this field that Queen Margaret threw herself on the protection of a robber; and the cave in which she concealed herself is still pointed out. In 1761, there was a great riot, arising from resistance to compulsory service in the militia, and 45 persons were killed and 300 wounded by the soldiers.

HEYLYN, PETER, haï'-lin, a learned divine, of Welsh family, who obtained a fellowship of Magdalen College, where he read cosmographical lectures. In 1621 he published his "Description of the World," which he afterwards enlarged under the title of "Cosmography." In 1629 he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king, and in 1631 obtained a prebend of Westminster, which was followed by the living of Houghton, in the diocese of Durham. In 1633 he took his degree of D.D. He obtained some other preferments, of which he was deprived by the parliament, and voted a delinquent; his goods were also confiscated, and his person endangered. At the Restoration he was restored to his prebend. He was a man of great abilities and uncommon industry. His principal works, besides the above, are, "The History of the Reformation in England;" "History of the Presbyterians;" "Life of Archbishop Laud."

Born at Burford, Oxfordshire, 1600; died 1662.

HEYNE, CHRISTIAN GOTTLOB, hine, a distinguished German classical scholar and critic. He was the son of a poor weaver, and by the aid of the pastor studied at Leipsic, suffering great privation from poverty. He afterwards obtained a subordinate appointment in the Bruhl library at Dresden. He published a number of valuable works illustrating ancient literature. He published copiously-annotated editions of Homer, Virgil, Tibullus, Pindar, &c., and contributed many valuable essays to the Transactions of the university of Gottingen, where he was professor of eloquence and poetry.

Born at Chemnitz, Saxony, 1729; died 1812.

HEYST-OB-DEN-BERG, histé-ob-den-bairg, a town of Belgium, on the Great Nethe, 18 miles S.E. of Antwerp. Manf. Chiefly linen goods; and has a trade in hops. Pop. 7,000.

HEYTESBURY, haits'-ber-e, a town of Wiltshire, where the manufacture of woollen cloths was formerly carried on to a considerable extent; but it has greatly declined. There is a handsome cruciform church, restored in 1867. In the neighbourhood are ancient entrenchments, camps, and barrows. Pop. 1,000.—A station on the Great-Western railway.

HEYWOOD, JOHN, haï'-wood, one of the earliest English poets and dramatists. He is also said to have been well skilled in music, and as a player on the virginals. He was a great favourite with Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, but on the accession of Elizabeth he went to Mechlin. One of his principal works is entitled "The Spider and the Fly, a Parable."

Born about 1500; died 1565.

HEYWOOD, THOMAS, an actor and dramatic writer, who is said to have written 220 plays, of which only 24 are now extant, and those of little merit, except one, called "A Woman killed with Kindness."

Lived in the early part of the 17th century.

HEYWOOD, a town of Lancashire, 3 miles S.E. of Bury, on the left bank of the Roach, a branch of the Irwell. A public park of 20 acres was presented by the Queen in 1879. Manf. Cotton, fustian, paper, and machinery. There are coalpits in the neighbourhood. Pop. 23,050.

HEZEKIAH, hez'-e-ki-a ("strength of Jehovah"), king of Judah, son and successor of Ahaz. He ascended the throne at the age of five-and-twenty, and reigned for thirty years (726-696 B.C.). Relying on the alliance formed with Egypt, he withheld the tribute which had been imposed by the Assyrians, and drew upon himself the anger of Sennacherib, whose invasion was rendered memorable by the destruction of the Assyrian army when encamped before Jerusalem in the course of a single night. The prophets Isaiah, Mica, and Nahum lived in his reign. The hymn written by Hezekiah on his miraculous recovery, recorded by Isaiah, indicates his possession of great poetic talent. The "Mishna" mentions three things for which he is to be praised: the unworthy burial of his father, on account of his wickedness; the breaking up of the brass serpent, which had become an object of idolatrous worship; and the hiding of a "book of medicaments"—a superstitious work. It also records three blameworthy actions: his spoiling the doors of the temple to pay the Assyrian tribute; the stopping up of the Upper Ghion during the siege; and the postponing of the first passover for a month. For the details of his reign we must refer to the Old Testament narrative, which records them at length.

Born 751 B.C.; died 697 B.C.

HICKES, GEORGE, D.D., an episcopal divine and philologist. He studied at Oxford, and was ordained in 1666. In ten years afterwards he became chaplain to the duke of Lauderdale, and accompanied his patron to Edinburgh. In 1678 he received the degree of D.D. from Glasgow University, and in the following year a similar honour was conferred by the University of Oxford; he was appointed chaplain to the king in 1682, and dean of Worcester in 1683. At the Revolution he refused to take the oath of allegiance to king William III., and was deprived of his benefices. He afterwards joined the exiled king at St. Germains, and was consecrated in 1694, by a prelate of his own party, suffragan bishop of Thetford. His controversial and other publications were numerous. His most important work was "Thesaurus Grammatico-criticus et Archæologicus Linguarum Veterum Septrionalium," published at Oxford, in 1705, 3 vols. folio.

Born at Newsham, Yorkshire, 1642; died 1715.

HICKMAN, hik'-man, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 224 square miles. Pop. 10,651. Clinton is the capital.

HICKMAN, a county of Tennessee, United States. Pop. 12,095. The capital is Centreville.

HICKORY, hik'-o-re, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 408 square miles. Pop. 7,387. The capital is Hermitage.

HICKS, ELIAS, a famous American preacher and member of the Society of Friends, was born at Hampstead, Long Island, United States. He commenced his labours at the age of 27, and continued his active career to the advanced age of 80. His denial of the divinity of Christ and a vicarious atonement, created a division in the society into orthodox and Hicksite Quakers.

Born 1748; died at Long Island, 1830.

HIDGELLEE. (See HIJELLEE.)

HIELMAR, heel'-mar, a lake in the central part of Sweden. It lies between the districts Nykoping, Orebro, and Westeras. On its north side it has communication with Lake Malar, and contains several islands. It is 40 miles long, by 12 broad in the centre.

HIERAPOLIS, hi-e-rap'-o-lis, the modern Pambak-Kaleh, ("cotton castle,") an ancient ruined city of Asiatic Turkey, near the right bank of the Lycus, 121 miles N.E. of Smyrna. There are remains of a large theatre, gymnasium, and three Christian churches. The old city must have been of great extent. The petrified cascades, formed by the calcareous deposits of wells of mineral water, are great natural curiosities.

HIERES, or HYERES, ISLES OF, hi'-air, a cluster of small islands in the Mediterranean, near the south coast of France, occupying a position in the front of the bay of the same name. They are fortified, but are mostly infertile and uncultivated. The principal of the group are Bagneau, Port Cros, Porquerolles (the largest, about 5 miles long and 2 wide), and Levant.

HIÈRES, or HYÈRES, a town of France, department of Var, 10 miles E. of Toulon. The vicinity is marshy, and the air unhealthy. One of the churches is a remarkable structure, on the edge of a precipice. The town-house is good, and there are the remains of an ancient citadel. From a salt lake in the neighbourhood a large quantity of salt is obtained, and exported; oil, wine, and fruit are also exported to Toulon and Marseilles. Manf. Orange-flower water and silk. Pop. 10,000.

HIERO I., hi'-e-ro, king of Syracuse, succeeded his brother Gelon 478 B.C., and rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He gained a victory over the Etruscans in 474 B.C., and in 472 B.C. made war against Thrasidæus, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He encouraged poetry and patronized Æschylus, Pindar, and other poets.

Died 467 B.C.

HIERO II., son of Hierocles, a noble Syracusan, was, in 269 B.C., unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians; but afterwards joining them in besieging Messina, was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory lost, he made peace with the enemies of his country, and proved faithful to all his engagements. He was of simple and amiable character, ruled wisely, encouraged agriculture, improved the laws, and liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country.

Born 307 B.C.; died 216 B.C.

HIEROCLES, hi-er'-o-klees, a professor of rhetoric at Alabanda, in Caria; he is said to have excelled in what Cicero called "the Asiatic" style of eloquence.

Lived in the 1st century before the Christian era.

HIEROCLES, a persecutor of the Christians, who was president of Bithynia, and afterwards governor of Alexandria, where he committed numberless cruelties. He wrote some books against the Christians, mentioned by Lactantius and Eusebius. The remains of his writings were published by Bishop Pearson in 1654, with a curious discourse upon them.

Lived in the 4th century.

HIEROCLES, an Alexandrine Platonic philosopher, who wrote seven books on Providence and Destiny, and a commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras; the latter of which is extant, also fragments of the former. A book entitled "Asteia," a collection of ludicrous poems, ridiculing the works and manners of pedants, is sometimes attributed to him; but it is probably the work of another author of the same name. It was translated into English in 1741.

Lived in the 5th century.

HIERONYMUS, hi-e-ron'-i-mus, a tyrant of Sicily, who rendered himself odious by his oppression and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had enjoyed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family extirpated.

Died 214 B.C.

HIERONYMUS. (See JEROME, St.)

HIGGINS, JOHN, hig'-gins, an English divine and schoolmaster, who lived at Wimsham, near Ilminster, in Somersetshire. He published some school-books, a treatise on Christ's descent into hell, and part of the "Mirrour for Magistrates."

Born about 1544; died 1603.

HIGHAM FERRERS, hi'-am fer'-rers, a borough and market-town of Northamptonshire, 59 miles N.W. of London. Its principal buildings are a very handsome old church, a modern town-hall, and some remains of an ancient college. Pop. 1,100.—A station on the London and North-Western Railway.

HIGHGATE, hi'-gait, a populous village of Middlesex, 5 miles N.W. of St. Paul's, London. It is situated on the ridge of a hill 450 feet above the Thames, and has many elegant villas and mansions. The church, a modern structure, is prominently situated on the brow of a hill, and on the slope beneath is a cemetery of 20 acres, tastefully laid out. Pop. 4,500.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

HIGHLAND, hi'-land, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 468 square miles. Pop. 30,000.

HIGHLANDS, hi' or hi'-lands, a natural division of Scotland, comprehending the mountainous part of the country to the north and north-west, in contradistinction to the Lowlands, which comprehend the south and south-east districts. (See SCOTLAND.)

HIGHMORE, JOSEPH, hi'-mor, an English historical painter. He painted the portraits of several eminent persons, also a set of pictures, the subjects of which were taken from Richardson's "Pamela." At the foundation of the Royal Academy, he was chosen one of the professors. His best pictures are "Hagar and Ishmael," at the Foundling hospital; the "Finding of Moses;" and the "Good Samaritan." He was also eminent for his literary abilities, and published "A Critical Examination of the Two Paintings by Rubens, on the Ceiling of the Banqueting-house at Whitehall," &c.; "The Practice of Perspective on the Principles of Dr. Brooke Taylor;" "Observations on a Pamphlet entitled Christianity not Founded on Argument;" and two volumes of Essays.

Born in London, 1692; died 1780.

HIGHWORTH, hi'-werth, a market-town in Wiltshire, 39 miles N.E. of Salisbury. It has an ancient Gothic church of the reign of Henry VI. Pop. 10,246, mostly employed in agricultural pursuits.

HIGUERA, he-goo-air'-a, distinguished from smaller places of the same name by the addition "La Real," a town of Spain, province of Badajoz. It is a handsome, well-built place, with two churches, one of them a fine structure. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, hats, soap and oil. Pop. 5,000.

HIGUERELA, he-goo-a-ra'-la, a town of Spain, province of Albacete. Manf. Woollen cloth, bricks, and earthenware. Pop. 2,500.

HIGUEY, BAY OF, he'-goo-a, a bay of the island of Hayti, notorious as the scene of many cruelties committed by the Spanish discoverers. Lat. 18° 20' N. Lon. 68° 40' W.

HIJAR, he-har', a town of Spain, in the province of Teruel, on the right bank of the San Martin, 68 miles N.E. of Teruel. There is an ancient and magnificent palace. Manf. Linen and soap. Pop. 3,100.

HIJELLEE, or HIDJELLEE, hi-jel-le', capital of a district of the same name in India, presidency of Bengal, on an island near the western bank of the Hoogly, 60 miles S.W. of Calcutta. It has an extensive salt manufactory belonging to government.

HIJELLEE, district of, is inclosed by the Bay of Bengal, the Hoogly, Balasore, and Midnapore. It is low and level, with an unhealthy climate, and abounding with swamps, which swarm with loathsome alligators. Little is known of the district; but turtles, crabs, oysters, and prawns are plentiful in the surrounding seas. Pro. Millet, rice, pulse, tobacco, potatoes, sugar-cane, and palms. Area, 1,000 square miles.

HILAIRE, ST., or HILAIRE-DU-HARCOUET, he'-lair, a town of France, department Manche, 40 miles S. of St. Lo. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, leather, and wax. A considerable amount of trade is carried on; there are important cattle markets and five annual fairs. Pop. 4,000.

HILARION, hi-lair'-e-on, the founder of the monastic life in Palestine. He visited St. Anthony the anchorite in Egypt, and on his return to his own country, followed his example, and obtained a number of followers.

Born 291; died in the island of Cyprus in 371.

HILARY, ST., hil'-a-re, a father of the Church in the 4th century, who embraced Christianity when far advanced in life. On being instructed in the principles of religion, he was baptized, with his wife and daughter. In 355 he was made bishop of Poitiers, and the year following was sent by Constantius to defend Athanasius at the synod of Beziers against Saturninus, which he did with such zeal that Saturninus prevailed on the emperor to banish him to Phrygia, where he wrote his books on the Trinity. He was also the author of a treatise on Synods.

Died 367.

HILARY, ST., OF ARLES. He succeeded Honoratus in the bishopric of Arles, in 429, and presided in a council at Rome, in 441. His works are,—1. Homilies, under the name of Eusebius of Emesa; 2. "The Life of St. Honoratus;" 3. "Opuscula."

Born at Arles, 401; died, 449.

HILDBURGHAUSEN, hild'-boorg'-hou'-zan, a town of Saxe-Meinengen, Germany, on the right bank of the Werra, 17 miles S.E. of Meinengen. It has an old palace, a Roman Catholic and a Protestant church, a gymnasium, a Jews' school, and lunatic asylums. Manf. Papier-maché, woollen and linen cloths, dolls, and tobacco. Pop. 4,200.

HILDEBRAND, hil'-de-brand, king of the Lombards, ascended the throne in 736, and shared power with his uncle Luitprand; but his tyranny became insupportable to his subjects, who deposed him in 744, electing in his stead the duke of Friuli.

HILDEBRAND. (See GREGORY VII.)

HILDESHEIM, hil'-des-hime, a district of Prussia, province of Hanover, the most southerly of the provinces into which the kingdom of Hanover is divided. It is traversed by branches of the Harz mountains, in no part exceeding 1,100 feet in height. The soil is very fertile. The principal river is the Innerste, an affluent of the Seine. Area, about 1,500 square miles. Pop. 432,694.

HILDESHEIM, an old city of Hanover, and the chief town of the Prussian district of the same name, near the river Innerste, and 20 miles from the town of Hanover, with which it is connected by railway. Its walls have been demolished, and converted into public promenades. The town is divided into old and new. The cathedral is a large Gothic building of the 11th century, with bronze gates 16 feet high, covered with bas-reliefs, and supposed to have originally supported an idol of the Saxons. There are numerous other churches, of which the Roman Catholic church of St. Godehard, dating from the 12th century, and restored in 1852, and the Protestant churches of St. Andrew and St. Lanbert are the most remarkable, a consistory, a Lutheran college, schools, and an arabesque town house. Manf. Linen cloths and yarn, lacquer ware, wax tapers, soap, starch, vinegar, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 25,887.

HILL, AARON, hil, an English poet and dramatist. At the age of 15 he went to Constantinople to visit his relation, Lord Paget, who was ambassador there, and whom he accompanied to England in 1703. He next travelled with Sir William Wentworth over Europe. In 1709 he became manager of Drury Lane theatre, for which he wrote his "Elfrid; or, the Fair Inconstant." The following year he became manager of the Opera house, and wrote the opera of "Rinaldo," the first for which Handel composed the music in England. About 1718 he published a poem, called "The Northern Star; or, a Panegyric on Peter the Great," for which the Empress Catharine sent him a gold medal.

Born in London, 1685; died 1750.

HILL, SIR JOHN, a voluminous English writer, who commenced life as an apothecary in St. Martin's Lane. His first publication was a translation of Theophrastus's tract on Gems, which procuring him some reputation, he undertook a natural history. He afterwards became a general writer on almost all subjects. He published a supplement to Chambers's "Cyclopædia," and conducted a magazine, and a daily paper under the title of the "Inspector." At this time he obtained his degree of M.D. from Scotland, and set up as a vendor of quack medicines. Under the patronage of the Earl of Bute he commenced a voluminous work, called "The System of Botany," which he sent to the king of Sweden, who invested him with one of his orders of knighthood. Besides the above works, he wrote, among others, "Mrs. Glasse's Cookery," "A Review of the Works of the Royal Society," some novels and a few farces. These last brought him into a controversy with Garrick, who wrote the following epigram on him:—

"For physic and farces his equal there scarce is,

Born at Peterborough, 1716; died 1775.

HILL, ROWLAND, Viscount, British general, was descended from an old Shropshire family. He entered the army in 1787, at the age of fifteen, and obtained a captaincy before he was twenty, served in the campaign in which Sir John Moore lost his life, and in those of 1809-1811, under the Duke of Wellington, during which he held most responsible command. His gallant behaviour and great ability were recognised at the close of the Peninsular war by his elevation to the peerage by the title of Baron Hill of Almarez and Hawkstone, with a grant of £2,000 per annum. He also received the title of G.C.B. He commanded a division at Waterloo, and remained with the army of occupation. In 1828 he became commander-in-chief of the army in succession to the Duke of Wellington, a position which he resigned on the failure of his health in 1842, when he was created viscount.

Born 1772; died 1842.

HILL, SIR ROWLAND, the distinguished author of the cheap postage system, and for many years secretary to the post office. In early life he supported himself by teaching mathematics in his father's school and in private families at Birmingham. His talent for organization was displayed, even at this period, by his improvements in his father's academy, as well as in originating schemes of education. Hard work so shattered his weak health that, in 1833, he retired from his scholastic duties. Shortly after, he was appointed secretary of the South Australian commission. Early in 1837 he turned his attention to postal reform, and published a number of pamphlets upon the subject. From these it will be sufficient to name one,—"State and Prospects of Penny Postage," in which he demanded that letters should be charged by weight and not by distance, and that a uniform tax of one penny on all letters of a certain weight should be imposed. In the same year the House of Commons appointed a committee to examine his project, and this committee strongly recommended it, as eminently favourable to commerce, while it served as a valuable aid in developing the intellect of the lower classes. In the course of the following session more than 10,000 petitions were presented to parliament, praying for a uniform rate of postage. In 1840 the penny postage system was adopted, and he was nominated to the task of directing its early growth. After many vexatious struggles with the officials, he retired in 1843, and received, in 1846, a testimonial of public gratitude, the sum of £15,000 being collected by subscription. The progress of postal communication became very rapid throughout the United Kingdom. In 1837 the number of letters rose to 75,000,000, which, in 1842, was increased to upwards of 360,000,000. Mr. Hill was reinstated as secretary of the Post Office in 1847, and held the appointment until 1864, when he was compelled through failing health, to resign. He retired on his full salary of £2,000 per annum, and received a parliamentary grant of £20,000. In 1860 he was created K.C.B., and in 1864 received the degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford.

Born at Kidderminster 1795; died 1879.

HILL, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 16,554. Hillsborough is the capital.

HILL STATES. (See INDIA.)

HILLAH, or HILLA, hil-la, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the pashalic of Bagdad. It lies about 60 miles to the south of Bagdad, on the western bank of the river Euphrates, and on the borders of the great Syrian desert. The town is well built, and has an extensive and well-regulated bazaar, several stately caravanserais built of Babylonian brick, and a number of coffee-houses. A quarter of the town is situate on the eastern bank, and is connected with the other by a bridge of boats, but is not nearly so considerable as the western quarter. The Euphrates enlarges considerably as it approaches Hillah, where it is about 200 paces wide, and is navigable for flat-bottomed vessels not exceeding fifty tons burden, during six months in the year. In the neighbourhood of this place are the ruins of Babylon. Dyeing, tanning, and silk manufactures are carried on here. Pop. between 7,000 and 10,000.

HILLEL, HABLABI, hil-lel (the Babylonian), the eminent doctor of the Jewish law, who flourished in the century preceding the birth of Christ. He is said to have migrated at the age of forty from Babylon (where he was born of poor parents, though of the royal line on the female side) to Palestine for the purpose of studying the law, in which he made rapid progress, until he had acquired an immense range in nearly all branches of learning. He was elected president of the Sanhedrim, a position which he occupied for many years. The time of his death is uncertain; but he left behind him a reputation not only for ability and learning, but for modesty, meekness, and simple-hearted kindness; and he is said to have lived, like Moses, 120 years: forty years in ignorance of the law, forty years as the humblest pupil of the law; and forty years as the highest master of the law. He was the first who collected and arranged the traditions of the oral law, and founded the school in which Gamaliel was a distinguished master.

Born about 112 B.C.

HILLIARD, NICHOLAS, hil'-yard, goldsmith and portrait-painter to Queen Elizabeth, whose miniature portraits were highly esteemed. He painted Mary Queen of Scots and Queen Elizabeth several times.

Born 1547; died 1619.

HILLSBOROUGH, hils'-bur-o, a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, 20 miles from Belfast. It is of modern date, is neatly built, and has a magnificent church with a lofty spire. Manf. Principally linen. Pop. 1,500.

HILLSBOROUGH, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 2,900 square miles. Pop. 5,814. Tampa is the capital.

HILLSBOROUGH, a county of New Hampshire, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 75,634. Amherst, Manchester, and Nashua are the county towns.

HILLSBOROUGH, a township of New Hampshire, United States, 24 miles S.W. of Concord. It is a thriving place, with several mills and factories.

HILLSDALE, hils'-dale, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 555 square miles. Pop. 33,000. The capital is Hillsdale.

HILLSDALE, capital of the above county, 85 miles S. of Detroit. There is a large Baptist college. Manf. Chairs, iron, and machinery. There is a large trade in grain. Pop. 4,000.

HILVARENBEEK, hil-va'-ren-beek, a village of Holland, province of North Brabant, 17 miles S.E. of Breda. Pop. 2,500, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

HIMALEH, or HIMALAYA MOUNTAINS, him-a-lai'-ya, a stupendous range, which separates Hindostan from Tibet and Tartary. Their mean elevation is from 16,000 to 18,000 feet, but no less than forty-five peaks exceed 23,000 feet. Of these mount Everest, which is the highest known point on the globe, is 29,002 feet high, and Kunchinjunga is 28,156 feet. The great mass of the Himalayas extend from lon. 73° 23′ to 95° 40′ E., a distance of 1,500 miles. The southern aspect of the range is divided into three regions—first, a marshy plain called the Terai, which is succeeded by a belt of saul-wood, beyond this is a belt of detritus, which extends to the foot of the true mountains. Above these districts are sanataria for the troops at Muree, Simla, and Darjeeling. Tea is cultivated extensively on the southern slopes. The Brahmaputra and the Indus and Ganges are mainly fed by the melting of the snow on the Himalayas. The name is a Sanscrit term, meaning "the abode of snow." The limit of perpetual snow is 17,400 feet on the north side, and 16,200 on the south. (See ASIA, INDIA, NEPAUL, and TERAI.)

HINCHINBROOK ISLAND, hinch'-in-brook, an island on the west coast of North America, in Prince William's Sound. Lat. 60° 24′ N. Lon. between 213° 50′ and 214° 24′ E.

HINCKLEY, hink'-le, a market-town of Leicestershire, 12 miles S.W. of Leicester. It is the head of a poor-law union, and has a large ancient parish church, built in the reign of Edward III., and several meeting-houses. Manf. Coarse cotton stockings, thread and worsted. It is also noted for its fine ale. Pop. 7,673.—A station on the London and North-Western and Midland railways.—There are Roman remains in the vicinity.

HINCMAR, hink'mar, archbishop of Rheims. The most striking event in his career was his controversy with Pope Nicholas I. in the year 862, when the archbishop was ordered to appear at Rome in person or by his representative to vindicate his conduct in having excommunicated Rothadius, Bishop of Soissons, for refusing to restore a deposed priest of his diocese. Hincmar sent a legate to Rome, but refused to reinstate the bishop. Whereupon the pope annulled the sentence and insisted upon the case being reheard at Rome. The archbishop was ultimately obliged to give way, and in the end Rothadius was acquitted. Hincmar was noted for his opposition both to the aggressions of the papacy and to the undue extension of the royal prerogative in ecclesiastical affairs. His works have been collected in two folio volumes.

Born at Toulouse, 806; died 882.

HIND, JOHN RUSSELL, hinde, an eminent modern astronomer, is the son of a Nottingham lace manufacturer. His education was conducted with the view of fitting him for commercial pursuits; but, from his earliest youth, he evinced a strong predilection for astronomical studies. In 1840 he was sent to London, where he became assistant to a civil engineer. His love for scientific pursuits, however, led him to apply to Professor Wheatstone for a situation more in accordance with the bent of his genius. Through the interest of this gentleman, he obtained a situation under Professor Airy in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, where he remained for four years, making the best use of his time in studying the valuable astronomical works in the library, by which a solid foundation of scientific knowledge was obtained. In 1843 he was sent to Valentia, near Dublin, to settle the longitude of the place; and, in 1844, he left the Royal Observatory to take charge of Mr. Bishop's private observatory in Regent's Park; when, soon after his appointment, he became a member of the Royal Astronomical Society. Applying himself assiduously to the observation of the heavens, he has discovered, since his appointment, ten new planets—Iris, Flora, Victoria, Irene, Melpomene, Fortuna, Calliope, Thalia, Euterpe, and Urania; three comets, several stars, as well as having calculated the orbits of a number of planets and comets. He has been chosen member and correspondent of nearly all the great continental learned societies; has received the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society, besides being appointed its assistant secretary. The government has granted him a pension of £200 per year, and has appointed him superintendent of the Nautical Almanac. Besides his many valuable contributions to the Transactions of the Royal Astronomical, and other English and foreign societies, he has published a pamphlet "On the expected Return of the Great Comet of 1264 and 1556;" "An Astronomical Vocabulary;" being an Explanation of the Terms in use among Astronomers at the present day;" "The Solar System," a description of the sun, moon, and planets; "An Account of all the Recent Discoveries;" "An Illustrated London Astronomy, for the use of Schools and Students;" in addition to several others, some calculated for the more learned in science, and others fitted for the popular exposition of that science in which he has laboured with so much industry and success.

Born at Nottingham, May 1823.

HINDLEY, hinde'-le, a township of Lancashire, 3 miles S.E. of Wigan. Manf. Extensive, chiefly cotton goods. There are collieries in the vicinity. Pop. 14,667.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

HINDOEN, hind'-o-en, an island on the Norway coast of the Lofoden group. It has productive fisheries. The island is of irregular shape, 50 miles long, with a mean breadth of 30.

HINDONE, hin-done', a town of India, 65 miles S.W. of Agra. There are several Hindoo temples in the Mahomedan style, and many of the houses are built of a fine dark red sandstone.

HINDOO KUSH, hin'-doo koosh, a mountain-chain of Central Asia, forming the western continuation of the Himalayas. It extends between 34° and 36° N. lat., and between 68° and 75° E. lon., and divides Afghanistan from Turkestan. The Oxus rises on the N. side of the Hindoo Coosh and passes to Aral Sea; the river Helmund has its origin on the south side, and finds its way thence to the salt lake Hamoon. The loftiest peak of the range is estimated to be more than 20,000 feet above the sea level. (See ASIA and AFGHANISTAN).

HINDOOR, or NALAGURH, hin'-door, a hill state of India, on the S.W. declivity of the Himalaya mountains. It is inclosed by Kuhloor, Bahgul, Muhlog, and Sirhind. Area, 230 square miles. It is traversed throughout by a range of steep hills, and is drained by the Gumber and the Sursa. Its soil is, in general, fertile, yielding rice, millet, barley, wheat, opium, cotton, hemp, and tobacco. Pop. 53,373.

HINDOSTAN, or HINDUSTAN. (See INDIA.)

HINDS, hindes, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 850 square miles. Pop. 43,958. Jackson is the capital.

HINGENE, hain'-jen, a village of Belgium, 12 miles S.W. of Antwerp, on the Scheldt, at the confluence of the Rupel and Vliet. There are a fine castle and three churches. Manf. Linen, soap, oil, and cordage. Pop. 3,700.

HINGHAM, hing'-ham, a market-town of Norfolk, 14 miles W. of Norwich. There is a fine church, in the decorated English style. Pop. 1,500.

HINGHAM, a seaport and township of Massachusetts, United States, 14 miles S.E. of Boston. It contains several churches, and a well-endowed academy. Pop. 4,485. chiefly engaged in fisheries.

HINOJOSA (DEL DUQUE), he'-no-ho'-sa, a town of Spain, in Cordova, 45 miles from the town of that name. It has several convents and hospitals. Manf. Woollens and linen, leather, soap, earthenware, and chocolate. Pop. 8,000.

HINSDALE, hins'-dale, a county of Colorado, United States. Area, 1,400 square miles. There are gold mines. San Juan City is the capital.

HIOGO, or FIOGO, a town of Japan, island of Niphon, on the north-west side of the bay of Ohasaka. It is a very important place, and one of the ports thrown open by the treaty of commerce of 1863. A breakwater, constructed at a great expense, ensures safe anchorage. Pop. 40,620.

HIOUEN-THSANG, a Chinese traveller, who visited India in the 7th century, for the purpose of enquiring into the condition of Buddhism in that country. He travelled alone, or nearly so, wearing the garb of a mendicant, and visited no less than 110 places. The narrative of his journey is in the highest degree interesting, and is considered thoroughly trustworthy, though not composed by himself. It is contained in two works, both of which have been translated into French by M. Stanislas Julien: "Histoire de la Vie de Hiouen-Thsang" (Paris, 1853) and "Mémoires sur les Contrées Occidentales, par Hiouen-Thsang" (1857-1858).

HIPPARCHUS, hip-par'-kus, son of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, after whose death, 527 B.C., he reigned with his brother Hippias; both of whom had a great love of letters, and protected learned men. Hipparchus was slain by Harmodius. Hippias reigned tyrannically about three years after his brother's death, and was then expelled.

Died 513 B.C.

HIPPARCHUS, a celebrated Greek astronomer, and father of the modern system, who was the first to reduce astronomy to a regular science; and whose catalogue of stars is still preserved in Ptolemy's "Almagest." He foretold the course of the sun and moon for 600 years, calculated according to the different manners of reckoning the months, days, and hours, in use among several nations, and for the different situations of places. He also formed the lunar period which bore his name; invented the planisphere, or method of describing the stars upon a plane; and was the first to mark the positions of places upon the earth in the same manner as that of the stars, by circles drawn from the poles perpendicularly to the equator, in other words, by latitudes and longitudes; he was also the author of the projections by which maps of the world and the best geographical maps are made.

HIPPERHOLME, hip'-per-home, an urban district, West Riding of Yorkshire, 2½ miles from Halifax. Pop. 2,920.—A station on the Great Northern and Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

HIPPIAS, hip'-pi-as, a son of Pisistratus, and who became tyrant of Athens, after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He wished to revenge the death of his brother, who had been assassinated, but was driven from his country. He fled to King Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians.

Died 490 B.C.

HIPPOCRATES, hip-pok'-ra-tees, the father of medical science, who flourished during the epoch of the Peloponnesian war, and before whose time the art of healing consisted of mystical jugglerics and superstitious practices, pursued by the priests as a source of profit. He was born of a family called the Asclepiadæ, who for 300 years had followed the pursuit of medicine. (See ÆSCULAPIUS.) He taught the necessity of closely observing the signs of diseases, and prescribed only the most simple remedies; always insisting that the physician should follow nature. He is said to have been the first to recognize the value of diet as an adjunct to the physician in the treatment of disease, and wrote a treatise on the subject; he practised both as physician and surgeon; but, owing to the great respect paid to the remains of the dead among the Greeks, he had few opportunities to study anatomy, of which he is said to have possessed but a scanty amount of knowledge. A large number of medical works are attributed to him; but it is believed that many are the composition of some other members of his family. A complete edition of his seventy-two essays has been published in Germany.

Born at Cos, 460 B.C.; died 357 B.C.

HIPPOCRENE, hip'-po-kre'-ne, a fountain of Bœotia, near Mount Helicon, sacred to the Muses. It first rose from the ground when struck by the feet of the horse Pegasus, whence the name hippou krene, "the horse's fountain."

HIPPODAMIA, hip-po-da'-me-a, in Greek legend, daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis, and Asterope, the Pleiad, married Pelops, son of Tantalus. Her father, according to an oracle, refused to marry her except to one who could overcome him in a chariot-race. As the beauty of Hippodamia was celebrated, many accepted her father's conditions. Thirteen, or more, according to some legends, had already been conquered, and laid down their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia. He had previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and insured himself the victory. Œnomaus, mounted on a broken chariot, was killed in the course, and Pelops married Hippodamia, who became mother of Atreus and Thyestes.

HIPPOLYTE, hip-pol'-i-te, in Greek legend, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. She had a son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. (See HERCULES.)

HIPPOLYTE (DU FORT), ST., hip'-po-leet, a town of France, department Gard, near the sources of the Vidourle, 27 miles N.W. of Nismes. It is well built and fortified. Manf. Silk and cotton hosiery, woollens, leather, and glue. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,200.

HIPPOLYTUS, hip-pol'-i-tus, in Greek legend, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his continence. His stepmother, Phædra, fell in love with him, and when he refused to pollute his father's bed, she accused him of offering violence to her person, and Theseus, believing the accusation, entreated Neptune to punish his son. Hippolytus fled from the resentment of his father, and, as he pursued his way along the seashore, his horses were so frightened at the noise of sea-calves, which Neptune had purposely sent there, that they ran about the rocks till his chariot was broken, and his body torn to pieces. Upon this myth, Euripides founded his play entitled "Hippolytus."

HIPPOLYTUS, a father of the Church, bishop of Portus, near Rome, and martyr in the reign of Alexander Severus. He is chiefly remarkable as the presumed author of a work on "Heresies," hitherto attributed to Origen. The Chevalier Bunsen, a few years since, wrote a work called "Hippolytus," in which, while giving the arguments on both sides, he pronounced himself an advocate for the claims of Hippolytus to the authorship of the work in question.

Lived during the 3rd century.

HIPPONA, hip-po'-na, in Greek mythology, a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in horses' stables.

HIPPONAX, hip-po'-nax, a Greek satirical poet, of whose writings only a few fragments remain. He was so deformed that two sculptors made ridiculous representations of him, for which he retaliated upon them with such severity in his satires, that they are said to have hanged themselves.

Born 540 B.C.

HIRAM, or HURAM, hi'-ram, king of Tyre, the friend of David and Solomon, the latter of whom he greatly assisted in the building of the temple, by furnishing him with timber, gold, and silver, also with able workmen. The letters that passed between these two monarchs on this occasion appear in the Biblical books of "Kings" and "Chronicles." He reigned 60 years.

Died 1,000 B.C.

HIRAM, a Tyrian architect, who was sent by the above to Jerusalem to superintend the building of Solomon's temple, which he performed in an admirable manner. A tradition says that he was killed by an Israelite, an architect.

Lived in the 11th century, B.C.

HIRE, PHILIP DE LA, heer, French mathematician, who, after studying painting under his father, having a turn for mathematics, quitted that profession and went to Italy, where he applied himself diligently to his favourite science. On his return to France, he was made a member of the Academy of Sciences, and employed by Colbert in constructing the great map of the kingdom, with Picard and Cassini. His principal works are, "Treatise on Mechanics," "New Method of Geometry," and an essay on "Conic Sections."

Born at Paris, 1640; died 1711.

HIRSCHBERG, heersh'-bairg, an ancient fortified town of Prussia, province of Silesia, at the confluence of the Bober and Zacken, 30 miles S.W. of Liegnitz. There is a very fine Protestant church, in the Gothic style. A trade is carried on in linen and lawn; it has also some woollen manufactures. Pop. 14,388.

HITCHCOCK, EDWARD, D.D., LL.D., American geologist, became head of the academy at Deerfield, Massachusetts, in 1815; in 1821 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Conway; and in 1825 received the appointment of professor of chemistry and natural history in Amherst College; from 1845 he was principal and professor of natural theology and geology until 1854; and from that year until shortly before his death was principal of the same college. His first published work was "The Geology of the Connecticut Valley," published in 1824, and between 1830 (when he was appointed a state geologist) and 1857, he made numerous surveys; these on his native state were embodied in his Final Report on the Geology of Massachusetts, published in 1841. In 1850 he was made agricultural commissioner for Massachusetts, and in that capacity visited and reported on the principal agricultural schools of Europe. "The Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences" (1851) was for some time a very popular book, and passed through many editions. He also published an "Elementary Geology," "Fossil Footmarks in the United States," "Ichnology of New England," and "Report on the Geology of Vermont."

Born at Deerfield, 1793; died 1864.

HITCHIN, hitch'-in, a market-town of Hertford, 13 miles N.W. of Hertford. The church is a handsome structure of stone, recently restored, and another church built in 1865. There are several chapels, a free and a charity school, and almshouses. Manf. Silk and straw plait. There are several breweries, and a trade is carried on in corn, malt, and flour. Pop. 8,434.—A station on the Great Northern and Midland railways.

HITTEREN, hit'-teren, an island on the coast of Drontheim, in Norway, 60 miles long, by 10 broad. Pop. about 4,000, including several small adjacent islands, mostly employed in fishing.

HITZIG, FERDINAND, hit-zik, professor of theology at Heidelberg from 1861 to the time of his death, having previously held a similar appointment at Zürich. He has published numerous commentaries on the Books of the Old Testament and other works. He was born at Hauingen, in Baden, and studied at Heidelberg, Halle, and Göttingen.

Born 1807; died 1875.

HIVAOA, hi'-va-o'-a, an island in the South Pacific, 22 miles long and 10 miles in breadth. Lat. 9° 34' S.; Lon. 139° 4' W. It is the principal island of the Marquesas group. Pop. 6,500.

HIVITES, hive-ites, a Canaanitish nation, who occupied the uplands of Ephraim in the time of Jacob, and subsequently the slopes of Hermon and the westward region towards Tyre.

H'LASSA, las'-sa, the capital of Tibet, and the head-quarters of the lamas or Buddhist priests, and is the residence of the Dalai-lama. It is situated 9,500 feet above the sea level, in lat. 30° 45′ N., and lon. 91° 27′ E. No foreigners are permitted to enter it from the south. Pop. about 24,000.

HLINSKO, hin'-sko, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, 15 miles S.E. of Chrudim. There are a large modern church and a town-house. Manf. Linen, earthenware, and tiles. Pop. 3,300.

HOADLEY, BENJAMIN, hodd'-le, a celebrated English bishop. He was the son of the master of Norwich grammar-school, and was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1706, he commenced his polemical career by remarks on one of Dr. Atterbury's funeral sermons; and in 1708 he answered another sermon of the same author, on the power of charity to cover sin. The year following, he had another controversy with Atterbury on the doctrine of non-resistance, which recommended Hoadley to the notice of the House of Commons, who prayed the queen to bestow preferment on him. On the accession of George I. he was made bishop of Bangor, which see he never visited, but continued in London, preaching and publishing political sermons. One of these, on the spiritual kingdom of Christ, produced a violent dispute called the Bangorian controversy.

Born at Westerham, Kent, 1676; died 1761.

HOAI-HO, ho'-ai-ho, a river of China, formed by the union of several smaller streams in the province of Honan. It falls into the lake Hang-tse, in the province of Keang-soo. The total length is about 400 miles.

HOBART, formerly Hobart Town, the capital of Tasmania, on the S. coast of the island, and on the banks of the river Derwent, 12 miles from its mouth. Hobart Town has a good harbour with a good quay, and is the seat of government. The streets, the aggregate length of which is about 36 miles, are wide, well laid out, and intersect each other at right angles; Liverpool is the most business street, after that comes Elizabeth Street. Most of the public buildings are in Macquarie Street. The streets are lined by numerous public buildings, of which the Government House (a handsome palatial pile of the finest white freestone, on the banks of the Derwent), and Government offices, the Houses of Parliament, the town hall, post-office, the museum, and the banks, may be instanced as the largest. Churches and chapels are very numerous, numbering in all thirty-one, exclusive of the two cathedrals. There is fortnightly steam communication to Melbourne and Sydney, and numerous small steamers ply to different spots of the Derwent. Hobart Town is largely visited during the summer season by visitors from Melbourne, Adelaide and Sydney on account of its reinvigorating climate. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 42° 53′ S. Lon. 147° 22′ E.

HOBART PASHA. The Hon. Augustus Charles Hobart, third son of the Earl of Buckingham, joined the British Royal Navy in 1836. In 1845 was appointed to the Queen's yacht. During the Crimean war he commanded H.M.S. Driver, and was highly commended. Retired on half-pay, and engaged in blockade-running during the American secession war. In 1862 became post captain by seniority, and taking service in the Turkish navy so got the rank pasha. He was consequently struck off the British navy list, but in 1885 he was reinstated, with the pension of a vice-admiral.

Born 1822; died 1886.

HOBBES, THOMAS, hobs, a celebrated English philosopher, son of a clergyman at Malmesbury. He received his education at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1608 he became tutor to a son of Lord Hardwicke, afterwards earl of Devonshire, with whom he made the tour of Europe. On the death of his patron and pupil, he became travelling tutor to a young gentleman, but the countess dowager of Devonshire recalled him into her family to take upon him the education of the young earl. He made, in London, the acquaintance of Bacon, Raleigh, Ben Jonson, and other eminent men. In 1628 he printed his translation of Thucydides, and in 1634 he attended the earl on his travels, and at Pisa contracted an intimacy with Galileo. In 1642 he printed his book "De Cive," which procured him many enemies by its dangerous principles. Soon after this he was appointed mathematical tutor to the prince of Wales. In 1650 appeared, in English, his book on Human Nature; and one, "De Corpore Politico; or the Elements of Law." The next year he published his famous book, entitled "Leviathan," which is full of paradoxical doctrines. At the Restoration he received a pension of £100 per annum, he having formerly supported the royalist cause with great zeal; but in 1665 the parliament passed a censure on his writings, which greatly alarmed him. Hobbes maintained the propriety of making use of bad means to procure a good end; which he thus illustrated: "If I were cast into a deep pit, and the devil should put down his cloven foot, I would readily lay hold of it to get out." Besides the above works, he published "The Wonders of the Peak," a poem; a translation of Homer; "Elements of Philosophy;" a history of the Civil Wars; "Letter on Liberty and Necessity;" "Six Lessons to the Professors of the Mathematics;" "Marks of absurd Geometry," &c. He attained the great age of 91.

Born at Malmesbury, 1588; died 1679.

HOBHOUSE, JOHN CAM, Baron Broughton, hob'-house, a distinguished English politician and writer of books of travel. After receiving his education at Cambridge, he, in 1809, travelled in the East, and on his return, in 1812, published a work called "A Journey into Albania and other Provinces of the Turkish Empire." Lord Byron dedicated the fourth canto of "Childe Harold" to him about the same time. He was in France during the Hundred Days, and, after the battle of Waterloo, wrote "The Letters of an Englishman," in which he declared himself a supporter of the emperor Napoleon. Mainly through the rancour of his political opponents, he was incarcerated in gaol for four years; but this was the means of his attaining to a considerable degree of popularity. He became a member of the House of Commons in 1820, and, at the same time assisted several members of the Radical party in establishing the "Westminster Review," wherein he opposed, in the most forcible manner, the Tory party under Canning. Becoming more moderate in his political views, he was, in 1831, appointed secretary of state for war in the cabinet of Earl Grey, and, in 1833, secretary of state for Ireland; but, in the same year, lost his seat in the House of Commons, through an inconsistent vote. In 1834 he was elected M.P. for Nottingham. On the accession to power of the Whig party, headed by Lord John Russell, in 1846, he became president of the India Board of Control, in which important office he remained till 1851, when he was again unseated through his change of political opinions. In the same year he was created a peer, under the title of Baron Broughton of Gyford. After a short ministerial career, as a member of the coalition ministry of 1852, he retired into private life.

Born 1786; died 1869.

HOBOKEN, ho-bo'-ken, a city of New Jersey, United States, noted as a summer resort. It is situated on the west bank of the Hudson, opposite New York, with which it is connected by a steam-ferry. There are large ship-building yards. Pop. 30,999.

HOCHE, LAZARE, hosh, general of the French republican army, was the son of an ostler. Being deprived of his father while a child, the rector of St. Germain-en-Laye took him under his care and made him a chorister, after which he became a groom in the royal stables. At the age of 17 he entered the army, and became a corporal in the grenadiers. Soon after the breaking out of the Revolution, he obtained a commission, and distinguished himself in several engagements. During the tyranny of Robespierre, he was confined in the Conciergerie several months; but the Thermidorean revolution set him at liberty. In 1793 he was appointed to the command of the army of the Moselle, and was several times defeated by the Duke of Brunswick, who commanded the Prussians. He drove the Austrians out of Alsace, and in the civil war in La Vendée, being sent against the royalists at Quiberon, he acted with great cruelty, and put to death the brave Charette. Soon afterwards, he commanded the forces sent to Ireland, but returned unsuccessful. He next had the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, with which he defeated the Austrians on the Rhine; but, after a short illness, he died, suspected of being poisoned.

Born near Versailles, 1768; died at Wetzler, 1797.

HOCHELAGA, hoche-e-la'-ga, a county of the province of Québec, dominion of Canada, occupying the eastern portion of Montreal Island. Area, 76 square miles. Pop. 40,079, nearly all of French descent. Capital, Longue Point.

HOCHHEIM, hoké-heim, a town of Prussia, province of Hesse-Nassau. It stands on a hill sloping to the Main, on which are the vineyards producing the true hochheimer, or hock, a name improperly given to Rhenish wines generally.

HOCHKIRCH, or HOCHKIRCHEN, hoké'-kirk, a small village of Saxony, in the district of Bautzen. The scene of a great battle between the Austrians and Prussians (1758) during the Seven Years' War, in which the Prussians, under Frederick II., were defeated with a loss of 9,000 men and 101 cannons; the Austrians lost 8,000 men. In 1813 a series of engagements took place here between the French and the allies. (See BAUTZEN.)

HOCHSTADT, hoké'-stat, a town of Franconia, on the Aisch, 15 miles from Bamberg. Pop. 1,500.

HOCHSTADT, a town of Bavaria, circle of Swabia, on the left bank of the Danube, at the influx of the small river Egwied, 23 miles N.W. of Augsburg. It is noted for the defeat of the French and Bavarians by the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene. The action took place between this town and Blenheim, in 1704. Pop. 2,500. (See BLENHEIM.)

HOCKHOCKING, hok'-hok-ing, a river of Ohio, United States, which, after a south-easterly course of 80 miles, falls into the Ohio, at Troy. It is navigable for boats 70 miles, and affords good water power.

HOCKING, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 21,126. The capital is Logan.

HODDESDON, hods'-don, a market-town of Hertfordshire, 4 miles S.E. of Hertford. There are several old inns alluded to by Prior and Izaak Walton. Pop. 1,854.

HODEIDA, or HODIDA, ho-dé'-da, a seaport of Arabia, on the Red Sea, 100 miles N. of Mocha. It is a handsome and well built town, with a well supplied market.

HODEMONT, hode-mawn(g)', a village of Belgium, on the Vesdre, adjoining Verviers. Manf. Woollens, worsted, cotton, and chemicals. Pop. 3,600.

HODGKINSON, EATON, haj'-kin-son, professor of the mechanics of engineering at University College, London, celebrated for his successful investigations in connection with the application of iron to architecture and engineering, conducted mainly at the expense of Mr. Fairbairn. He was born at Anderton, near Northwich, in Cheshire, but settled at Manchester, where he commenced the study of mechanics. His papers containing the results of his investigations are to be found in the Transactions of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and the Memoirs of the Manchester Society. He also edited "Tredgold on the Strength of Cast Iron," with a supplementary volume in which his own theories are embodied. For his experiments and general co-operation in the construction of the Britannia Bridge, he was awarded a first class medal at Paris in 1855.

Born 1789; died 1861.

HOEI (TONG), ho-i', a town of China, province of Kwang-tung (or Canton), on the east coast of the island of Hainan. It is enclosed by lofty walls, and has extensive suburbs. Pop. 44,000.

HOEI (NGAN), a town of China, province of Keang-soo, 100 miles N.E. of Nankin. It is a fortified town and is surrounded by a triple wall.

HOEI (TCHOU), a well built town of China, province of Kwang-tung, on an affluent of the Canton river, which is crossed by a bridge of 40 arches, 75 miles E. of Canton. Manf. Articles of shell. There is an active trade.

HOEI-HO, a river of China, the principal affluent of Hoang-ho, or the Yellow river, which it enters in lat. 34° 45′ N.

HOEKSCHE, heeks'-ke, an island of Holland, province of South Holland. The soil is fertile. Pop. 22,000.

HOEN-HO, a river of China, in the province of Chih-le. It joins the Peiho at Tien-sing, 70 miles S.E. of Pekin, after a south-easterly course of 300 miles.

HOEVEN, JAN VAN DER, hé'-ven, an eminent Dutch naturalist, studied medicine at Leyden, and practised as a physician until 1835, in which year he received the appointment of professor of zoology in the Leyden university, which he retained until his death. His "Handbook of Zoology" has passed through several editions, and has been translated into English and German.

Born at Rotterdam, 1801; died 1868.

HOF, hof, a town of Bavaria, province of Upper Franconia, on the left bank of the Saale, 32 miles N.E. of Bayreuth. Manf. Woollens, cotton, and leather; there are also extensive breweries. There are marble quarries and iron and coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 21,890.

HOF, or DIVOREC, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, 30 miles N.E. of Olmutz. There is a trade in linen. Pop. 2,500.

HOFER, ANDREAS, ho'-fer, a distinguished Tyrolese patriot, and leader of his countrymen against the Bavarian and French invaders of the Tyrolese mountains. In 1796 he led a body of Tyrolese against the French on the lake of Garda, and in 1808 was one of the deputies appointed to negotiate with the emperor of Austria at Vienna. When the treaty of Presburg was signed, by which Napoleon I. transferred the Tyrol to his allies the Bavarians, Hofer was a rich innkeeper and dealer in cattle and wine. By his great natural eloquence and the exercise of his power as a wealthy citizen, Hofer stirred his countrymen into a revolt against the Bavarians and French. The mountaineers were assisted by an Austrian army of 10,000 men, and in the spring of 1809 fell upon the advancing columns of the Bavarians, while marching through the narrow defiles, defeated them with great slaughter, and recovered every fortress in the Tyrol from the enemy. Upon this, Napoleon sent three armies against the mountaineers, one of which defeated the Tyrolese, and put a large number of the inhabitants, male and female, to death. But in May, 1809, Hofer led his countrymen against the Bavarian army, defeated it, and once more set his country free. The Austrians were, however, compelled to evacuate the country a few months later; whereupon he and his countrymen were left alone in the struggle, and at the outset the invaders were victorious; but after several desperate engagements, the Tyrolese were at length successful against the French, from whom they captured 25 pieces of cannon. On the 12th of August, 1809, Marshal Lefebvre, with an army of 23,000 French and Bavarians, and 2,000 cavalry, was defeated by 18,000 armed Tyrolese in a battle which lasted from five in the morning until midnight; thus freeing their native land a third time. Hofer was now proclaimed the head of the province; but his power lasted only a short time; for in October of the same year, an army of 50,000 French and Bavarians, all veteran troops, was marched against him; whereupon he was compelled to seek refuge in the mountains, where he was betrayed by a false friend, a priest named Douay. He was taken and conveyed to Mantua, where, after a trial by court-martial, he was shot. In his short, but exceedingly brilliant career, which lasted less than one year, he thrice delivered his country; and for his services the emperor of Austria pensioned his widow and family, and created his son a noble. In 1834 a fine marble statue to his memory was erected in the cathedral of Innsbrück.

Born at St. Leonard, in Tyrol, 1767; shot at Mantua, 1810.

HOFFMAN, CHARLES FENNO, hofe'-man, an American poet and novelist, who, after leaving Columbia College, was called to the bar at New York, where he practised during three years; but, compelled by the state of his health to travel in the prairies, he published, in 1834, a record of his wanderings, under the title of "A Winter in the West," which obtained a considerable share of popularity. This was followed by "Wild Scenes in the Forest and Prairie," in 1837, and the romance of "Greyslaer," in 1840. He was a very prolific contributor to periodical literature. An unfortunate attack of mental alienation, in 1849, suddenly stopped his brilliant career, during which, save for his love of the horrible and repulsive, he might have claimed the first rank among American novelists.

Born at New York, 1806.

HOFFMAN, MAURICE, an eminent physician, who took his doctor's degree at Padua in 1648; he was made professor of anatomy and surgery at Altdorf, and, the year following, professor of physic. In 1653 he obtained the professorship of botany, to which was added the direction of the physic garden. He was the author of several works on medical botany.

Born 1622; died 1698.

HOFFMAN, FRIEDERICH, a celebrated physician, who studied at Jena and Erfurt, and was chosen professor of physic at Halle, in 1693, which situation he retained till his death. His works, under the title of "A Complete System of Medicine," have been published in Geneva, in 6 vols. He made a large fortune by the sale of a remedy long kept secret, but now known as Hoffman's anodyne liquor.

Born at Halle, 1660; died 1742.

HOFFMAN, JOHN JAMES, professor of Greek at Basle, who is known as the author of a work of great labour and value,—"A Universal Historical Dictionary," in Latin. He also wrote a history of the Popes, in Latin.

Born 1635; died 1706.

HOFFMAN, AUGUST HEINRICH, of Fallersleben, a popular German poet, the son of a burgomaster at Fallersleben, who published, in 1820, "The Fragments of Otfried." In the same year, he undertook a journey along the banks of the Rhine and in Holland, with the view of collecting the scattered fragments of the popular poetry of the middle ages. In 1823 he was appointed conservator of the Breslau University library, and soon afterwards published his "Unpolitical Songs," which caused him to become very popular. He has written songs for children, for workmen, and for peasants; indeed, as a poet, he may be said to write only for the simplest among his countrymen. He has also contributed a number of very valuable philological articles to the best periodicals in Germany.

HOFHOOF, hof-hoof', a town of Arabia, in the eastern province of Hasa. It is divided into three quarters, in one of which is the citadel, and another is the Rifeyeeyah, where the wealthier inhabitants reside. The town is well built and walled. There is a fine mosque. Pop. 23,000.

HOFMANN, AUGUST WILHELM, F.R.S., professor of chemistry at the Berlin university, commenced his professional career as an assistant to Liebig, at Giessen, and afterwards received the appointment of extraordinary professor of chemistry in the university of Bonn. In 1845 he became superintendent of the Royal College of Chemistry, in London; and when that institution was merged into the Laboratory of the Royal School of Mines, his services were retained, and he added greatly to its success by the high character of his teaching and his scientific reputation. On the appointment of Professor Graham as master of the mint, Hofmann succeeded him in the office of chemist, which he retained until 1865, when he became professor of chemistry at Berlin. He is the author of numerous important papers on organic chemistry, and received a royal medal for his "Memoirs on the Molecular Constitution of Organic Bases," in 1854. For his discovery of aniline in coal naphtha, which has proved of such importance in the arts, and from which the beautiful and popular mauve and magenta colours are obtained, he was awarded one of the great prizes at the Paris exhibition of 1867, at which he acted as juror, as he did also at the great exhibition of 1851, the exhibition of 1862, and the Paris exhibition of 1865. In conjunction with Dr. Bence Jones, he has edited the recent editions of "Fownes's Manual of Chemistry," and he has also published a valuable "Introduction to Modern Chemistry," which has passed through numerous editions.

HOG ISLAND, hog, an island off the north-west coast of Sumatra, 40 miles long and 12 broad. It is hilly and covered with trees. Lat. 2° 50′ N. Lon. 95° 40′ E.

HOGARTH, WILLIAM, hō'-garth, a celebrated painter and pictorial satirist of morals, was apprenticed to a silversmith and engraver of arms, &c., on silver plate in Gresham street, Leicester square. In 1720, being 21 years of age, he set up for himself, his first employment being the engraving of coats of arms, ciphers, and shop-bills. He subsequently undertook to execute plates for booksellers, the chief of which are the prints to "Hudibras" (1726) and the illustrations to "Mottraye's Travels." His first performance as a painter was a representation of Wanstead Assembly, the portraits being taken from life. In 1730 he married (clandestinely) a daughter of Sir James Thornhill, in whose academy he had studied drawing from the living figure. After gaining some pecuniary profit and fame by the publication of a series of small etchings representing London life and folly, he afterwards began to paint portraits; but soon abandoned this line of pictorial art, as being too full of drudgery for a man of invention and original genius. In 1733 appeared his "Harlot's Progress," prints which stamped his reputation, and were followed by other works of the same class. Soon after the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, he went to France, and while at Calais began to sketch the gate of the town, for which he was taken up, but was soon released. This circumstance he ridiculed in a pungent caricature. In 1753 he published his "Analysis of Beauty." The sale of engravings of his pictures, executed by himself, was so great that, notwithstanding they were largely pirated, he was enabled to set up his carriage. His "Rake's Progress," "Marriage à la Mode," "March to Finchley," as well as many other works, have constituted him one of the greatest satirists of the worldly vices and weaknesses that have ever lived; while his fine and solid, though unpretending efforts as a colorist, have marked him as one of the best painters of the early English school. He was buried at Chiswick, where is a monument to his memory, with an inscription by Garrick.

Born in London, 1697; died 1764.

HOGG, James, hog, generally known as the Ettrick Shepherd, a Scotch poet of considerable genius. His forefathers had been shepherds for many generations, and he himself, previously to his poetical career, followed the same pursuit. In 1801, while acting as shepherd to Mr. Laidlaw, of Blackhouse, Sir Walter Scott, whose attention had been attracted by some verses Hogg had published, became acquainted with him, and engaged him to collect materials for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border." In 1803 he published a collection of poems, under the title of "The Mountain Bard," which, together with a couple of prizes obtained from the Highland Society for essays on the rearing and management of sheep, made him the possessor of a sum amounting to £300. With this money he took a farm, which was a failure; and after in vain seeking employment as a shepherd, he, "in utter desperation," as he said, "took his plaid about his shoulders, determined, since no better could be, to push his fortune as a literary man." From this period he laboured busily in the field of literature, with varying success. He contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine" and other periodicals, wrote "Madoc the Moor," "The Pilgrim of the Sun," and produced a volume of poems,—some original, some ancient,—entitled "Jacobite Relics of Scotland." "The Altrive Tales," "A Volume of Lay Sermons," and many other works, issued from his fertile but somewhat wild fancy. His finest work is "The Queen's Robe." On his marriage, in 1814, the Duke of Buccleuch made him a present of a farm; but the management of it appears to have been so bad as to have made it a bequest of little value. Hogg figures conspicuously as one of the characters in the famous "Noctes Ambrosianæ" of Christopher North (Professor Wilson.)

Born in the Forest of Ettrick, Selkirkshire, 1772; died 1835.

HOGUE. (See CAPE LA HOGUE.)

HOGOLU ISLANDS, hog'-o-loo, a group of the Caroline archipelago, in the Pacific Ocean. The largest is about 10 miles in circumference. Lat. 7° 20′ N.; lon. 15° 50′ E.

HOGYETZ, heeg'-yas, a town of Hungary, 17 miles N.W. of Tolna. There are a castle and a Roman Catholic church. A trade is carried on in tobacco, wine, and fruit. Pop. 3,000.

HOHENELBE, or HOCHLEBE, ho-hen-elb', a town of the Austrian empire in Bohemia, on both sides of the Elbe, which is crossed by three covered bridges, 18 miles N.E. of Gitschin. There are a fine church, with a massive tower and a castle, now used as a court house. Manf. Cotton and paper. Pop. 2,800.

HOHENEMS, ho-hen-ems', a town of the Austrian empire, in the Tyrol, in the Vorarlberg, at the foot of a hill, on the summit of which are the ruins of a castle, 10 miles S. of Bregenz. There are a castle, church, and much frequented sulphur baths. Manf. Ribbons, worsted, and tiles. Pop. 2,400.

HOHENLINDEN, ho-hen-lin'-den, a village of Bavaria, 20 miles E. of Munich, noted for the defeat of the Austrian army in 1800, by the French, under Moreau, the subject of Campbell's famous poem. Pop. 250.

HOHENLOHE, ho-hen-lo'-e, an old principality of Germany, now included principally in Wurtemberg, but partly in Bavaria.

HOHENLOHE, PRINCE OF, general of artillery in the service of the emperor. He distinguished himself in Transylvania against the Turks, in 1789; and in the campaign against France, in 1792, he gained great reputation, particularly in the battles of Famars and Mermal.

Died 1796.

HOHENLOHE, ALEXANDER LEOPOLD FRANZ EMMANUEL, Prince of Hohenlohe-Waldenburg-Schillingfürst. He was educated for the church, and at the age of 21 entered the Society of the Heart of Jesus, and settled in Bavaria. He soon afterwards professed to heal the sick by praying over them, and the report of the wonderful cures effected attracted great attention; but the Pope refused to sanction the proceedings.

Born 1794; died 1849.

HOHENMAUTH, ho-hen-mauth', or WYSOKE MEYTO, a town of the Austrian empire in Bohemia, on the Lanczna, 15 miles E. of Churdim. The older part of the town is surrounded by dilapidated walls, and there are three suburbs. One of the three churches is large and handsome. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,700.

HOHENSTAUFEN, ho-hen-stauf'-en, a German house, the members of which occupied the imperial throne from 1138 to 1254. It was founded in the 11th century by Frederick von Büren, whose son, the chevalier Frederick von Staufen, received the duchy of Swabia in return for services rendered to the Emperor Henry IV. When Duke Frederick died he left two sons, one of whom (Frederick) succeeded his father in the dukedom; and the other, Konrad, received the duchy of Franconia. On the death of the Emperor Henry V., Lothaire of Saxony was elected to the throne; but the family estates of the late emperor passed to the House of Hohenstaufen. Lothaire revoked the grants made by his predecessors, and a fierce war followed, the result of which was unfavourable to Duke Frederick and his brother. They were, however, ultimately restored to their estates, and in 1138 Konrad was elected Emperor of Germany under the title of Konrad III. His successors were Frederick I. (1152-90); Henry VI. (1190-97; Philip I. (1198-1208); Frederick II. (1212-1251); Conrad IV. (1251-1254.)

HOHENSTEIN, ho'-hen-stine, a town of Saxony, 10 miles N.E. of Zwichau. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen goods; and there are mines of silver and arsenic in the neighbourhood. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 6,000.

HOHENZOLLERN, ho-hen-zol'-lern, one of the most ancient reigning houses of Germany, said to have sprung from Count Thassillo in the commencement of the 9th century. It owes its name to a château situate on the Zollern heights, supposed to have been built by Rudolph II., Count of Zollern, whose two sons, Frederick and Conrad, became the chiefs of the two principal lines of the royal house,—the line of Swabia and the line of Franconia, from which, in 1417, sprang the electors of Brandenburg, who afterwards became the kings of Prussia.

HOHENZOLLERN, principality of, a province of Prussia, comprising a long, narrow, and irregular tract between Wurtemburg and Baden. The surface is generally mountainous, being traversed by ranges of the Black Forest, the Rauhe, Alb, and the Harz, intersected by a few narrow valleys. The soil is not naturally fertile, but is well cultivated. A considerable portion of the higher ground is covered with forests, principally pine.

Rivers.—The Neckar and its affluents, and the Danube.
Area.—480 square miles.
Pop.—67,624, nearly all Roman Catholics.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—The territory is divided into Hohenzollern-Hechingen, the northern and smaller portion, and Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen. The chief towns are HECHINGEN and SIGMARINGEN.
History.—The principalities of Hohenzollern-Hechingen and Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen were formed in 1576 by the division of the Swabian or elder line of the Hohenzollern family. In 1849 the princes ceded their territories to the king of Prussia, retaining their titles and receiving pensions.

HOHSCHEID, ho'-shide, a township of Prussia, in the Rhine province of Dusseldorf. There are extensive lead works and numerous forges. Pop. 12,000.

HOKIANGA, a New Zealand river, which enters the Southern Ocean on the W. coast of the N. Island. Lat. 35° 30′ S. Lon. 173° 26′ E.

HOKIEN, ho'-ki-en, a town of China, province of Chih-le, 102 miles S.W. of Pekin. It is a large town, and surrounded by walls.

HOKITIKA ho-kit'-e-ka, a town on the west coast of the Middle Island of New Zealand, the capital of the county of Westland, 120 miles W. of Christchurch. It is the chief place of the gold-mining districts, and was established in 1865. The town is well laid-out and substantially built, and stretches for about a mile and a half along the coast. Pop. 2,779.

HOLABRUNN (OBER), or HOLEILSDORF, ho'-la-broon, a market town of the Austrian empire, province of Lower Austria, 27 miles N.W. of Vienna. There are a handsome church, and a good square, with a fountain and statue. A large trade is carried on in corn and wine. Pop. 3,100.

HOLBACH, PAUL HEINRICH DIETRICH, Baron von, hole'-bak, a rich German noble, who went to Paris while young, and there embraced the sceptical doctrine professed by those who were called the "Philosophical School," previous to the revolution of 1791. Under the name of the Count de Mirabaud, he wrote a large number of works of an atheistical nature, the best known of which is the "System of Nature," most of which were condemned by the Parliament of Paris, and placed in the Index Expurgatorius of Rome. He also composed and translated several works on chemistry, mineralogy, and the natural sciences. He was a kind-hearted and generous man, and afforded an asylum to the persecuted Jesuits, who had been his most bitter opponents.

Born at Heidesheim, 1723; died at Paris, 1789.

HOLBEACH, hol'-beech, a market town of Lincolnshire, 12 miles S. of Boston. The church is a fine Gothic structure. Pop. 5,000.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

HOLBECK, hol'-bek, a township of Yorkshire, about a mile S.W. of Leeds. Manf. Woollens, thread, and machinery. Pop. 24,051.—A station on the Great Northern, Midland, North-Eastern and Lancashire, and Yorkshire railways.

HOLBEIN, HANS, hole'-bine, a famous portrait-painter and skilful architect, who was instructed in his art by his father. For the town-house of Basle he painted a fine picture of our Saviour's passion, and for the fish-market of the same town a "Dance of Peasants," and "Dance of Death," the last of which has been engraved in a series of plates. He visited England in the reign of Henry VIII., who liberally patronised him, on the recommendation of Sir Thomas More. He painted a number of portraits of the king and the highest nobility, as well as several historical pieces. Eighty-seven portraits by this artist of persons belonging to the court of Henry VIII. still exist. He died of the plague.

Born at Grunstadt, 1497; died in London, 1555.

HOLBEK, hol'-bek, a seaport of Denmark, on a fiord of the same name in the island of Seeland, 33 miles N.W. of Copenhagen. There is a good harbour for small vessels; a good trade, chiefly in corn, is carried on. It was formerly a place of considerable importance, and had a strong castle, destroyed by the Swedes in 1659.

HOLBERG, LUDWIG, Baron de, hole'-bairg, a Danish writer, called the Plautus of his country, who abandoned a military career for one of letters; and was, in 1718, appointed professor in the University of Copenhagen. From that time he wrote especially for the theatre, and produced a large number of plays, which have caused his countrymen to regard him as the founder of dramatic art in Denmark. He was remarkable for humour and truth to nature, and besides his dramatic works wrote also a history of Denmark and an Ecclesiastical History. He received a patent of nobility in 1746.

Born at Bergen, 1684; died at Copenhagen, 1754.

HOLCROFT, THOMAS, hol'-kroft, an English playwright and translator of dramas, &c. He was the son of a shoemaker, and became, when very young, a stable-boy in one of the racing stables at Newmarket. At the age of 17 he quitted this employment, and, for several years, led the life of a tramping shoemaker and wandering schoolmaster, all the while working sedulously at the task of self-education. At 21 he married, and, soon after, contributed a few articles to the Whitehall Evening Post; subsequently he left London to become a strolling player. After following the career of an actor for some time, and appearing on the London stage, he, in 1780, commenced writing for the theatre. He was one of the most fertile dramatic authors of his day, and was among the first to introduce to the London stage the system of adaptation from the French. The "Road to Ruin" is one of his best comedies, and still keeps possession of the stage. He also wrote several novels and a sceptical poem; but it is as a translator of plays that he is chiefly known.

Born in London, 1745; died 1809.

HOLDERNESS, hol'-der-ness, a fertile district of Yorkshire, lying between the river Humber and the North Sea. (See YORKSHIRE, EAST RIDING.)

HOLGUIN, hol'-goo-in, a town of the island of Cuba, West Indies, 50 miles N.W. of Santiago. It is the centre of a great sugar-growing district. Pop. 5,300. Lat. 20° 40′ N. Lon. 76° 10′ W.

HOLICS, or HOLITSCH, ho-lich, a town of Hungary, on the left bank of the March, or Morava, 46 miles N. of Presburg. There are a magnificent imperial palace, a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, and a synagogue. Manf. Stoneware. Pop. 5,200.

HOLINSHED, RAPHAEL, hol'-in-shed, a celebrated old English chronicler, whose work is considered highly important by English historians, and supplied Shakspeare with a large amount of material for his historical plays. Nothing certain is known of his profession, but his annals show that he possessed considerable learning. His "Chronicles" were first published in 1577, in 2 vols. folio; and again in 1587 in three. The latter edition omitted some passages which Queen Elizabeth found to be disagreeable.

HOLITZ, hol'-litz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, 11 miles N.E. of Chrudim. It is almost entirely built of wood. Pop. 3,400, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.—In 1758 a battle was fought here between the Prussians and Imperialists.

HOLKAR, MULHAR RAO, hol'-kar, a Mahratta soldier, who, for his military services, on behalf of the Peishwa, received a grant of territory in Malwa in 1737, and subsequently made himself chief of more than half of the same province.

Born 1693; died 1768.

HOLKAR, JESWUNT RAO, natural son of Mulhar Rao. After the death of his father he placed himself at the head of a large army, collected by his ability and tact, and defeated Scindia, the most powerful of the Mahratta chieftains, in 1802, and established himself in Malwa. Hereupon, the Marquis Wellesley, who was at that time governor-general of India, proclaimed war against him; but, after a struggle of nearly three years, a peace was concluded, by which he was allowed to retain the greater portion of his territories. His violent temper subsequently culminated in madness, and he passed the closing years of his life in confinement.

Died 1811.

HOLKAR, MULKERJI RAO HOLKAR, on the failure of the direct line, was placed in possession of the state by the East India Company (under whose direction he had been educated), in 1852. He supported the British authority in the great mutiny of 1857. Died, June, 1886.

HOLLAND, HENRY FOX, hol'-land, first lord, was secretary of war under Walpole in 1746, and afterwards paymaster-general of the forces. George III. created him a peer in 1762. He had several sons, one of whom was the celebrated orator Charles Fox. (See FOX.)

Born 1705; died 1774.

HOLLAND, HENRY RICHARD FOX, VASSALL-HOLLAND, third lord, nephew of the celebrated orator, Charles James Fox, and, like him, the champion of public liberty. In 1806 he became lord privy seal in the Granville-Fox ministry; and in 1814-15 he denounced the war against Napoleon. He greatly aided in the abolition of the Corporation and Test Acts, as well as strongly advocated parliamentary reform, and took an active part in the crusade against slavery. In 1805 he published the "Memoirs of Lope de Vega," and other works, and afterwards translated three comedies from the Spanish. His lordship's house at Kensington was, for a very lengthened period, a hospitable resort for the distinguished in literature and politics.

Born 1773; died at Holland House, 1840.

HOLLAND, HENRY, a distinguished English architect, the favourite of George IV. when Prince of Wales. His personal history is unknown; but of his works we may mention that he designed Carlton House and the Pavilion at Brighton for his patron, though this last was afterwards improved by Nash. (See NASH.) He was the architect of Drury-lane Theatre; but this building was destroyed by fire in 1809. The India House, in Leadenhall-street, was also his design.

Born about 1746; died 1806.

HOLLAND, SIR HENRY, an eminent English physician, who, after graduating M.D. at the University of Edinburgh, in 1811, went to London, where he rapidly acquired consideration as a physician. In 1840 he became physician in ordinary to H.R.H. Prince Albert, and in 1852 was appointed to the same duties towards her majesty. His work, entitled "Medical Notes and Reflections," was held in general esteem by the profession. He also wrote "Travels in Albania, Thessaly, &c." (1815), "Chapters on Mental Physiology" (1852), "Essay on Scientific Subjects" (1862), and "Recollections of Past Life" (1871) Although engaged for so many years in practice as the most fashionable physician of the time, he found leisure for extensive travel. In 1853 he was raised to the dignity of a baronet, in consideration of his professional knowledge; was also a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of London, and of the Royal Society.

Born at Knutsford, Cheshire, 1788; died 1873.

HOLLAND, PHILEMON, an English writer, fellow of Trinity College; among the works of whose industrious life may be mentioned the translation of Pliny's "Natural History," and Camden's "Britannia." He was also an eminent practiser of the healing art in his day.

Born at Chelmsford, 1551; died 1636.

HOLLAND, KINGDOM OF. (See NETHERLANDS, THE.)

HOLLAND, NEW. (See AUSTRALIA.)

HOLLAND, NORTH and SOUTH, two maritime provinces of the kingdom of the Netherlands, bounded W. by the German Ocean, S. by Zealand, E. by the Zuyder Zee and the province of Utrecht. They consist of a narrow peninsula and some islands, the length of the peninsula being about 90 miles, and its breadth varying from 25 to 40. A continued flat, which lies so low as to be under the level of the sea at high water, the tide being prevented from overflowing the country by means of natural sand-banks, or downs, and immense artificial dykes. The numerous canals and ditches which traverse the province, in all directions, are likewise provided with dykes, and serve not only to promote internal communication, but to drain the land of superfluous water.

Rivers.—The Rhine and Maese, or Maas; and in addition to these two great rivers, which water these provinces in common with the rest of the Netherlands, there are several smaller rivers—in the north province, the Amstel, Zaan, Spaarne, Giem, and other small streams flowing into the Rhine or the Zuyder Zee; in the south province, the Rhine, the Yssel, the Maas, and the Merwede; but they have so little current as to be more properly considered as canals or watercourses. The Haarlem lake has been drained and the space formerly occupied by it maintains a population of between 11,000 and 12,000; small lakes or ponds, however, still exist in the marshy districts.

Climate and Pro.—The soil is in general productive, consisting of a deep rich loam. From the humidity of both soil and climate, not much land is under tillage, and that little is in South Holland. The crops principally cultivated are wheat, madder, tobacco, hemp, and flax. The principal agricultural wealth consists in the pastures, which are almost unrivalled in the abundance and luxuriance of the grass which they produce; and on this are fed large numbers of cattle, many of which are exported to Great Britain.

Manf.—A variety of articles; viz., linen, woollen, and leather; also paper, wax, refined sugar, starch, and, in certain districts, pottery and tiles. Large quantities of gin, or "hollands," are likewise distilled, particularly at Schiedam, near the Maas.

Cities and Towns.—In N. Holland, AMSTERDAM, HAARLEM, ALCKMAAR, and ZAARDAM; in S. Holland, ROTTERDAM, the HAGUE, LEYDEN, BRIELLE, GOUDA, DELFT, SCHIEDAM, and DORT.

Area.—N Holland, 1,706 square miles. S. Holland, 1,369 square miles.

Lat. Between 51° 40′ and 53° 10′ N. Lon. between 3° 36′ and 5° 30′ E.

History.—Holland, in the middle ages, was governed by counts or earls, and subsequently fell under the dominion of Spain; after its emancipation from which it was ruled, with some interruptions, by the house of Orange. In 1795 it was conquered by the French; and afterwards, under Napoleon, reduced into a province of France, the emperor's brother Louis being created king of Holland. It was freed in 1813, and, from that period, the history of these provinces forms a part of that of the larger government of the Netherlands.

HOLLAND, PARTS OF, a division of Lincolnshire, on the North Sea, consisting mainly of low marshy and fen lands, protected from the sea and the overflowing of rivers by large embankments. See LINCOLNSHIRE.

HOLLAND-PREUSSISCH, prois'-sish, a town of Prussia, province of Prussia, 55 miles S.W. of Konigsberg, on a height above the Weetske. Manf. Woollens and linen Pop. 4,000.

HOLLAR, WENCESLAUS, hol'-lar, a distinguished draughtsman and etcher during the 17th century, whose drawings of old London have a peculiar value with the antiquarian and historian. He was educated for the profession of law, at Prague, but abandoned it for the more congenial pursuits of drawing and engraving, obtaining instruction therein from Matthew Marian, an engraver, who had worked for Vandyke and Rubens. At the outset of his artistic career, he travelled from one great German town to another, copying the pictures of great painters, and making perspective views of cities, towns, and remarkable localities, becoming very celebrated for his drawings of the Rhine and Danube. In 1636, Howard, Earl of Arundel, met him at Cologne, and at once took him under his patronage. On leaving Germany, the earl brought Hollar with him to England, where he commenced his artistic labours with the "Prospect of Greenwich," which he executed in two plates in 1637. Two years afterwards he drew the portraits of the royal family for the great plate of the Entrance of Queen Marie de Medici into England, on a visit to her daughter, Henrietta Maria, queen of England. During the civil war he was taken prisoner by the Parliamentarians, and deprived of his liberty for some time; but, on his release, he went to Antwerp. Returning to England in 1652, he executed the etchings for Dugdale's "Monasticon" and his "History of St. Paul's," besides a very large number of other views and drawings. According to one authority, he etched as many as 2,400 prints. Though he had been so laborious an artist, it is recorded that, at the age of 70, he had an execution in his house; whereupon the worthy old man requested only to be left to die in his bed.

Born at Prague, 1607; died in London, 1677.

HOLLESCHAU, hol'-shau, a town of the Austrian empire in Moravia, on the Russawa, 18 miles N. of Hradisch. There is a fine castle. A trade in wax, honey, hides, and wool is carried on, chiefly by Jews. Pop. 5,200.

HOLLIDAYSBURG, hol'-le-dais-berg, a town of Pennsylvania, United States, capital of Blair county, 180 miles N.W. of Philadelphia. It is the centre of a large trade by rail and canal, and a large quantity of minerals and agricultural produce passes through it. Pop. 2,500.

HOLLYWOOD, hol'-le-wood, a town in the county of Down, Ireland, on the east side of Belfast Lough, 5 miles N.E. of Belfast. There is an ancient church, with a fine spire. Pop. 2,400.

HOLLY SPRINGS, a town in the north of Mississippi, United States. It is a rapidly rising place, and there is a large trade in cotton and general merchandise. Pop. 3,500.

HOLMAN, JAMES, hol'-man, generally known as the Blind Traveller, served, in his earlier years, in the royal navy, and took part in the wars against the French. At the age of 25 he lost his sight; but, notwithstanding this melancholy infirmity, he, in 1819, commenced his wanderings by travelling over France, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland, an account of which he published in 1822. He had been made, several years previously, a naval Knight of Windsor. He again set out, in 1822, and embarked for St. Petersburg, intending to travel through the Russian empire, and to enter Mongolia and China, after having visited Eastern Siberia; but when he had arrived at Irkutsk, an order from the czar Alexander commanded his return, and he was conducted as a state prisoner back to the German frontier. When he reached England he published an account of his wanderings, in two volumes. His Russian journey was intended as the commencement of a series of travels and voyages round the world, which he afterwards performed, and which occupied him five years to accomplish. In 1834 he published his work, "Travels Round the World," in four volumes. His last wanderings were in the Danubian provinces, in 1843-44.

Born about 1787; died 1857.

HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL, holms, an American poet and physician, who has earned by his poetical works the title of one of the best lyrical writers of his country. After completing his education at Cambridge, in Massachusetts, he became a doctor of medicine, and visited Europe. Returning to America, he established himself at Boston in 1836, and in 1838 was appointed professor of anatomy and physiology in the college at Dartmouth, and later to Harvard University, the most ancient college in the United States. He has written several valuable medical works, but his fame is due to his poetical effusions, which he has contributed to many of the best American periodicals, and which he has collected under the title of "Holmes's Poetical Works." These have been reprinted in England, and have met with considerable success. He is also the author of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," and "The Professor at the Breakfast Table," a romance entitled "Elsie Venner," &c., &c.

HOLMES, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 396 square miles. Pop. 1,600. The capital is Cerro Gordo.

HOLMES, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 756 square miles. Pop. 27,164, more than half of whom are coloured. The capital is Lexington.

HOLMES, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 405 square miles. Pop. 20,776. Millersburg is the capital.

HOLMFIRTH, a manufacturing village of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles S.W. of Huddersfield. Manf. Woollen cloth. A terrible accident, by the bursting of a reservoir, three miles above the town, occurred on the 5th of February, 1852, causing a terrible destruction of property and the loss of 100 lives.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

Pop. 9,583.

HOLOFERNES, hol-o-fer'-nees, a general in Nabucodonosar's army, who invaded Judæa, and was killed, during his sleep, by Judith. See JUDITH.

Born B.C. 650.

HOLSTEIN, hol'-stine, a province of Prussia, formerly a duchy belonging to Denmark, and a member of the Germanic Confederation. It was annexed to Prussia in 1866. It is bounded W. and S. by the German Ocean and the Elbe, E. by the Baltic, and N. by Schleswig. It has a generally level surface, with low hills towards the E.; the extensive pastures in the S. and W. being secured against the inundations of the ocean by artificial dykes.

Rivers.—The Elbe, Eider, Stor, and Trave. There are numerous lakes, the principal being the Plön or Plönsee.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, and oats; potatoes, hemp, and flax, with some hops and fruit; its principal wealth, however, is in its pastures.

Minerals.—Lime, gypsum, and salt.

Towns.—GLÜCKSTADT (the capital), ALTONA, RENDSBURG, and KIEL.

Area.—3,270 square miles.

Pop.—1,127,149.

HOLT, a county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 2,100 square miles. Pop. 3,287.

HOLWICK, hol'-wik, a township of Yorkshire, 12 miles from Barnard Castle, in the neighbourhood of which is one of the finest cataracts in England, caused by the fall of the river Tees.

HOLY ISLAND, or LINDISFARNE, ho'-ly, jutting out into the German Ocean from the coast of Northumberland, but belonging to Durham, is really a peninsula, although insulated at high water. It is about 10 miles S.E. of Berwick, and may be crossed by horses and carriages, if they avoid the quick-sands, every ebb tide. The surface is a plain, about 9 miles in circumference, one half being sand-hills forming a rabbit-warren, the remainder being fertile. The soil is rich. On the south of the island lies the town, inhabited principally by fishermen, but frequented also for sea-bathing. In a bay on the E. is a small harbour, well-known to seamen for the shelter it affords during an easterly gale; and on the opposite side stand the remains of an ancient castle. There are some curious caves on the west coast. Near the town are the ruins of the famous old abbey of Lindisfarne. The Danes, in 900, destroyed the latter, and the bishopric was transferred to Durham. Pop. about 876, chiefly engaged in lobster and other fisheries.

HOLYHEAD, hol-i-hed', a seaport and parliamentary borough of Wales, situate on a small island of the same name, off the W. coast of the isle of Anglesey, with which it is connected by a long causeway, which may be crossed at low water. It is 24 miles from Bangor. The town consists principally of a long street, and has assembly-rooms, a church, market-place, and a new town-hall, opened in August, 1875. It is now a place of considerable importance, being connected by railway with all the principal cities and towns of England, and having become the great port of communication to the Irish capital, and the rendezvous of the mail-packets. A harbour and pier, 900 feet long, has been constructed, to allow vessels to land or sail at all times of the tide, and a light-house has been built on this. Two other light-houses are erected on the adjacent rocks of N. and S. Stack. The harbour of refuge, enclosing an area of 316 acres, was constructed in 1862. Holyhead is in communication with the Irish coast by a submarine telegraph, which is 75 miles long, and lands at Kingstown. Pop. 8,543.—A station on the London and North Western railway. Lat. of light-house, 53° 20′ N. Lon. 4° 37′ W.

HOLYHEAD ISLAND, on which the above town is situated, is about 7 miles long and 5 wide. It is mostly a barren rock, with some pasture land, and a huge headland on the northern side, with perpendicular precipices, and large caverns. The rock, known as South Stack, is connected with the island by a suspension bridge, over a chasm 90 feet wide.

HOLYROOD. (See EDINBURGH.)

HOLYWELL, ho'-li-wel, an urban sanitary district, old borough, and market-town of Flintshire, near the southern shore of the estuary of the Dee, 15 miles W. of Chester. In its vicinity are lead, copper, and zinc mines. Manf. Galloons, paper, shot, and red lead. Its easy access to the sea, and the vicinity of the Flintshire coal-pits, render it a valuable site. The stream issuing from the remarkable Holy Well of St. Winifred, the most copious spring in Britain, boils up with violence as from a cauldron, and sends forth every minute upwards of 20 tons of the purest water. Advantage is taken of this immense flow of water, by connecting it with machinery. The well was formerly supposed to possess miraculous healing properties, and was much resorted to by pilgrims. This borough unites with Flint, &c., in returning one member to parliament. Pop. 3,091.

HOLZMINDEN, holtz-min'-den, a town of the duchy of Brunswick, Germany, on the right bank of the Weser, 55 miles S.W. of Brunswick, Manf. Flannel and hosiery, iron, and steel. There is a trade in paving stones, iron, and linen. Pop. 3,800.

HOMBERG, WILLIAM, hom'-bairg, a celebrated chemist, who, at first, entered the army, but quitted it to practise the law, which he also abandoned, and applied himself to the study of the sciences, particularly botany, medicine, and chemistry, to improve himself in which he travelled through various countries. In 1682 he settled in France, and abjured the Protestant religion; but being disappointed in his expectations, he went to Rome, and practised physic. He afterwards returned to Paris, where he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and chemist and physician to the duke of Orleans. He discovered the properties of the Bologna stone, and its phosphoric appearance after calcination. Some of his scientific essays are printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of France.

Born 1652; died at Paris, 1715.

HOMBORI, THE, hom-bo'-re, a remarkable range of mountains in Western Africa, about 180 miles S.E. of Timbuctoo. The greatest elevation is not more than 800 feet, but the peaks rise abruptly and present the appearance of towers and fortifications.

HOMBURG, hom'-boorg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hesse-Nassau, at the foot of the Taunus mountains, 9 miles N.W. of Frankfort. It is best known for its mineral waters, which have a great reputation, and very large quantities of which are exported; and until recently for the gambling establishments which have been abolished. Pop. 3,551.

HOMBURG, a town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, on the Little Erbach, 49 miles W. of Spires. There are a Roman Catholic and two Protestant churches. Near the town are the ruins of the old castle of Karlsburg. Pop. 3,200.

HOME, HENRY, home, Lord Kames, a Scotch judge and elegant writer. He entered at the bar in 1723, and was raised to the bench in 1752, and became senior lord of session in Scotland. He wrote "Essays upon several subjects concerning British Antiquities," 1764; "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion," "Historical Law," "The Principles of Equity," "The Elements of Criticism," "The History of Man," and several other works.

Born 1696; died 1782.

HOME, JOHN, a Scottish divine and dramatic author, who, while acting as minister of the kirk, wrote his tragedy of "Douglas," which was represented with the greatest success at Edinburgh. This work, and language, evoked the indignation of the elders of the kirk, and the author was compelled to retire to England, where he obtained a pension from Lord Bute. He afterwards wrote four more tragedies, which, however, did not obtain the popularity of "Douglas," and which are now never heard of in the theatre.

Born 1724; died 1808.

HOME, SIR EVERARD, surgeon and anatomist. He was educated at Westminster School, and afterwards studied anatomy under his brother-in-law, John Hunter. From 1780 to 1784, he served on the medical staff in the West Indies; in 1808 was appointed surgeon to the king, and in 1812 was created a baronet, being the first practising surgeon who received that honour. In 1812 he was appointed surgeon to Chelsea Hospital, and in 1822 was elected president of the College of Surgeons. His "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy" are well-known. It is believed that he appropriated some of Hunter's writings, and destroyed the manuscripts to escape detection.

Born at Hull, 1756; died at Chelsea, 1832.

HOMER, ho'-mer, the most ancient and celebrated of the Greek poets, but of whose birthplace, station in life, and actual existence, in point of fact, the most diverse opinions are held by the learned of modern days. The honour of his birthplace was disputed by seven Greek cities. According to one tradition, he was the natural son of a young orphan girl of Smyrna, who lived on the banks of the Meles, and called her son after it, Melesigenes. It further relates, that Phemius, who kept a school for music and belles-lettres at Smyrna, having fallen in love with his mother, married her and adopted Homer, who, on his death, succeeded him as master of the school. Subsequently, having conceived the idea of the "Iliad," he travelled in order to gather knowledge of men and localities for his great work; but being badly treated by his fellow-countrymen on his return he left Smyrna and established himself at Chios, where he set up a school. Becoming blind in his old age, he was overtaken by poverty, and compelled to earn his bread by wandering from city to city and reciting his verses. Finally, according to this version of his life, he is said to have died in the little isle of Ios, one of the Cyclades. Homer's greatest works are two epic poems. In the "Iliad," which contains twenty-four rhapsodies or chants, are recited the story of Achilles' revenge upon Agamemnon for depriving him of his mistress Briseis; the misfortunes which the Greeks suffered in consequence while besieging Troy, and the death of Hector at the hands of Achilles, who, to avenge the death of his friend Patroclus, killed the Trojan hero. (See HECTOR.) In the "Odyssey," the story of the wanderings and adventures of Ulysses on his homeward journey from Troy to his kingdom of Ithaca is told. The "Batrachornyomachia; or, Battle of the Frogs and Mice," and the "Homeric Hymns," are by some allowed to be the work of this poet, while others consider them spurious. The whole of these works are written in the Ionian dialect. Both the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" have always been considered as the great beginning of all literature, though each shines with a lustre different from the other. In the "Iliad" grandeur of conception, beauty and simplicity of plan, a soaring imagination, rich and sublime images, are the characteristic excellencies. In the "Odyssey," a plan less regular, an imagination less brilliant, are to be discovered; but it nevertheless commands delight by its strong interest and its entrancing style. In addition to these intrinsic beauties, the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" have preserved the theological traditions, the names and origin of nations, and the description and situation of cities and towns. The poems of Homer, according to the most learned critics, were composed anterior to the invention of writing, and were for a long time preserved by memory alone. They are said to have been interpolated and abridged by the rhapsodists, or Homeridæ, who selected from them the most interesting episodes for recital. Pisistratus, or, as some others maintain, his son Hipparchus, was the first person who collected and arranged these poems, which were afterwards revised and divided into twenty-four books each, by the grammarians under the Ptolemies, who thus gave them the form in which we now possess them. Some learned critics—Wolf at their head—have put forth a theory that Homer never existed, and that the poems which have come down to us under his name are only a collected version of fragments which had been composed and sung by various authors, whom he terms Homeridæ, and who formed a species of school. Another set of scholars hold that the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" are not the work of the same author, but that the latter is a very much later production than the former. Again, the derivation of the word Homer has been variously given by different schools of critics; each adopting that which best agrees with its own theory. One, the partisan of common tradition, translates the name by blind; others, by hostage, pretending that Homer was a hostage in a war which was raging between the inhabitants of Smyrna and Colophon; others, finally assert that the word is derived from homereo, "collector;" which would seem to show that we owe these poems to a compiler, who only collected scattered fragments, and united them into an harmonious whole. Those who would seek more complete information on the subject should turn to Thirlwall's "History of Greece," vol. i.; Gladstone's "Homeric Age;" and if they would desire to go still deeper, to the works of Heyne, and the "Lexilogus" of Buttmann; both the latter being German writers. Hobbes, Chapman, Pope, Cowper, Newman, and the Earl of Derby have translated Homer. Pope's version is the best known; but it is more of a paraphrase than a literal translation. Chapman's is the best old translation.

Lived probably between the 9th and 8th centuries B.C.

HOMER, a town of the state of New York, United States, on the right bank of the Tioughnioga, 125 miles W. of Albany. Manf. Woollen cloth, cotton, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 4,000.

HOMPESCH, FERDINAND DE, hom'-pesk, the last grand master of the order of the Knights of Malta, who was invested with that dignity in 1797. Bribed, it is asserted, by the money and promises of the "Directory," he surrendered in 1798 to the French fleet which was conveying Buonaparte and his army to Egypt. He was conducted to Trieste. Subsequently, he protested against the usurpation of the French, and abdicated his sovereignty in favour of the emperor of Russia, Paul I. He wandered about Germany for some years, but finally took refuge in France.

Born at Dusseldorf, 1744; died 1803.

HONAN, ho'-nan, a central province of China, watered by the Hoang-ni and its affluents, and traversed by a range of low hills. The soil is fertile and well cultivated, producing, besides abundance of food supplies, cotton, hemp, and flax. Silk is also cultivated. There are extensive forests in the western part of the province. The capital is KAIFUNG-FOO. Area, 74,320 square miles. Pop. 21,002,604.

HONAWAR, hon-a-war', a seaport in the presidency of Bombay 340 miles S.E. of Bombay, on the Malabar or West coast of the peninsula of Hindostan. It is situated near the mouth of the Sheravatti. The harbour and anchorage are good, but the south-west monsoon makes the navigation dangerous. Pop. 5,191. Lat. 14° 17′ N. Lon. 74° 30′ E.

HONDA, hon'-da, a town of the republic of Colombia, America, on the left bank of the Magdalena, 55 miles from Bogota. Pop. 4,500. Lat. 5° 13′ N. Lon. 74° 50′ W.

HONDSCHOOTE, hond'-shoot', a town of France, department Nord, 10 miles S.E. of Dunkirk. It is an old town. Manf. Linen, leather, oil, and chicory. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,700. The British were defeated by the French near this place in 1793.

HONDURAS, BRITISH, or BELIZE, hon-du'-ras, a British colony on the E. coast of Central America, bounded N. by Yucatan, W. by Vera Raz, E. by the Caribbean Sea, S. by Guatemala. It is of a hot and moist temperature, and the soil is of great fertility. The coast being open to the sea, the easterly breezes, which blow from the bay during nine months of the year, temper the not excessive heat. From June to September heavy rains fall, and this is the most unhealthy season. The chief town is BELIZE.

Rivers.—The river Hondo forms the Yucatan frontier, and the Belize traverses the district from S.W. to N.E., dividing it into two nearly equal parts. To the north of the Belize is the New River, flowing in a nearly parallel course. There are several lakes in the northern part of the colony.

Pro.—All kinds of tropical produce, and, were cultivation better attended to, cotton, coffee, sugar, and indigo might be extensively raised. In the southern districts sarsaparilla is collected.

Zoology.—Panthers, tapirs, ounces, deer, armadilloes, and monkeys. There are many alligators in the lagoons, numerous land and aquatic birds, and fish, turtle, and shellfish are abundant.

Pop.—27,452, chiefly negroes.

Government.—Administered by a governor appointed by the crown.

History.—Honduras was transferred by Spain to Great Britain in 1670, and settled by English from Jamaica; but the possession was afterwards disputed until 1798, since which it has remained a British colony.

HONDURAS, a republic of Central America, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, having Guatemala on the N.W., and Nicaragua on the S.E. It is generally mountainous, being traversed by the Cordilleras. The soil is fertile and well adapted for agriculture, and the climate, though very hot, not unhealthy, except in the swampy districts on the Pacific shore. There are extensive forests.

Rivers.—The Chamelicon, Ulua, Aguan, and Choluteca; the last flowing into the Pacific, the others into the Caribbean Sea.

Pro.—Timber, maize, cotton, sugar, coffee, indigo, tobacco, and other tropical produce.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, lead, copper, antimony, tin, platinum, opals, emeralds, limestone, marble, and coal.

Area.—46,000 square miles.

Pop.—458,000, the great majority being aboriginal Indians. The white inhabitants, chiefly of Spanish origin, are most numerous in the small ports of the Pacific coast, in the tobacco-growing districts, and the town of Santa Rosa.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are seven departments—Comayagua, Tejucigalpa, Choluteca, Santa Barbara, Gracias, Goro, and Olancho. The chief town is Comayagua.

Political Constitution and Government.—The republic, established in 1839, on the dissolution of the Confederation of Central America, is governed under a charter proclaimed in November 1865. It gives the legislative power to a congress of two houses, called the senate and the chamber of deputies. The senate consists of seven members, three of whom are elected annually; and the chamber of deputies of fourteen members, one-half of whom are elected annually. The executive authority rests with a president, elected for four years. The administration is carried on by a council of state, composed of two ministers, appointed by the president, one senator elected by both houses of congress, and the judge of the supreme court.

Commerce.—The exports consist chiefly of mahogany, hides, tobacco, cattle, and indigo, the total value estimated at about 1,000,000 dollars, or £200,000 per annum; while the imports comprise cotton goods, silks, and hardware. The resources of the country are at present wholly undeveloped, and the finances in a state of great disorder. There are no official returns of the value of either the imports or exports, owing partly to the customs at the principal ports being farmed out to individuals, whose interest it is to conceal all facts concerning their revenue. The commercial intercourse is mainly with Great Britain.

Railway.—An inter-oceanic line, 232 miles in length, has been projected, but only about 50 miles on the Atlantic side have been completed, the interest on the capital raised being greatly and, indeed, hopelessly in arrear.

History.—Honduras was discovered by Columbus in 1502, and conquered by the Spaniards 20 years afterwards. In 1815 the territory was increased by the cession on the part of Great Britain of the Bay Islands.

HONDURAS, BAY OF, a large and convenient bay, an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, formed by the coast of the province of Honduras on the S., and that of Yucatan on the W., and divided into several smaller bays, of which that of St. Thomas is the largest. It is well known from the settlements which the British have made in it for the cutting down of mahogany and dyewoods. There are several islands, and the shore is marked by reefs, called cays.

HONE, WILLIAM, hone, a political pamphleteer and compiler of popular antiquities, began life in an attorney's office, at first in London, and subsequently at Chatham. In 1800 he established himself as a bookseller in Lambeth Walk, from which he removed to St. Martin's Churchyard, as the locality was then termed. In 1806 he commenced his singular literary career by issuing an edition of Shaw's "Gardener." An attempt at establishing a savings-bank, as well as a new publishing speculation, followed, both being failures. In 1811 he was appointed by the booksellers their "trade auctioneer," but he had little taste for the business, and while engaged in the above post he was occupied in investigating the abuses in lunatic asylums. He was soon a bankrupt for the second time, and he gained a livelihood by writing for the "Critical Review" and the "British Lady's Magazine." He next opened a small bookseller's shop in Fleet Street, but his ill-fortune still continued: it was twice plundered. In 1815 he was the publisher of the Traveller newspaper, and, soon after, began to publish those bold political pamphlets and satires (mostly illustrated by George Cruikshank), which made him universally known, and led to his being tried for three days in the court of King's Bench. (See ELLENBOROUGH, Lord.) He was acquitted, however, and a large sum of money was collected by subscription for him, with which he established himself once more in business, and once more failed. He then occupied himself with the compilation and publication of those well-known books which will continue to preserve his name. The chief of these were "Ancient Mysteries Described," "The Every-day Book," "The Table Book," and "The Year Book;" his last work being an edition of "Strutt's Sports and Pastimes of the English." Later in life he experienced a remarkable change in his religious opinions, and became sub-editor of the Patriot, a Nonconformist newspaper.

Born at Bath, 1779; died at Tottenham, 1842.

HONESDALE, hones'-dale, a town in the north-east of Pennsylvania, United States, 160 miles N.E. of Harrisburg. It is a busy town, the centre of a coal district, and in communication by railway and canal with New York. Manf. Iron, leather, and glass. Pop. 3,000.

HONFLEUR, haw'-flur, a seaport and fortified town of France, department of Calvados, on the southern shore of the estuary of the Seine, opposite to Havre, from which it is distant 7 miles. It has a good harbour sheltered by a pier and two lighthouses, and has a maritime trade. Manf. Hosiery, hardware, vitriol, and refined sugar. Eggs, butter, and fruits, &c. are exported to England. Pop. 8,400.—This town held out the longest of any in Normandy against Henry V.

HONG KONG, a British island, 9 miles long, and from two to six miles broad, in the estuary of the Chu-Kiang, on the S.E. coast of China, about 100 miles S.E. of Canton, and separated from the mainland by a narrow channel. It is mountainous, and the climate oppressively hot in summer, and cool, dry, and bracing in winter. The import trade is chiefly in English cotton and woollen goods, opium, and metals. The harbour is commodious and safe, and there are extensive docks. It was ceded to Great Britain in 1841. The chief town is VICTORIA, the capital. Pop. 160,500, of whom 115,500 are Chinese. Lat. 22° 16′ N. Lon. 114° 8′ E.

HONITON, hon'-i-ton, a municipal borough and market-town of Devonshire, situate in a fertile vale, 16 miles N.E. of Exeter, on the left bank of the Otter. The church is old, and has a beautiful oak screen, erected in the 15th century. Manf. Principally lace, the Honiton lace being well known throughout Britain. The Vale of Honiton is famous for its butter. Pop. 3,464.—A station on the London and South-Western railway.

HONOLULU, hon-o-loo'-loo', a seaport on the south-western coast of Oahu, one of the Sandwich islands, conveniently situated on the line of traffic. Honolulu is much visited by vessels engaged in trade. There are a Roman Catholic and a Protestant cathedral. Pop. 20,000, of whom the greater part are natives; the foreign element, consisting largely of Americans, numbering about one-tenth. Lat. 21° 18′ N. Lon. 157° 55′ W.

HONORIUS, FLAVIUS, ho-nor'-e-us, emperor of the West, was the second son of Theodosius the Great, and associated in the empire with Arcadius, his brother, in 395. His guardian, Stilicho, was an able minister, and defeated the barbarians, who had invaded the kingdom; but exciting the jealousy of Honorius, was slain. In 409, Alaric the Goth besieged Rome, and ravaged all the country, while Honorius remained indolent at Ravenna.

Born 384; died 423.

HONORIUS I., Pope, succeeded Boniface V. in 625. He governed with zeal and prudence. He was involved in the monoclastic controversy respecting the union of the Divine and human wills in Christ, and the sixth general council denounced the Pope as heretical in 681. Some of his letters are extant.

Died 638.

HONORIUS II. (LAMBERT), of Bologna, succeeded Calixtus II. in 1124, and, at the same time, Thibauld was chosen by another party, under the name of Celestin; but he resigned the chair to his rival.

Died 1130.

HONORIUS III. (CENCIO SAVELLI) was made pope after Innocent III., in 1216. He confirmed the order of Dominicans, and left several works.

Died 1227.

HONORIUS IV. (GIACOMO SAVELLI) ascended the papal chair in 1285. He displayed great zeal for his church, and promoted the crusades.

Died 1287.

HONTH, hont, a county of the northern part of Hungary. It is traversed by ramifications of the Carpathians, and slopes gradually towards the south. It is generally fertile, and is watered by the Ipoly and Gran, tributaries of the Danube. Minerals. Gold, silver, and iron. The capital is IPOLY-SAGH. Pop. 124,000, chiefly Germans and Slavs.

HONTHEIM, JOHANN NICOLAUS VON, hont'-hime, German theologian, received his education in the Jesuit school of his native city, and at Louvain, under Van Espen. He was afterwards a teacher of canon law at Treves for ten years, and was appointed coadjutor of that see in 1748, with the title of bishop in partibus infidelium. He was the author of "Historia Trevirensis Diplomatica" (1750), "Prodromus Historia Trevirensis" (1757), and a work "On the State of the Church and the Legitimate Authority of the Roman Pontiff." This last was published under the pseudonym of "Justinus Febronius," and created a great sensation. It was condemned by Clement XIII., and drew forth a number of replies. Pius VI. demanded from Hontheim a retractation, which was given, but was afterwards modified by a "Commentary," published in Frankfort in 1781. He subsequently, however, made full submission. The opinions expressed in his book, and known by the name of "Febrionism," have been described as an "exaggerated form of Gallicanism with the democratic element of congregationalism superadded."

Born at Treves, 1701; died at Montquinten, in Luxemburg, 1790.

HOOBLI, hoob'-le, a town of Dharwar, and one of the chief cotton marts in the presidency of Bombay. Pop. 36,677. Lat. 15° 20′ N. Lon. 75° 13′ E.

HOOD, ROBIN, an English outlaw and popular hero, of whom very little is known, notwithstanding that he has been made the hero of many old ballads and legends. He is popularly represented as having lived in the reigns of Richard I. and John, a period adopted by Sir Walter Scott in his romance "Ivanhoe," in which Robin Hood figures under the name of Locksley; but recent investigations warrant the belief that the real Robin Hood lived about 150 years later, in the reign of Edward II. The earliest mention of him is in the "Vision of Piers Plowman," which alludes to the "rhymes of Robin Hood and Randolph, Earl of Chester." At the close of the 15th century "Wynkyn de Worde" printed a long poem called the "Lytel Geste of Robyn Hood," which has the appearance of being a series of popular ballads strung together. Robin Hood is always represented as skilled to a marvellous degree in archery and the use of the quarter-staff; accompanied by a band of brave bowmen, with Little John and Friar Tuck as his companions, and Maid Marian as his mistress. Generous in the extreme, and brave to recklessness, Robin Hood is described as robbing the rich and giving to the necessitous, and, in a rough and ready manner, endeavouring to protect the poor from their oppressors. It seems impossible at this date to decide what foundation existed for the numerous stories still extant respecting him. The most that can be said is that there probably was an outlaw of the name, and that he took service under the king for a time, but finally returned to his wild forest life in Sherwood Forest, or the Forest of Barsdale, in Yorkshire. His grave is still pointed out in Kirklees Park.

HOOD, VISCOUNT (SAMUEL HOOD) was the eldest son of the Rev. S. Hood, vicar of Thornecombe, Devonshire. He entered the navy at the age of sixteen, and was made lieutenant in 1746, and post-captain ten years later. In 1759 he commanded the Vestal, and engaged a French 50-gun ship, which he took, after an action that lasted for four hours. He was made commissioner of Portsmouth in 1777, and received a baronetcy in 1778; was afterwards raised to the rank of rear-admiral, and commanded a division in the engagement with the Count de Grasse in 1782; was made a peer of Ireland, with the title of viscount, and in 1793 became commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean fleet, with which he took possession of Toulon, but was shortly after compelled to evacuate it. He then sailed to Corsica, which he annexed to the British crown. He was made a viscount of Great Britain and governor of Greenwich hospital in 1796.

Born at Thornecombe, 1724; died at Bath, 1816.

HOOD, ALEXANDER, Viscount Bridport, younger brother of the above, was second in command on the occasion of Lord Howe's victory in 1794, achieved a victory over the French fleet in 1795, was raised to the rank of baron in 1796, and became Viscount Bridport in 1801.

Born 1727; died 1814.

HOOD, THOMAS, hood, a modern English poet and humourist, the celebrated author of "The Song of the Shirt" and "The Bridge of Sighs," was the son of a bookseller in the Poultry. When about 14 years old he was placed in the office of a city merchant; but his health being delicate, he was soon after sent to Dundee on board a coasting vessel. He remained in Scotland for two years, his chief occupations being reading, fishing, and boating. His health improving, he returned to London, and was apprenticed to his uncle, an engraver. In 1821 the "London Magazine" became the property of some of his friends, and he, having already given signs of the possession of literary talent, was offered the post of sub-editor. Soon afterwards he published his first work,—"Odes and Addresses to Great People;" and, in 1826, he collected his contributions to the "London Magazine," and reissued them in a work called "Whims and Oddities," of which a second and third series were published in the two following years. "The Comic Annual," which he produced for nine years, was commenced in 1829; and while editor of "The Gem," he wrote for it his well-known poem, "Eugene Aram's Dream." In 1831 he published his novel of "Tylney Hall," and in 1835 commenced the publication of "Hood's Own;" but his health failing, he soon after went to reside on the Continent, where he remained for several years. His work "Up the Rhine" was published on his return. Subsequently he became editor of "The New Monthly Magazine;" and on his retirement from this post, he collected his prose and poetry, scattered through many periodicals, and published them under the title of "Whimsicalities." "Hood's Magazine" was started in 1844, and he contributed to its pages up to the time of his death. "The Song of the Shirt" appeared in Punch. After his decease the pension of £100 per annum conferred during his last illness by Sir Robert Peel was transferred to his widow. He was buried in Kensal-green Cemetery, where is a monument to his memory raised by public subscription. In some of his serious poems, especially "Eugene Aram" and the "Haunted House," he displayed an intensity of tragic and imaginative power of a rare order. In his minor works a rich current of genial humour runs; and his pleasant wit, ripe observation, and sound sense have made him an ornament to English literature.

Born in London, 1798; died 1845.

HOOFT, PIETER, hooft, a Dutch historian and poet, to whom Louis XIII. of France gave the order of St. Michael as a reward for his history of Henry IV. His other works are "Poems and Comedies," "The History of the Low Countries from the Abdication of Charles V. to 1598," and a translation of Tacitus into Dutch.

Born at Amsterdam, 1581; died at the Hague, 1647.

HOOGEVEEN, hoog-e-vené, a village of the Netherlands, province Drenthe, 20 miles S. of Assen. Pop. 7,000.

HOOGHLY, or HUGHLI, a town in the province of Bengal, capital of the district of the same name, on the right bank of the Hooghly river, 27 miles N. of Calcutta. There are a government college, where the English and Eastern languages are taught, a fine church built by the Portuguese, and a Hindoo temple visited by large numbers of pilgrims. This place is supposed to have been founded by the Portuguese about 1538. CHINSURAH nearly adjoins it. Pop. 12,000.

HOOGHLY, the district of which the above is the capital, in the presidency of Bengal, bounded N. and W. by Burdwan, S. by the river Roopnarain, E. by the Hooghly river, and W. by Midnapore. The surface is low and level, except the north-west and west, where are some hills. The soil is fertile and well irrigated by tributaries of the Hooghly. The most important crops are rice, sugar-cane, indigo, cotton, hemp, and the mulberry is cultivated for rearing silkworms. Area, 2,080 square miles. Pop. 1,012,768.

HOOGHLY, THE, a river of Bengal, formed by the junction of two western branches of the Ganges, in lat. 23° 25′ N., and lon. 88° 22′ E., and celebrated for having Calcutta on its banks. The entrance to this river, about 15 miles wide, is rendered extremely dangerous and difficult by numerous sandbanks, which are frequently shifting. At Calcutta the river is about a mile wide, and towards the city the spring-tides run up with great violence, advancing at the rate of 15 miles an hour, and frequently overset boats and drive ships from their anchorage. The followers of Brahma consider the Hooghly sacred. Several towns and villages stand on its banks, and few rivers can boast of a more extensive commerce than is carried along its stream. The length of the river is about 125 miles, of the estuary 35 miles more.

HOOGLEDE, hoog'-le-de, a village of Belgium, province of West Flanders, 17 miles S.W. of Bruges. Manf. Hosiery, rope, and oil. There are breweries and distilleries. Pop. 4,300.

HOOGSTRAETEN, hoog-strate'-en, a village of Belgium, province of Antwerp, on the Mercke, 20 miles N.E. of Antwerp. There is a very fine church famous for its painted glass. Manf. cloth, leather, earthenware, and bricks. Hoogstraeten was a place of some importance as early as the 12th century, afterwards became the capital of a county and of a duchy. Pop. 2,500.

HOOK, THEODORE EDWARD, a popular English novelist. He was the son of a musical composer, and was remarkable in his youth for his beauty, his sweet voice, and his quick intelligence. He was for a short time at Harrow school, but when quite young came to London, where he quickly began to write operas, farces, and published a novel—"The Man of Sorrow"—under an assumed name. His light and joyous temperament, great conversational powers, and marvellous talent as an "Improvisatore," made him the favourite of the most fashionable society; and it was while he was leading this life of exuberant gaiety, that he played off his notorious "hoaxes," one of which, "the Berners Street hoax," made a great sensation at the time. His social qualities attracted the notice, and procured for him the patronage, of the prince-regent, who caused him, in 1813, to be appointed accountant-general and treasurer to the Mauritius, he being then only twenty-five years of age. But in March, 1818, he was arrested on a serious charge, a deficiency of 37,000 dollars having been discovered in the colonial treasury chest, which it was afterwards discovered was due to the dishonesty of a deputy who committed suicide. Hook was brought to England a prisoner, the law officers of the crown reporting that he was only liable to a prosecution for debt; but a long and harassing course of legal proceedings was the result. In the year 1830, he became, through the instrumentality of Sir Walter Scott, editor of the "John Bull," on its establishment. In this position he distinguished himself by his powerful writing against Queen Caroline, her supporters, and the whole of the Whig party. So successful was this Tory newspaper, that Hook, for a long period, derived from it an income of £2,000 per annum. The Whig party, however, would not allow the law proceedings against him to drop, and in 1823 he was arrested, and remained in custody till May, 1825, when he was permitted to go at large, but was informed that the crown could not consent to forego its debt. Although his character has been cleared of the charge of dishonesty, great carelessness was clearly proved against him; it being shown, among other acts of culpable neglect, that he was in the habit of leaving the keys of the treasure-chest with his subordinates, while he was away on parties of pleasure. Between the years 1824 and 1836 he wrote about thirty volumes of novels, which were very successful, and which yielded him very large sums. His novel of "Gilbert Gurney" contains an interesting autobiographical sketch of himself.

Born in London, 1788; died at Fulham, 1841.

HOOK, REV. WALTER FARQUHAR, D.D., ecclesiastical historian, the son of the Rev. James Hook, dean of Worcester, was educated at Christchurch, Oxford. From 1837 to 1859 he held the appointment of vicar of Leeds, where he was actively engaged in church and school extension, and is said to have promoted the erection of twenty churches, and schoolrooms to accommodate more than 10,000 children. In 1859 he was made dean of Chichester. He was a voluminous writer, and amongst his works are an "Ecclesiastical Biography, containing the Lives of Ancient Fathers and Modern Divines," in 8 volumes; "A Church Dictionary," which has passed through eight editions; "Sermons suggested by the Miracles of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;" "On the Means of rendering more effectual the Education of the People;" and "Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury." Ten volumes of these Lives were published before his death, the eleventh appeared shortly after that event. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1862.

Born 1798; died 1875.

HOOKE, ROBERT, hook, a celebrated mathematician and natural philosopher, who, in his youth evincing a taste for drawing, was placed under Sir Peter Lely; but he soon abandoned this pursuit, and was taken by Dr. Busby into his house; after which he went to Christchurch, Oxford. He worked with Dr. Willis in his chemical operations, and became assistant to Mr. Boyle. He was one of the first fellows of the Royal Society, the repository of which was intrusted to his care. In 1664 he was made professor of mechanics to that learned body, and in the following year elected Gresham professor of geometry. After the fire of London, he produced a plan for rebuilding the city, which procured him an appointment as one of the city surveyors; but his design was not adopted. In 1668, he had a dispute with Hevelius respecting telescopic sights, which he conducted with great asperity. In 1671, he attacked Sir Isaac Newton's theory of light and colours, and afterwards pretended that the discovery made by that great man concerning the force and action of gravity was originally made by himself. In 1691, Archbishop Tillotson created him M.D. In 1665, he wrote a book called "Micrographia, or Philosophical Descriptions of Minute Bodies made by Magnifying-glasses;" his posthumous works were published after his death. He was a man of great mechanical genius, and the sciences are indebted to him for several valuable instruments and improvements.

Born at Freshwater, Isle of Wight, 1635; died in London, 1703.

HOOKE, NATHANIEL, Irish writer and historian. He was a Roman Catholic, and when Mr. Pope lay on his deathbed, Hooke introduced a priest to him, which gave great offence to Bolingbroke. He wrote the duchess of Marlborough's account of her conduct, for which he received £5,000; but his best work is a Roman History in 4 vols.

Born 1690; died 1763.

HOOKER, RICHARD, hook'-er, a celebrated English divine. He received his education at Exeter grammar-school, whence he was sent by his relation, Bishop Jewell, to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he was made bible-clerk, and in 1577 chosen fellow. In 1581 he took orders, and in 1584 was presented to the rectory of Drayton-Beauchamp, in Buckinghamshire, where he was discovered leading a life of poverty by the son of the archbishop of York, who had formerly been his pupil. The young man represented his case to his father, through whose influence he was appointed master of the Temple in 1585. But this place did not suit Hooker, who was best fitted for a country retirement; he therefore applied to archbishop Whitgift for a removal to "some quiet parsonage," and he was accordingly presented to the rectory of Boscum, Wiltshire, where he wrote part of his "Ecclesiastical Polity." In 1595 the queen presented him to the rectory of Bishop's Bourne, where he finished his great work. Pope Clement VIII. said of the "Ecclesiastical Polity," "There are in it such seeds of eternity, as will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning." He wrote many tracts and sermons in addition to his great work, and he is regarded as one of the most profound, learned, and pious divines of the English church. He was married to a woman of a shrewish temper, and experienced great matrimonial discomfort, which is frequently referred to by contemporary writers.

Born at Heavitree, near Exeter, 1553; died 1600.

HOOKER, SIR WILLIAM JACKSON, a distinguished English botanist, and, till his death, director of the Royal Gardens at Kew. He abandoned the pursuit of commerce for that of botany, and, in his youth, travelled in Iceland, for the purpose of becoming acquainted with its natural history. Unfortunately, he lost his collection of specimens obtained in that country, but, notwithstanding, published, in 1811, an account of the botany of that island, under the title of "A Tour in Iceland." This was followed, in 1812, by "A Monograph on the British Jungermannia; and, in 1818, he produced a continuation of Curtis's "Flora Londinensis." The "Flora Scotica," "Exotic Flora," a continuation of Curtis's "Botanical Magazine," and the "Botanical Miscellany," were brought out by him between the years 1823 and 1833. In 1837 he completed, in conjunction with Dr. Greville, the "Icones Filicum," in which a complete catalogue of ferns was given, with figures. A complete description of British plants, under the title of "British Flora," was issued under his direction. He also edited the "Journal of Botany," assisted in the management of "The Annals and Magazine of Natural History," and filled the chair of professor of botany in the university of Glasgow; but resigned this to assume the direction of the Royal Gardens at Kew, which, under his control, rapidly became the first establishment of its kind in the world. He was among the foremost professors of systematic botany of the present century. In 1836 he was knighted for his eminent scientific attainments; he was also one of the vice-presidents of the Linnæan Society, an honorary D.C.L. of the university of Oxford, and a knight of the Legion of Honour.

Born at Norwich, 1785; died 1865.

HOOKER, JOSEPH DALTON, son of the above, a living English botanist, who was educated for the pursuit of medicine, which he followed for many years; but, on the fitting out of Sir James Ross's expedition to the Antarctic Ocean, in 1839, he was appointed assistant-surgeon to the ship Erebus, to which post were added the duties of observing and collecting the botanical specimens of the country to which the expedition was despatched. On his return he published "Flora Antarctica." In 1847 he set out on a botanical expedition to the Himalayas, during which he discovered many new and valuable plants, although his travels had been conducted under many disadvantages, he having been, at one time, prisoner in a district of the Sikkim Himalaya. In 1854 he produced the fruits of his long travels, in his "Himalayan Journals," besides which he was the means of introducing several valuable varieties of rhododendrons into England. Before his travels he was a professor in the Museum of Economic Geology, to the Transactions of which institution he has contributed a most valuable and interesting paper on the Vegetation of the Carboniferous Period, as compared with that of the present day. In 1874 he published a work on the Flora of British India; made an expedition to Morocco in 1871, ascended the Great Atlas, and returned with a valuable collection of plants. He was appointed assistant-director at Kew Gardens in 1855, and succeeded his father as director in 1865. He was president of the British Association in 1868; was made Companion of the Bath in 1869, and was elected president of the Royal Society in 1873. He is also one of the examiners of candidates for the East India Medical Service. In addition to the works mentioned above, Mr. Hooker is the author of a valuable "Student's Flora of the British Islands," and other valuable botanical works.

Born at Glasgow, 1816.

HOOLE, JOHN, hool, an ingenious writer, was the son of a watchmaker, who was a very able mechanic, and director, for many years, of the machinery at Covent-Garden theatre. At the age of 17 he became a clerk in the India House, but devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits, particularly the study of the Italian language, of which he acquired considerable knowledge, as appears by his excellent translations, into English, of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso" and Tasso's "Jerusalem." He also published two volumes of the Dramas of Metastasio, and was the author of three tragedies—viz., "Cyrus," acted at Covent Garden in 1768; "Timanthes," performed the year following; and "Cleonice," in 1775.

Born in London, 1727; died 1803.

HOOPER, JOHN, an English bishop and martyr of the sixteenth century, was born in Somersetshire and studied at Oxford. Having become a convert to protestantism about 1540 he visited the continent, but returned to England on the accession of Edward VI. Three years later he was made bishop of Gloucester, and received the bishopric of Worcester in 1552. He was committed to the Fleet prison as a heretic in the commencement of Queen Mary's reign, and after an imprisonment of eighteen months was burned at Gloucester. He published numerous sermons and controversial works.

Born 1495; died 1555.

HOORN, hoorn, a fortified seaport of the Netherlands, province of Holland, on a small bay of the Zuyder Zee, 20 miles N.E. of Amsterdam. It has a naval college and a commodious harbour. There are four Protestant churches and one Roman Catholic church. Manf. Woollen cloths and carpets; shipbuilding also is carried on to a considerable extent, and there are large markets for butter and cheese, 5,000,000 pounds of the latter being annually disposed of. Pop. 10,000.

HOORN, or HORN, PHILIP DE MONTMORENCY, NIVELLE, COUNT VON, Flemish general and statesman. He was one of the wealthiest and most influential of the nobility, and received high honours from the emperor, Charles V. and Philip II., but he afterwards united with the Prince of Orange and Count Egmont in resisting Philip. Falling into the power of the duke of Alva, Horn and Egmont were executed in the great square at Brussels, having been convicted by the tribunal known as the Council of Blood, of treason and rebellion. (See ALVA and EGMONT.)

HOOPEH, or HUPEH, a province of China traversed by the Yellow River. The capital is WOO-CHANG-FOO. Pop. 33,365,000.

HOOSICK, hoo'-sik, a township of New York, United States, 24 miles N.E. of Albany. Manf. Cotton. Pop. 3,800.

HOPE, THOMAS, hope, a liberal art patron, and writer on art, was a descendant of the rich banking family of the Hopes of Amsterdam. An enthusiastic admiration for architecture led him, at the age of 18, to travel through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Sicily, France, Germany, and Spain, in search of the greatest examples of the art extant. On his return to England, he commenced applying the principles of which he had made himself master abroad, by extending and enlarging his residence in Duchess Street, Portland Place, which, when finished, he stored with classical vases and statues. In 1820 he issued his splendid work entitled "Household Furniture," which, in 60 folio plates, depicted the magnificent upholstery and decorations of his house. His "Costume of the Ancients" had appeared in 1809; and this work, together with its successor, "Modern Costume," as well as many valuable contributions to fine art periodicals, greatly tended to improve English taste in matters artistic. The celebrated work "Anastasius; or, the Memoirs of a Modern Greek," was published by him in 1819, and as it was issued anonymously, Lord Byron was long held to be the only person capable of having been its author. Two other works, both published after his death, came from his pen,—one "On the Origin and Prospects of Man," and the other "An Historical Essay on Architecture." Although a constant patron of the arts, and the first to discern and foster the genius of Thorwaldsen, he became engaged in a dispute with Dubois, a French artist, who, to revenge himself upon him, painted the portraits of Mrs. and Mr. Hope, and exhibited them under the title of "Beauty and the Beast;" but the exhibition was terminated in a sudden manner, by Mr. Hope's brother destroying the canvas with his stick.

HOPE, a town of British Columbia, North America, on the left bank of the Fraser river. It is beautifully situated.

HOPEWELL HEAD, a cape of Labrador, which projects into Hudson's Bay, British America. Lat. 57° 10′ N. Lon. 78° W.

HÔPITAL, MICHEL DE L', lop'-e-tal, studied law at Toulouse, became known as an advocate in the parliament in Paris, and filled various offices previous to his appointment as chancellor of Paris in 1560, in the minority of Francis II. His memory is especially worthy of perpetuation from his endeavours to put an end to the civil strife which then filled the country. He resolutely and successfully opposed the attempt of the Cardinal de Lorraine to introduce the inquisition; obtained from the states-general the abolition of arbitrary taxes, and an ordonnance regulating the feudal authority of the nobles, and correcting the abuses of the judicial system. Ha also laboured to secure various benefits for the Huguenots, in which he was partially successful; ultimately, however, he was overborne by the faction of the Guises, and went into retirement, where the news of the massacre of St. Bartholomew broke his heart.

Born in Auvergne, 1505; died 1573.

HOPKINS, hop'-kins, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 474 square miles. Pop. 19,122. The capital is Madisonville.

HOPKINS, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 15,461. The capital is Sulphur Springs.

HOPKINS, CHARLES, an English poet and classical translator, who, in 1694 published some epistolary poems and translations, and the year following produced a tragedy, called "Pyrrhus, King of Egypt." He translated Ovid's "Tristia" and "Art of Love," and was greatly esteemed by Dryden and other poets.

Born at Exeter, 1663; died 1699.

HOPKINS, MATTHEW, known as "the witch-finder." In 1647 he published "The Discovery of Witches," which excited a panic, and was the means of bringing about a hundred poor creatures in the eastern counties to the stake.
Lived in the 17th century.

HOPKINS, STEPHEN, American statesman. He was governor of Rhode Island, and in 1765 published "Grievances of the American Colonies." In 1776 he signed the declaration of independence.
Born 1707; died 1785.

HOPKINS, SAMUEL, D.D., an American Presbyterian minister, known for his simplicity, industry, earnestness, and peculiar theology. The doctrine known as "Hopkinsian," held extensively amongst some of the Calvinistic bodies of America, originated with him. The "Hopkinsians" entirely reject the doctrine of imputation, both of Adam's sin and of the righteousness of Christ; all true virtue and holiness is regarded by them as consisting in disinterested benevolence; and all sin as being essentially selfishness. On other points they are mostly orthodox in an extreme Calvinistic sense. Mr. Hopkins graduated at Yale College, studied with Jonathan Edwards, and in 1743 settled as pastor at Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He removed to Newport in 1769. His works include a life of Jonathan Edwards, and a treatise on the Millennium, besides a system of theology. He is understood to be the hero of Mrs. Beecher Stowe's "Minister's Wooing."
Born at Waterbury, Connecticut, 1721; died at Newport, 1803.

HOPKINSVILLE, a town of Kentucky, United States, on Little River. It is well built, has eight churches, and a large state lunatic asylum. Manf. Tobacco and carriages. Pop. 3,300.

HOPPNER, JOHN, R.A., hop'-ner, one of the first Royal Academicians, and a fashionable portrait-painter in his day. In his early years he was chorister of the Chapel Royal, but afterwards became a student of the Royal Academy, and attracting the notice of the prince of Wales, he painted a considerable number of royal and fashionable portraits, and divided the favour of the highest patrons of art with Lawrence and Opie. He also excelled in landscape-painting.
Born in London, 1759; died 1810.

HOR, hor, a mountain of Arabia Petræa, between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, now known as Jebel Haroun (Mount of Aaron). It constitutes a part of Mount Seer, and its form is that of a steep and irregularly-shaped cone, with three peaks. In the highest of these is a grotto, the supposed tomb of Aaron.

HORACE, or HORATIUS, QUINTUS FLACCUS, ho-ra'-she-us, an elegant Roman poet and satirist. His father was a freedman; but though poor, he gave his son a good education, placing him first under the best masters at Rome, and then sending him to Athens, that he might study philosophy. Here he was patronised by Brutus, who took him into his army, and made him a tribune; but he had more wit than courage, and at the battle of Philippi he threw away his shield and fled. Being reduced to want, Virgil became his patron, and recommended him to Mæcenas, by whom he was introduced to Augustus, who offered him considerable advancement, which he declined, preferring a private life to the honours of the court. He was greatly esteemed by the highest people in Rome, particularly Mæcenas and Pollio. In the latter part of his life he retired to the country, where he indulged in a philosophical ease, which he has admirably described in his "Odes." These have been translated into every European language, and some of the most eminent poets have experienced a peculiar delight in producing revisions of these famous and charming productions.
Born at Venusia, or Venusium, 65 B.C.; died 8 B.C.

HORATII, ho-ra'-she-i, the name of three brave Roman brothers, who fought against the three Curiatii of Alba, 667 B.C. Two of them were slain, but the third, by adding artifice to his courage, slew all his antagonists. On his return to Rome, he met his sister, who had been betrothed to one of the Curiatii, and on her reproaching him for what he had done, he slew her also. His eminent services, however, were considered an extenuation of his crime, and he was pardoned.

HORATIUS COCLES. (See COCLES.)

HORB, horb, a town of Wurtemberg, circle of the Black Forest, on the left bank of the Neckar, 31 miles S.W. of Stuttgart. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, and brushes. Pop. 2,800.

HORBURY, hor'-ber-e, an urban district, West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles S.W. of Wakefield. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 5,050.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

HORCAJO DE SANTIAGO, hor-ka-ho', a town of Spain, in the province of Cuenca, 45 miles S.W. of the town of that name. It is well built, and has a handsome parish church with a beautiful tower. Manf. Linen. There is an annual fair. Pop. 2,800.

HORDE, hor'-dai, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, on the Emsche, 33 miles S. of Munster. There are productive coal mines in the vicinity. Manf. Nails. Pop. 13,000.

HOREB, hor'-eb, a mountain of Arabia Petræa, from which rise the twin summits of Mounts St. Catherine and Sinai. At the foot of the mountain is an ancient monastery, occupied by Greek monks. The height of the peaks is about 8,590 feet.

HORITZ, ho-riteh', a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the right bank of the Bishitz. There is a castle. Cotton printing is carried on, and there is a trade in cattle. Pop. 3,200.

HORN, CAPE. (See CAPE HORN.)

HORN-AFVAN, horn-af'-van, a lake of Sweden, falling by the river Skelleftea into the Gulf of Bothnia. It is 50 miles long and 10 broad. Lat. 66° N. Lon. between 16° and 18° E.

HORNACHOS, horn-a-kos', a town of Spain, province of Badajoz, and 46 miles S.E. of the town of that name. On a height above the town are an old castle and monastery. Manf. Baize, woollens, linen, and cork. Pop. 2,600.

HORNBURG, horn'-berg, a walled town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the right bank of the Ilse, 47 miles S.W. of Magdeburg. Manf. Lacquer ware. There is a large trade in hops. Pop. 2,500.

HORNCASTLE, horn'-kas-el, a market-town of Lincolnshire, on the Bane, 20 miles E. of Lincoln. It contains a library, various schools, and union workhouse. There is also an ancient church, portions of which date from the time of Henry VII. Tanning is carried on, and there is a trade in corn and wool. A horse fair, which takes place in August, lasts above a week. Pop. 4,856.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

HORNE, GEORGE, horn, bishop of Norwich, and author of the celebrated "Commentary on the Book of Psalms," received his education at Maidstone school, whence he was elected to a scholarship of University College, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. He was afterwards chosen fellow of Magdalen College, and applied himself with great diligence to sacred literature, particularly the study of the Hebrew language. In 1753 he entered into orders, and soon became distinguished as an excellent preacher. He appeared also as an acute writer, particularly in controversy, defending the principles of Hutchinson with singular dexterity. In 1768 he was chosen president of his college, on which he took his degree of D.D., and was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king. His "Commentary on the Psalms" was produced in 1776.

Born at Otham, Kent, 1730; died at Bath, 1792.

HORNE, Rev. Thomas Hartwell, an eminent biblical writer, was educated at Christ's Hospital, and was for some time a barrister's clerk. He was ordained by the bishop of London, without having taken a degree at a university, in consequence of the high estimation in which that prelate held his "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Scriptures." After having been presented to the rectory of two united parishes in the city of London, he published a new and enlarged edition of the above popular work; besides which he produced "A Compendious Introduction to the Study of the Bible," "A Manual of Biblical Biography," "A Manual of Parochial Psalmody," and many other theological works. Subsequently to his ordination he received the degree of B.D. from Cambridge University, and that of D.D. from two American colleges. He also became prebendary of St. Paul's.

Born 1780; died 1862.

HORNE, Richard Hengist, English author. Was at first sent to Sandhurst for the purpose of being educated for the military service of the East-India Company, but left that service to enter, in 1826, the Mexican navy, as midshipman, while that republic was at war with Spain. On the termination of the war, he went to London, and commenced writing extensively for periodical publications. In 1827, he produced "The Death of Marlowe," and "Cosmo de' Medici," two dramas written upon the Elizabethan model; these being followed by "The Death Fetch," and "Gregory the Seventh;" to which latter play was appended a critical essay on tragic influence. He appeared to become greatly disappointed in the expectations he had formed on commencing his literary career; for, in 1841, he published a singular pamphlet, called "An Exposition of the False Medium excluding Men of Genius from the Public." His plays were not successful either on the stage or with the reading public. In 1841, he wrote a "Life of Napoleon." In 1843, he produced an epic poem, thus singularly announced:—"Orion, an Epic Poem. Price One Farthing," which was generally supposed to be a sarcastic mode of expressing what he thought the public appreciation of such works. Its success was very great, however, first at one farthing, next at a penny, and afterwards at half a crown and five shillings. "A new Spirit of the Age" was published in 1844; "Ballad Romances" in 1846; and "Judas Iscariot," a miracle play, with Poems, in 1848. In addition to these, he wrote extensively for the periodicals and reviews of the time. In 1852, he, with Mr. Howitt and others, emigrated to Australia; where, after undergoing many privations as a gold digger, he became chief of mounted police, and afterwards a gold commissioner; a narrative of his adventures having been contributed, at various times, to the pages of "Household Words." He returned to England, and resumed his literary avocation.

Born about 1807.

HORNE TOOKE. (See Tooke.)

HORNECK, Anthony, theological writer, studied at Heidelberg, and afterwards at Oxford. He was ordained in the English church, and having held various preferments, took the dignity of D.D. at Cambridge in 1681, and afterwards became chaplain to William and Mary. He was a canon of Exeter and Wells, and for many years chaplain of the Savoy, in the Strand. He wrote many works which obtained great popularity.

Born at Bacharach, in Germany, 1641; died in London, 1696.

HORNER, Francis, hor'-ner, an English politician, writer on political economy, and one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Review." After having received his education at the High School and university of Edinburgh, he embraced the profession of the law, intending to practise at the Scottish bar. In 1802, he went to London, to seek employment in the English courts, and became acquainted with Sir James Mackintosh, Sir Samuel Romilly, and other leading Whigs. After having sat as commissioner at the board of the East-India Company, he was, in 1806, returned to parliament for St. Ives, and gradually assumed importance in his new career. His first great speech was made in 1810, on the subject of the alleged depreciation of bank notes; he was appointed one of the members of the Bullion Committee, his influence in the House of Commons continuing to increase. In 1814, he went abroad, and travelled in Switzerland and the north of Italy. His last speech was in favour of the claims of the Catholics, in 1816. A pulmonary disease compelled him, in the same year, to visit the south of Europe, where he died.

Born in Edinburgh, 1778; died 1817.

HORSLEY, JOHN, a learned antiquary, who was educated first at Newcastle and afterwards in Scotland, where he took his degree of M.A. He became pastor of a dissenting congregation in his native country. He is the author of a work entitled "Britannia Romana," folio, which gives a copious and exact account of the remains of the Romans in Britain.

Born 1685; died 1732.

HORSLEY, JOHN CALCOTT, an English painter, who, from his earliest youth, evinced a talent for the fine arts. He gained a prize of £200 for his cartoon of "St. Augustine Preaching," in 1843. He afterwards painted two frescoes for the House of Lords, "The Spirit of Religion" and "Eve surprised." In 1855 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy.

Born in London, 1817.

HORSLEY, SAMUEL, English bishop, was educated at Westminster School and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. After entering into holy orders in 1759, he became rector of Newington, on the resignation of his father; in 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, of which body he was made secretary in 1773. Soon after his appointment as archdeacon of St. Alban's, in 1781, he entered into a theological controversy with Dr. Joseph Priestly, against whom he combated the doctrines of materialism and Unitarianism. In 1788 he was ordained bishop of St. David's, and on taking his seat in parliament, he displayed great political capacity, strongly supporting the measures of Mr. Pitt; for which services he was made, successively, bishop of Rochester and of St. Asaph. He published a large number of theological works, chiefly controversial, but one of them, the "Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestly," was held to be the exponent of a sound and orthodox theology.

Born 1733; died 1806.

HORTEN, hor'-ten, a town of Aggerhuus, Norway, on the west side of the Gulf of Christiania, opposite Moss, 32 miles from Christiania. This is one of the chief stations of the Norwegian fleet, and being a principal naval port, possesses an arsenal and large building-yards. The harbour is good and well-sheltered. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 59° 34′ N. Lon. 10° 45′ E.

HORTENSE, EUGÉNIE DE BEAUHARNAIS, hor'-tense, Queen of Holland, and mother of the emperor Napoleon III., was daughter of Alexander, Viscount de Beauharnais, and Josephine Tascher de la Pagerie, afterwards first wife of Napoleon I., and Empress of France. On the marriage of her mother to Bonaparte, she became, by her beauty, wit, and accomplishments, the ornament of the consular and imperial courts. She was espoused, though unwillingly, in 1802, to Louis Bonaparte, but the marriage afforded little happiness to either party. Becoming a queen by the elevation of Louis Bonaparte to the throne of Holland in 1806, she displayed little affection for her husband's kingdom, and lived in it only when she was compelled to do so. After the abdication of Louis, in 1810, she obtained a divorce from him, and took up her residence in Paris, where, still retaining her title of queen, she became the centre of a most distinguished and fashionable circle. She remained in Paris after the first return of the Bourbons, and was accused of assisting Napoleon to re-enter France, and compelled to depart from the capital in 1815. After having wandered about Germany and Switzerland for some time, she retired, in 1817, under the title of the duchess of St. Leu, to the château of Arenaberg, in the canton of Thurgovia, on the borders of Lake Constance. She had by her marriage with King Louis, three children: Napoleon-Louis-Charles, born in 1802; Napoleon-Louis, born in 1804; Charles-Louis-Napoleon, born in 1808. The first died young, the second perished in the unfortunate expedition to Forli in 1831, the third rose to be Emperor of the French. She possessed considerable talent, and was the authoress of the popular song, adopted as the national song of France under the second empire, "Partant pour la Syrie."

Born at Paris, 1783; died 1837.

HORTENSIUS, QUINTUS, hor-ten'-she-us, a Roman orator, who pleaded his first cause, with great applause, at the age of 19, B.C. 94. He became successively military tribune, prætor, and consul.

Born 114 B.C.; died 50 B.C.

HORTENSIA, daughter of the above, who inherited his eloquence. When the Roman women were required to render an oath on account of their property, she pleaded the cause of her sex with such force, that the decree was annulled.

HORUS, hor'-us, in Egyptian Or, an Egyptian god, son of Osiris and Isis, who was secretly brought up among the lagunes of Bouto. When he reached manhood, he attacked his enemy Typhon, the god of darkness, and killed him. He afterwards travelled through Egypt, introducing everywhere civilization and the arts. His career greatly resembles the Apollo of the Greeks.

HOSMER, HARRIET, hos'-mer, American sculptor, the daughter of a physician, who instructed her in anatomy, which she afterwards further studied at the medical college at St. Louis. She exhibited such talent as a sculptor that she, in 1851, went to Rome, and became a pupil of John Gibson. She has produced a large number of works of high excellence.
Born at Watertown, Massachusetts, 1831.

HOSPITAL, GUILLAUME FRANÇOIS ANTOINE, marquis de l', hose'-pe-tal', a French mathematician. He evinced, at an early age, a genius for mathematical study, and, when only 15, solved a difficult problem of Pascal's. He served for some time in the army, which he left on account of a defect in his sight. In 1693 he was admitted an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and published a work on Newton's Fluxions, being the first Frenchman who wrote on that subject. He afterwards published another mathematical work.
Born at Paris, 1661; died 1704.

HOST, JENS KRAGH, host, Danish historian. He wrote several important works illustrative of the modern history of his country, a Swedish Grammar and Dictionary, and Lectures on Swedish Literature.
Born 1772; died 1844.

HOUSSA, or HAOUSSA, hous'-sa, an extensive country of Central Africa, in the Soudan. It comprises seven states, forming a portion of the kingdom of Sokoto. (See AFRICA.)

HOUSSAYE, ARSÈNE, hous'-sai, a modern French littérateur, who went to Paris early in life, to push his fortunes as an author. He began his career in 1836, with the publication of two romances. His essays in art criticism, and especially his writings illustrative of the biographical history of the regency, attracted the notice of the reading public towards him. During the revolution of 1848, he presented himself as a candidate for the suffrages of his native province, but was beaten by M. Odillon Barrot. Through the influence of Mdlle. Rachel, he was made manager of the Comédie Française in 1849, and succeeded in restoring that theatre to a most prosperous condition, producing more than a hundred new works of the best French playwrights. After the coup d'état of 1851, he wrote the cantata for Mdlle. Rachel, entitled "L'Empire c'est la paix." On the death of his wife, in 1856, he resigned the appointment. His literary performances include romances, plays, poems, essays, and criticisms; many of them displaying his strong predilection for the age of Louis XV., while all are characterized by refinement, grace, and lively wit.

Born at Bruyères, near Laon, 1815.

HOUSTON, hoos'-ton, a city of Texas, United States, capital of Harris county, and the chief manufacturing place in the state, on the Buffalo Bayou, 45 miles from its mouth in Galveston Bay. Manf. HOUSTON, a new county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 4,295. The capital is Erin.

HOUSTON, SAMUEL, an American general, who began life in a merchant's office, but, spurred by a love of adventure, went to reside among the Indians, with whom he stayed five years. Returning to his native state, he founded a school on the borders of the prairie for the children of the red men. In the war against the English in 1813, he served with much distinction under General Jackson, and was severely wounded at the Horse-shoe Falls. Subsequently General Jackson employed him to negotiate a treaty with his former hosts, the Red Indians. After having brought this mission to a successful termination, he resolved to proceed to Nashville to study the law; and soon afterwards he obtained considerable practice by his great abilities in his new profession. In 1821 he was appointed major-general of the militia of the state of Tennessee. On the breaking out of war with Mexico, he was named general-in-chief, and at the battle of Saint Jacinto, he, with 700 men, took or killed the 1,800 soldiers of Santa Anna, who was himself among the prisoners. The inhabitants of Texas, out of admiration for his bravery, appointed him president of the new republic; but on the incorporation of Texas with the other states of the Union, he became a member of Congress.

Born at Lexington, Virginia, 1793; died 1862.

HOVE, hove, a town of Sussex, on the South Coast railway, 1 mile from Brighton. Pop. 20,789.

Lived towards the end of the 12th century.

HOWARD, how'-ard, a noble family of England, members of which have been distinguished since the 13th century. The principal branch has held the dukedom of Norfolk since the middle of the 15th century. The holders of several other peerages are descended from this famous family. (See NORFOLK, SURREY.)

HOWARD, JOHN, created Duke of Norfolk and Earl Marshal, 1483. In the following year he was appointed Lord Admiral of England. He supported Richard III., and was killed at Bosworth.

HOWARD, THOMAS, son of the above. On the accession of Henry VII. he was attainted and imprisoned for three years in the Tower, but was afterwards restored to his honours; he defeated the Scotch at the battle of Flodden.

Died 1513.

HOWARD, THOMAS, grandson of the preceding, was beheaded for conspiring to dethrone Queen Elizabeth and marry Mary Queen of Scots.

Died 1572.

HOWARD, EDWARD, a naval commander, who entered early the maritime service, and, about 1494, was knighted. In 1512 he was sent as lord high admiral of England with a large fleet against France, the coasts of which he ravaged. He also defeated the enemy's fleet off Brest, but, the year following, he was slain in boarding the French admiral's ship, and his body thrown into the sea.

HOWARD, CHARLES, Lord Howard of Effingham, lord high admiral of England, and commander, in 1588, of the fleet which destroyed the invincible armada. In 1596, he, with the earl of Essex, burnt a second Spanish fleet in the harbour of Cadiz, for which he was created Earl of Nottingham. When the earl of Essex made his attempt at rebellion, he was appointed to command the army which acted against and defeated him, under the title of lieutenant-general of England. After Queen Elizabeth's death, he still continued to enjoy the most distinguished posts under her successor, James I., discharging every duty with a singular ability and honourable zeal.

Born 1536; died 1624.

HOWARD, HENRY, earl of Surrey. (See SURREY.)

HOWARD, CATHERINE, fifth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of Edmund Howard, third son of the second duke of Norfolk. She was maried, in 1540, to the king; but, two years afterwards, he sent her to the scaffold, under pretext of unfaithfulness.

Born 1520; died 1542.

HOWARD, HENRY, R.A., and Professor of painting in the Royal Academy. After receiving some tuition from Reinagle, he became a student of the Royal Academy in 1788, displaying great talent as a draughtsman, and carrying off the highest honours of the school of art in which he was being educated. In 1791 he went to Italy, and studied at Rome with Flaxman. On his return to England, he was extensively employed to illustrate books with steel plates, and, at the same time, he continued to send to the exhibitions of the academy a number of paintings on classical subjects. In 1801 he was elected an associate, and, in 1808, an academician, and, subsequently, secretary to the Royal Academy. At the first cartoon competition, in 1843, although 73 years of age, he contributed a drawing,—"Man beset by Contending Passions," which gained a prize of £100.

Born 1769; died 1847.

HOWARD, John, an eminent philanthropic English gentleman, was the son of a tradesman in London, who died while he was an infant, leaving him in the hands of guardians, by whom he was apprenticed to a grocer. His constitution, however, being delicate, and having an aversion to trade, he purchased his indentures from his master, and went abroad. On his return he lodged with a widow lady at Stoke Newington, who attended him with such care in his illness, that he conceived an affection for her, though she was twenty-seven years older than himself, and they were married; but Mrs. Howard died about three years afterwards. In 1756 he embarked for Lisbon, intending to aid the sufferers by the great earthquake, but, on the passage, the ship was taken and carried to France. On his release he went to Italy, and at his return, settled in Hampshire. In 1758 he married a second wife; but she died in childbed in 1765, leaving him one son. He was at this time resident at Cardington, near Bedford, where he purchased an estate. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, which, as he declared, "brought the distress of the prisoners more immediately under his notice," and led him to form the design of visiting the gaols through England, in order to devise means for alleviating the miseries of the sufferers. In 1774 he was examined before the House of Commons on the subject of the prison regulations, and received the thanks of the house. He then extended his benevolent views to foreign countries, making excursions to all parts of Europe. In 1777 he published "The State of Prisons in England and Wales, with Preliminary Observations, and an account of some Foreign Prisons." In 1780 he published an appendix to it, with an account of his travels in Italy; and in 1784 a new edition appeared, with considerable additions. About this time some admirers of Mr. Howard opened a subscription for erecting a statue to his honour, but at his request the design was dropped. In 1789 he published an "Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe." He fell a sacrifice to his humanity; for, visiting a sick patient in the Crimea, who had a malignant fever, he caught the infection. A statue of Mr. Howard, erected by public subscription, was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, with an inscription.

Born 1727; died 1790.

HOWARD, SIR ROBERT, politician and dramatist, was the younger son of the first Earl of Berkshire. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and afterwards served in the Royalist army. At the Restoration, he was knighted, and represented Stockbridge, and afterwards Castle Rising, in Parliament. He was the author of a number of poems and dramas, which are of little value. Dryden (who had married Howard's sister) severely outraged him, and Shadwell satirized him as "Sir Positive At-all." In the reign of James II. he became a Whig, and supported the Revolution, and on the accession of William III. was made a privy councillor.

HOWDEN, a market-town of the East Riding of Yorkshire, near the Ouse, here crossed by a ferry, 17 miles S.E. of York. It contains a very beautiful cruciform church, and the remains of the ancient palace of the bishops of Durham. One of the largest horse fairs in England is held here in September. Pop. 5,800.—A station on the North-Eastern railway.

HOWE, RICHARD, Earl, how, a gallant English admiral, son of Viscount Howe, was educated at Eton, entered the naval service at the age of 14, and at 20 was appointed to the command of a sloop of war, in which he beat off two large French frigates, after a gallant action; for which he was made a post-captain. After a variety of active service, he obtained the command of the Dunkirk, of 60 guns, with which he captured the Alcide, a French 64, off Newfoundland. In 1757 he served under Admiral Hawke, and, the year following, was appointed commodore of a squadron, with which he destroyed a number of ships and magazines at St. Malo. In 1759 he took Cherbourg and destroyed the basin. This was followed by the unfortunate action off St. Cas, where he displayed great courage and humanity in saving the retreating soldiers at the hazard of his own life. The same year, at the death of his brother, he became Lord Howe, and soon afterwards had a great share in the victory over Conflans. When Admiral Hawke presented him, on this occasion, to the king, his majesty said, "Your life, my lord, has been one continued series of services to your country." In 1763 he was appointed to the Admiralty board, where he remained till 1765, when he was made treasurer of the navy. In 1770 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean. In the American war he commanded the fleet on that coast. In 1782 he was made a viscount of Great Britain, and in the same year relieved Gibraltar, which service he performed in sight of the French and Spanish fleets, who, however, avoided an action, though far superior in numbers. In 1783 he was made first lord of the Admiralty, which office he soon afterwards resigned; but, at the end of the year, he was reappointed, and continued in that station till 1788, when he was created an English earl. In 1793 he took the command of the Channel fleet, and, June 1, 1794, he obtained his splendid and decisive victory over the French fleet, which consisted of 26 ships of the line against 25 English. He engaged the French admiral off Ushant, and captured two ships of eighty guns after sinking four seventy-fours. The same month, he was visited on board his ship at Spithead by the king and queen, when the king presented him with a magnificent sword, a gold chain, and medal. He also received the thanks of both houses, the freedom of the city of London, and the applause of the nation. In 1795 he became general of the marines, and, in 1797, was honoured with the garter.

Born in London, 1725; died 1799.

HOWE, JOHN, a Puritan clergyman, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and in 1656 domestic chaplain to Cromwell. Suspected at the Restoration, and ejected from Torrington, his parish, 1662, he wandered about the country preaching for nine years, and then accepted the charge of chaplain to Lord Massarene, at Antrim Castle, Ireland. He was permitted by his friend, the bishop, to preach throughout his diocese. In 1675, he was appointed pastor of the dissenting chapel, Silver-street, London. Ten years after he went abroad with Lord Wharton, and subsequently settled for a time at Utrecht, where he was received by the Prince of Orange. He returned to England in 1687, and took a prominent part in the dissenting movement. A considerable author, he wrote "The Good Man the living temple of God," and other works which hold a high place in puritan theology.

Born at Loughborough, Leicestershire, 1630; died 1706.

HOWE, ELIAS, inventor, if not chief inventor, of the sewing-machine. He was the son of a farmer of Massachusetts. He worked for some years as a journeyman mechanic, and early directed attention to the possibility of making a sewing-machine, and after many experiments succeeded in producing one in 1845. He obtained a patent, and came to England, where others made a large fortune by his invention, and he was almost penniless. He succeeded in establishing his rights in 1854, and then he accumulated considerable wealth.

Born at Spencer, Massachusetts, 1819; died 1867.

HOWE, SAMUEL GRIDLEY, Dr., an American physician and philanthropist, who served the Greeks in the revolution of 1824, and the Poles in the insurrection of 1831. Was educated at the Latin school, Boston, and graduated at the Brown University, 1821. Qualifying himself for surgical practice, he left Boston, and in Greece organised the medical staff of the army; serving also for two years in the guerilla forces. Subsequently he raised funds and food for the Greeks, in America, and with these supplies established the colony of Corinth, the officials of which were represented in himself. Returning to the United States, he turned his attention to the education of the blind, in whose interest he inspected several of the best European institutions. A warm friend of freedom, he joined the Polish insurgents, and being captured, was imprisoned for six weeks by the Prussians. When at liberty. he returned to America, and undertook the management of the Massachusetts Institution for the Blind. About the same time he established a school for idiots. Sympathising with the Cretans in their struggles, he visited them in 1867, the bearer of supplies of food and clothing. He is the author of a "Sketch of the Greek Revolution."

Born at Boston, Nov. 10, 1801.

HOWIESKI, ho-ve-ais'-ke, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia. There are a castle, a Reformed and a Roman Catholic church. Pop. 3,200.

HOWICK ISLANDS, how'-ik, a group of about 10 small low islands off the north-east coast of Australia. Turtle are abundant. Lat. 14° 31′ S. Lon. 145° E.

HOWITT, WILLIAM, how'-it, English author, the son of a member of the Society of Friends, who educated him and his five brothers in the principles of Quakerism. Although he had been sent to several schools kept by Quakers, his education was almost entirely owing to his own perseverance. While yet a youth, he celebrated in verse the sports and scenery with which he was familiar. Up to his twenty-eighth year, when he married and commenced with his wife a career of literature, his time had been spent in acquiring mathematical and scientific knowledge, in studying the classical authors, and in mastering the German, French, and Italian tongues. His studies were varied by rambles in the country, shooting, and fishing; and these again led him to obtain an amount of information relative to English rural life and nature, which was afterwards reproduced in his works. The lady who became his wife was, like himself, a member of the Society of Friends, and strongly imbued with literary tastes. In 1823, the first year of their marriage, they published together a volume of poems, entitled, "The Forest Minstrel," and followed it up by contributions to the annuals then in vogue, and by several original works. In 1839, and succeeding year, he wrote his "Boy's Country Book," and "Visits to Remarkable Places." In 1840 he removed to Heidelberg for the purpose of educating his children, and his sojourn there led to the production of the "Rural and Domestic Life of Germany," "German Experiences," &c. In 1847 and the four following years he published his "Homes and Haunts of the most eminent English Poets," "The Hall and Hamlet; or, Scenes and Characters of Country Life," "The Year-Book of the Country," and a novel, "Madame Dorrington, of the Dene." In 1846 he contributed to the "People's Journal," and became part proprietor of it. He afterwards established a rival publication—"Howitt's Journal," which, however, like its predecessor, was subsequently unsuccessful. In 1852 he sailed for Australia. He also visited Tasmania, Sydney, &c., and communicated his observations in a number of letters to the Times newspaper, which he afterwards collected and published with some new matter, under the title of "Land, Labour, and Gold," in 1855. On his return, he published an illustrated history of England, a descriptive account of the northern suburbs of London, and a work on the "Supernatural in All Ages."

Born at Heanor, Derbyshire, 1795; died 1879.

HOWITT, MARY, wife of the above, came of a family of Quakers named Botham, and commenced her literary career, shortly after her marriage, with a volume of poems, called "The Forest Minstrel." After having published several volumes of graceful poetry, including some ballads of rare beauty, and a number of books for the young, she, on visiting Germany with her husband, proceeded to acquire the Swedish and Danish languages, with a view of translating the novels of Miss Bremer and the tales of Hans C. Anderssen. The translations of Miss Bremer's works were published between 1844 and 1852; and the "Improvisatore," a reproduction in English of Anderssen's novel, in 1857. Besides being an industrious contributor to the periodicals, she has written a volume of "Ballads and other Poems," "Sketches of Natural History in Verse," two novels, called "The Heir of Wast-Wayland," and "Wood Leighton," and has translated "Enemoser's History of Magic." The valuable work entitled "Literature and Romance of Northern Europe," published as the joint production of herself and husband, is almost entirely her work.

Born at Uttoxeter, Staffordshire, about 1804.

HOWTH, houth, a small town of Ireland, on a peninsula which forms the northern boundary of the bay of Dublin. It is about two and a half miles long by two miles broad, and terminates towards the sea in a rocky elevation 563 feet high. From its elevation, and the two lighthouses built on it, it constitutes an excellent landmark to the mariner by day and night. A magnificent harbour has been constructed here, in order to afford shelter to such vessels as are bound for the port of Dublin; but, from the accumulation of sand, and other causes, it has become almost useless. Pop. of the town about 830, chiefly engaged in fishing.

HOXTER, hox'-ter, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Weser, 40 miles S.E. of Minden. The town is walled, and the river is crossed by a stone bridge 500 yards long. The old Benedictine abbey of Corvey, now the residence of Prince Hohenlohe-Schillingfurst, is in the vicinity. Manf. Wax candles, paper, and chicory. There is a trade in cattle, yarn, and linen. Pop. 3,700.

HOXTON, hox'-ton, a parochial district of Middlesex, forming a suburb of London. The dean and chapter of St. Paul's claim that this manor belonged to them before the Conquest. (See LONDON.) Pop. 57,954.

HOY, hoi, one of the Orkney Islands, 2 miles S. of Stromness. The cliffs here are very fine, rising 1,000 feet in height; in the case of Wart Hill, 1,555 feet; and there is a harbour in the S. at Longhope, from which steamers sail weekly for Leith. A block of sandstone, 22 feet long, 7 feet high, and 17 feet wide, called the Dwarfie Stone, is one of the curiosities of the place, and another is a pillar of rock 300 feet high, known as the Old Man of Hoy. Length, 15 miles; breadth, 5. Pop. 340.

HOZIER, PIERRE D', do-ze'-ar, Sieur de la Garde, French genealogist and historian. He studied law at Paris, but his attention being directed to genealogical studies, he attained high office and honours at the court of Louis XIII. and Louis XIV. He wrote a number of works illustrating the genealogy of noble families.

Born at Marseilles, 1592; died at Paris, 1660.

HRADISCH-UNGARISCH, ra'-dich-un'-ga-rich, a town of the Austrian empire in Moravia, on the left bank of the Merch, at the confluence of the Ossawa, 42 miles S.E. of Brünn, in a marshy district subject to inundations. There are an old and new town, containing four churches and a town house. A trade is carried on in wine, corn, and cattle. Pop. 2,000.

HUAHEINE, oo'-a-hi'-ne, one of the Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean. It is mountainous and nearly surrounded by a coral reef. There is a good harbour, the Bay of Fare, on the north-west coast. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 16° 43′ S. Lon. 151° 7′ W.

HUALLAGA, oo-al-la'-ga, a river of Peru, rising on the E. side of the Andes, near lat. 11° 8′, at a height of 13,200 feet above the sea, and after a course of about 500 miles, joining the Amazon at lat. 5° S.; lon. 75° 40′ W. In its course it forms several cataracts.

HUAMANGA, oo'-a-man-ga, a city of Ayacucho, Peru, 140 miles from Cuzco. It has a cathedral, several other edifices for religious purposes, and a university. Pop. about 16,000.—This place was founded in 1539, by Pizarro; and, in 1824, the Spaniards were here defeated by the Peruvians, under General Sucré, the victory sealing the fate of the dominion of the dons in South America.

HUANCAVELICA, oo'-a-ka-vel'-e-ka, a Peruvian town, 11,000 feet above the sea, about 80 miles W.N.W. of Huamanga, and on the east side of the Andes. In the neighbourhood are mines of gold, silver, and quicksilver, in working which the inhabitants are chiefly employed. Pop. about 10,000.

HUANUCO, oo'-a-noo'-ko, an ancient Peruvian town, 180 miles N.N.E. of Liura, on the east side of the Andes, and an affluent of the Huallago. Pop. 5,000.

HUAQUA, or YAQUI, hoo-a'-que, a river of Mexico, rising in the department of Sonova, and falling into the Gulf of California, 20 miles S.E. of Guaymas. It is a broad and rapid river, and has a course of about 400 miles.

HUARAZ, or HUARAS, oo-ar'-ras, a Peruvian town, 150 miles S.E. of Druxillo, on the bank of the river Santa, in a valley of the Andes. Pop. 6,000.

HUARTE, JOHN, hoo-ar'-tai, a Spanish philosopher, who, in 1578, published a work which excited considerable interest at the time: it was entitled "A Trial of Wits; or, a Treatise on the different Kinds of Genius among Men, with Rules and Directions showing to what Kind of Study any Person is best adapted." This book has been translated into English, French, and German, and has been condemned at Rome.

Born in Navarre, 1530; died about 1600.

HUASCA, or GUASCO, hoo-as'-ko, a seaport of Chili, province of Coquimbo, on the right bank of the river Hussca, and near its mouth. It is only important as the place of shipment of large quantities of silver from the mines in the vicinity. Lat. 28° 18′ S. Lon. 71° 1′ W.

HUATUSCO, hoo-a-toos'-ko, a town of Mexico, 55 miles S.W. of Vera Cruz, situated 4,000 feet above the sea. Maize and tobacco are cultivated. Pop. 5,000.

HUBB, a river rising in Beloochistan, and falling, after a course of 100 miles, into the Arabian Sea, on the N.W. of Cape Monze, in lat. 24° 50′ N.; lon. 66° 36′ E.

HUBER, FRANÇOIS, hoo'-bair, a distinguished naturalist, son of a clever Swiss draughtsman and naturalist, by whom he was taught to observe nature from his earliest years, and he studied with exemplary patience and success the habits of bees. While young, he lost his sight, but nevertheless continued to prosecute his studies with ardour, chiefly through the aid of Francis Burnens, his servant, and his wife, Aimée Lullin. In 1792 he published his discoveries, under the title of "New Observations on Bees," which were conveyed under the form of a series of letters to Charles Bonnet. He was assisted in his latter years by his son Pierre, the author of a treatise on the Habits of Ants, and of memoirs relating to zoology and meteorology. He published a second and enlarged edition of the same in 1814.

Born at Geneva, 1750; died at Lausanne, 1830.

HUBERT, ST., hoo-bair', a town of Belgium, province of Luxembourg, 33 miles N.W. of Arlon. The abbey church is one of the finest in Belgium. The west front and towers are in the Italian styles, but the interior is Gothic. Part of the old abbey buildings is now occupied as a penitentiary. Manf. Leather, oil, and glue. There is a large trade in cattle and sheep. Pop. 2,700.

HUBERTSBURG, hoo'-bairts-boorg, a village of Saxony, 24 miles from Leipsic. In the royal castle of this place was signed, in 1763, the peace by which was ended the Seven Years' war.

HUBNER, ALEXANDER, Baron de, hoob'-ner, a German diplomatist, who, after finishing his studies at the university of Vienna, went to reside in Italy, and on his return attracted the notice of Prince Metternich, who appointed him to an important position in his cabinet. In 1837, he served on the staff of the Austrian ambassador at Paris, but was recalled soon after; and in 1841, on the resumption of diplomatic relations between Portugal and Austria, he was dispatched as secretary of embassy to Lisbon, a post he vacated, to assume that of Austrian consul-general at Leipsic, in 1844. When the Italian revolution of 1848 broke out, he was acting as secretary to the viceroy of Lombardy, was made prisoner by the Italians, and retained as a hostage for several months; but was subsequently released; whereupon he retired into private life. When Prince Schwartzenburg had made head against the Italian and Viennese insurgents, he was recalled, and intrusted with the issuing of proclamations and imperial manifestoes to the populations of Austria and Italy. In 1849, he became Austrian minister plenipotentiary to the French republic, a post he retained for several years. In 1856, he was one of the plenipotentiaries of the powers of Europe who signed the treaty of Paris after the Russian war.

Born at Vienna, 1811.

HUBNER, RUDOLPH JULIUS BENNO, a German painter of the modern school, whose picture of "Ruth and Boaz" placed him in the front rank of his school. He has been settled in Dresden since 1839, and as a professor since 1841. His art is that of the historic and religious school, which sprung from Düsseldorf. His principal pictures are "Christ and His Evangelists," "Job and his Friends," "Samson Overthrowing the Pillars of the Temple," "The Golden Age," "Christ in the Midst of His People," &c.

Born at Oels, in Silesia, 1806.

HUC, EVARISTE REGIS, Abbé, hooc, a French missionary priest. He was educated in Toulouse, and, in 1837, entered the missionary congregation of the Lazarist Fathers; two years after he received holy orders at Paris. He embarked, in 1839, for China. After a voyage of five months, he arrived at Macao, and entered upon the functions of a former missionary, who had been put to death. In company with a priest and one native convert, Huc travelled throughout China and Tartary, and for some months lived in one of the Tartar monasteries, with a view to acquire the Tibetan language. Thence he made his way to H'lassa, the capital of Tibet, and when about to settle there, was ordered by the Grand Lama, at the instigation of the Chinese, to depart. He travelled back to Macao, and embarked there, in January, 1849, for France, but stopped at Ceylon, whence he wandered through India, Egypt, and Palestine. On his return to France, he collated and arranged his notes of travel, and published "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith in China;" "Travels in Tartary, Tibet and China;" "The Chinese Empire and Christianity in China;" all of which became very popular, and were translated into most of the European languages. Several of his works have been reproduced in an English form, and have attracted considerable attention.

Born at Toulouse, 1813; died at Paris, 1860.

HUCKESWAGEN, hocks-va'-gen, a town of Prussia, province of Dusseldorf, on the right bank of the Wupper, 20 miles S.E. of Dusseldorf. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen goods, articles of steel and iron, and leather. Pop. 3,000.

HUDDERSFIELD, hud'-ders-feeld, a town and parliamentary borough in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Colne, 8 miles S. of Halifax. It is well built, and very healthy, and situated in the midst of a fertile district. It is one of the principal seats of the woollen manufacture, and has six churches and 13 chapels, a proprietary college in connection with the London university, and various schools, mechanics' institute, library, news-room, philosophical hall. There are five railway stations, hotels, and magnificent blocks of warehouses. There is a cemetery of 12 acres. Manf. Narrow and broad cloths, serges, kerseymeres, and various fancy goods. The cloth hall is, perhaps, with the exception of that at Leeds, the greatest mart for woollens in the kingdom. It is a circular building, 2,640 feet in circumference, two stories high, divided into two courts, and subdivided into ranges like streets, where the merchandise is exposed upon stalls. It is attended by nearly a thousand manufacturers. A new market hall, in the Decorated Gothic style, erected at a cost of £28,000, was opened in 1880. The connection of Huddersfield, by canal and railway, with the principal cities and towns of England facilitates its trade, which possesses great advantages in the proximity of the coal-mines. There are several medicinal springs in the neighbourhood. Pop. 81,825.—A station on the London and North-Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Great Northern, Midland and Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire railways.

HUDSON, GEORGE, hud'-son, "The Railway King," director and speculator, began business-life in a linen-draper's shop in York. When established in business on his own account he took an active interest in railway operations, and succeeded in raising himself to the office of chairman of the North Midland Company. He then schemed to secure the control of embarrassed and rival lines, and, being successful, assumed the dictatorship of railway speculation. While in power his gains were enormous, his operations, it was said, yielding in one day £100,000. He invested largely in landed property, secured considerable parliamentary influence, was courted by the highest society, and three times was elected lord mayor of York. He represented Sunderland in parliament until 1859. When the mania for speculation was at its height his admirers subscribed £25,000 for a statue, which, however, was never collected, owing to an exposure of the state of the accounts of lines with which he was connected. His fall was rapid, and with it fell the inflated shares. Subsequently he was driven into exile, and but for the liberality of friends, who secured him an income of £500 in his old age, he would have died in poverty.

Born in York, 1810; died in Paris, December 14, 1871.

HUDSON, HENRY, an English navigator, and discoverer of the Arctic strait called after him. He made several voyages to seek the north-east passage to India and China. The first in 1607 with but 10 sailors and a small vessel, the second in the following year, reaching Nova Zembla, and the third in 1609, commissioned by the Dutch East India Company; in another attempt he reached the American continent about 44° N. latitude, and sailing southwards discovered the river which bears his name. On his last voyage, in 1610, he discovered and entered what is called Hudson's Bay, but without the means of prosecuting his discoveries further. When about to return some of his crew mutinied, and forced him, his son, and others, into a boat, which was never afterwards heard of.

Born 1550; died 1611.

HUDSON, THOMAS, a popular English portrait painter, the predecessor and master of Sir Joshua Reynolds. His greatest work is the portrait of Charles, duke of Marlborough, at Blenheim. His portrait of Handel, hanging in the gallery at Oxford, is said to be the only one the great musician ever sat for. He acquired a large fortune by the practice of his art, and retired to Twickenham, when his former pupil, Sir Joshua Reynolds, became the great English portrait-painter.

Born in Devonshire, 1701; died 1779.

HUDSON, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 75 square miles. Pop. 187,944. The capital is Jersey City.

HUDSON, a city, port of entry, and capital of Columbia county, New York, United States, finely situate on the E. bank of the Hudson, which is navigable to this place for the largest ships, 30 miles S. of Albany. It was founded in 1784, and its population and importance rapidly increased. It is regularly built, and has several places of worship, a fine court-house, and literary society. The creeks on the borders of the town afford fine seats for mills and manufactories, and a large number of steamboats go up to New York, while a railway connects it with Boston. Manf. Iron, machinery, and carriages. Pop. 9,000.

HUDSON, a river of New York, United States, one of the most picturesque and navigable in America, rises in the mountainous region to the W. of Lake Champlain, and, after a southerly course of more than 300 miles, falls into the Atlantic below New York. Its principal tributaries are the Hoosic, Mohawk, Walkill, and Croton. From Glen's Falls it runs in a straight southerly course to its mouth at New York. It is broad, and deep enough for river shipping at Troy, 151 miles from the coast, and at Newburg it enters the magnificent scenery of the Highlands; at the Pallisades, on the New Jersey shore, it is nearly two miles wide. It is navigable as far as Albany, near the head of the tide, 150 miles from New York. It is connected by fine canals with lakes Champlain and Erie. On the east bank is the Hudson River railway, which, with the Erie canal, connects New York with the West. Fulton, for whom the Americans claim the honour of being the first who built a vessel propelled by steam, launched his boat on this river in 1807.

HUDSON'S BAY, a large bay of British America, situate to the N. of Canada, and inclosed by land, excepting to the N.E., where Hudson's Straits communicate with Davis' Straits. It is connected with the Arctic Sea by channels which have proved unnavigable throughout. Its climate is inhospitable, the wind changing at times the temperature of summer to that of winter. The total length is about 800 miles, the breadth 600; and area 296,000 square miles. It includes various gulfs, the chief of which are St. James's Bay, in the south; Welcome Sea, in the north; and Port Nelson and Chesterfield Inlet, on the west. Many rivers flow into it. Lat. 51° to 64° N. Lon. 77° to 95° W.—It obtained its name from Henry Hudson, who discovered it in 1610.

HUDSON'S BAY TERRITORY, the former name of a large proportion of N.W. America, extending from lat. 49° to 70° N., and from Cape Charles, Labrador, to the mouth of the Mackenzie river, now included in British America. (See CANADA and COLUMBIA, BRITISH.)

HUDSON'S STRAITS, the narrow sea connecting Hudson's Bay with Davis' Straits and the Atlantic Ocean. It is 500 miles in length, with an average breadth of 100. Lat. between 60° and 64° N. Lon. 65° and 77° W.

HUE, THUA, THEIN, or PHUXUAN, hoo'-ai, the capital of Anam, Cochin-China, on a river of the same name, about 10 miles from its mouth. It is remarkable for being the only city in the East regularly fortified according to European notions, King Cia-lung having had the assistance of French officers in 1801-1820. Its walls are five miles round, and inclose the palace, with an inner citadel, and all the works necessary for a fortified place. Owing to the shallowness of the river Hue, only small vessels can approach the town. Pop. about 120,000. Lat. 16° 30' N. Lon. 107° 12' E.

HUELMA, hoo'-el-ma, a town of Spain, province of Jaen, 20 miles S.E. of the town of Jaen. Manf. Linen, esparto fabrics, soap, glass, tiles, and earthenware. Pop. 3,000.

HUELVA, hoo'-el-va, a maritime town of Spain, 63 miles W.S.W. of Seville, at the confluence of the Odiel and Tinto, in communication with Portugal, Cadiz, and Seville, whose markets it supplies with fruit and floor mattings. An extensive tunny-fishery is carried on here. Pop. 13,125.

HUELVA, a province of Spain, a portion of the old province of Andalusia, bounded N. by the province of Badajoz, E. by Seville, S.E. by Cadiz, W. by Portugal, and S. by the Atlantic. The northern part is mountainous, being traversed by the Sierra Morena; the southern part is comparatively level, with a rich soil. There are large forests of oak, pine, beech, and chestnut, in the mountain districts.

Rivers.—The Tinto, Martiga, Piedras, Odiel, and Chanca, the last forming a portion of the Portuguese boundary.

Minerals.—Copper (especially at the base of San Cristobal, the highest peak of the Sierra Morena), iron, lead, manganese, and coal.

Area.—About 5,000 square miles.

Chief Town.—HUELVA, the capital.

HUERCAL-OBERA, hoo-er'-cal, a town of Spain, province of Almeria, near the left bank of the Almanzora, 42 miles N.E. of the town of Almeria. It is a well-built town, with a college and good public buildings. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, soap, saltpetre, and earthenware. There are mines in the vicinity. Pop. 15,185.

HUERFANO, hoo-er'-fa-no, a county of Colorado, United States. Area, 2,000 square miles. Pop. 4,124. The capital is Badito.

HUERTA, VICENTE GARCIA DE LA, hoo-er'-ta, a Spanish lyric and dramatic poet of the last century, for many years librarian of the Royal library in Madrid. Distinguished in early life by his poetic talent, he attained to eminence in 1778 on the production of his tragedy "Raquel," which still holds a high place in the estimation of the Spaniards. Its popularity is attributable to the patriotic character of the piece, the charms of its poetic dress, and the constant allusions to Peninsular politics. He collected the best plays of the old stock, which he published in 1785 under the title of "Teatro Hispañol." His other productions are a translation of Voltaire's "Zaire" and an imitation of the "Electra" of Sophocles. He was a critic also, and a zealous defender of the old poets.

Born at Zafra, in Estremadura; died in Madrid, March 1797.

HUESCA, hoo'-ais-ka, a city of Spain, on the Isuela, 50 miles N.E. of Saragossa. It has a university, founded by Pedro IV. in 1354, cathedral, built in 1400, convents, and a foundling hospital. Here, also, is the old palace of the sovereigns of Aragon, which is memorable for the incident in history known as the "massacre of the bell." Manf. Linens and leather. Pop. 11,416.

HUESCA, a province of Spain, a portion of the old province of Aragon, bounded N. by France, E. by the province of Lerida, S. and S.W. by Saragossa. The northern portion is covered by offsets of the Pyrenees, some of the summits of which are covered by perpetual snow. In the south the country is level, with a very fertile soil. In the north the climate is cold and damp, but farther south mild and salubrious.

Rivers.—The Cinca, Essera, Alcandre, Gallejo, Aragon, and Arva.
Minerals.—Iron, copper, and antimony.
Area.—7,526 square miles.
Pop.—255,027.
Chief Town.—HUESCA.

HUESCAR, hoo'-ais-kar, a town of Grenada, Spain, 75 miles N.E. of Grenada. Pop. 6,300, chiefly engaged in woollen and linen manufactures.

HUET, PIERRE DANIEL, hoo'-ai, a learned French bishop, educated in the Jesuit school of Caen, who studied mathematics under Mambrun, a Jesuit, and Greek and Hebrew under Bochart, whom he accompanied in 1652 to the court of Christina, queen of Sweden, who wished to engage him in her service; but he declined the honour, and returned to France. In Sweden he discovered and transcribed the MS. of Origen. In 1664 he published an excellent work on the art of translation, entitled, "De Interpretatione." In 1678 appeared his "Demonstratio Evangelica," which was greatly admired. His reputation became so great, that the place of sub-preceptor to the dauphin was conferred on him, and he had for his colleague the illustrious Bossuet. In 1668 he published his valuable edition of the works of Origen, with a learned introduction entitled "Origeniana." Two years after he received the degree of Doctor of Law. Entering into holy orders he was in 1678 appointed abbot of the Cistercian abbey of Annay. He formed the plan of publishing editions of the classics, which are now known by the title "In usum Delphini," and spent twenty years in carrying out the project. In 1689 he printed his "Censures on the Cartesian Philosophy," a system to which he had been zealously attached, but the fallacy of which he now exposed, and in 1690 appeared his well-known work "Quæstiones Alnetanæ de Concordia Rationis et Fidei." In 1685 he became bishop of Soissons, and seven years later of Avranches. Huet, considering the number and excellence of his works, may be considered as one of the most learned men that any age has produced. His "Origin of Romances," "The Situation of the Terrestrial Paradise," and "Weakness of Human Understanding," have been translated into English.

Born at Caen, 1630; died 1721.

HUETE, hoo-ai'-te, a city of Spain, province of Cuenca, on the left bank of the Huete, 35 miles N.W. of Cuenca. It is a handsome and well-built town, with a fine episcopal palace. Manf. Linen, shoes, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 2,800.

HUFELAND, CHRISTOPHER WILLIAM, hoo'-fe-land, an eminent German physician, who pursued his profession at Weimar, and became, in 1793, professor in the university of Jena. In 1801 he was appointed physician to the king of Prussia, in 1809 professor of medicine in the university of Berlin, and finally director of the academy of military medicine and surgery in 1819. His celebrated work, "The Art of Prolonging Life," was published in 1799; his "Counsels to Mothers on Physical Education," in 1800; and his "History of Health," in 1812. He was among the first continental physicians to recognise the truth of animal magnetism.

Born at Erfurt, 1762; died at Berlin, 1836.

HUFNAGEL, GEORGE, hoof'-na-gel, a Flemish painter, extensively employed by several German princes. His reputation recommended him to the emperor Rodolphus, for whom he executed four admirable books representing quadrupeds, birds, insects, and fishes. He also wrote some poems in Latin and German.

Born at Antwerp, 1545; died 1600.

HUG, JOHN LEONHARD, hoog, an orientalist and biblical scholar, who studied at Freiburg, and entered into holy orders in 1789. He held the united professorships of Oriental languages and of the New Testament for half a century, and took a large share in the work of arranging the newly organized studies of the German universities. His principal work, which has appeared in most European languages, is an "Introduction to the New Testament." His other works are in the department of biblical criticism, with the exception of his studies of the classics, and ancient mythologies.

Born at Constance, 1765; died 1846.

HUGH CAPET. (See CAPET.)

HUGHES, JOHN, hues, an English poet, whose first work was "An Ode on the Peace of Ryswick," 1697, which was well received, and introduced him to the acquaintance of several men of letters. In 1717 he was appointed secretary to the commissioners of the peace, by Lord Chancellor Cowper. His last literary piece was the tragedy of "The Siege of Damascus;" but he expired on the first night of its performance, Feb. 17, 1720. He also wrote several pieces in prose, particularly papers in the "Tatler," "Spectator," and "Guardian;" superintended an edition of Spenser's works; translated Molière's "Misanthrope," and Fontenelle's "Dialogues of the Dead."

Born at Marlborough, Wilts, 1677; died 1720.

HUGO, VICTOR-MARIE, Viscount, hoo'-go, a celebrated living French poet, dramatist, and novelist. The son of a distinguished French general of the imperial army, his early years were spent with him in the isle of Elba, Italy, Rome, and Naples. Returning to Paris in 1809, he being then eight years old, his education was, for the first time, attended to; but being sent for from Spain by his father, he entered into a seminary for nobles in that land, and, at ten years of age, commenced writing verses. In 1813 he became a student at an institution in France, to be prepared for the Ecole Polytechnique. While studying mathematics, poetry was not neglected by him; and in 1817, having previously composed a short poem, he completed a tragedy called "Irtamène," written after the classic model. Between the years 1819-22 he three times carried off the poetry prizes of the Académie des Jeux Floraux, at Toulouse. These three odes first attracted public attention towards him; and the appearance of Lamartine's "Meditations" quickened his poetical genius into the production of a volume of "Odes and Ballads," which, given to the world in 1822, stamped his reputation permanently as a genuine poet. His next publication was "Hans of Iceland." A second volume of the "Odes and Ballads" appeared in 1826. Hitherto he had composed after the manner of Racine and the classical school; but in 1827 he produced "Cromwell," a play, not written so much for the stage as to combat the principles of the classic school of dramatists. His magnificent collection of lyrics, entitled, "Les Orientales," was brought out in 1828. "Marion Delorme" and "Hernani" were his two next works for the theatre, both written in the "romantic" manner; as also were his "Lucretia Borgia," "Mary Tudor," "Esmeralda," and "Ruy Blas." "Notre-Dame de Paris," one of his best works, was published in 1831, and his finest set of lyrics, "Autumn Leaves," in 1832. In 1845 he was created a peer of France by Louis Philippe. Returned by the city of Paris, after the revolution of 1848, for the Assemblée Nationale, he took his seat among the extreme democrats, one of whose chief orators he became. On the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was among the first individuals to be expelled from France, and went to reside in the island of Jersey, where he never ceased to compose burning philippics in prose and verse against Napoleon III. "Napoleon the Little," and "Les Châtiments," being the best known of these. In 1856 he was compelled to leave Jersey, and went to reside in Guernsey, where he has written another poetical work, "Contemplations," and a powerful social romance, entitled "Les Misérables." On the fall of the empire he returned to France, and joining the republican movement, subsequently entered the National Assembly as deputy for Bordeaux, from which, however, he soon retired. Expelled from Belgium, he lived in Vianders, a village of Luxemburg, until 1871, when he returned to Paris, and entreated the government to spare the lives of the communists. Two romances, "L'Homme qui Rit," and "Quatre-vingt-treize," and several poems, are among his later works. Besides the works we have enumerated, he has written a great many articles, tales, sketches, and criticisms for the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and a variety of other French periodicals.

Born at Besançon, 1802. Died 1885.

HUGO, FRANÇOIS VICTOR, a French littérateur, son of the above, who, after completing his education at the University of Paris, became a writer of political articles for the French papers; he afterwards assisted his father in editing a democratic journal, which the latter had established in 1848. He was sent out of France with his father, on the coup d'état of 1851, and went to reside with him in Jersey, and afterwards in Guernsey, where he engaged in historical research. He published "The Island of Jersey, its Monuments and its History," in 1857; but his best work is a fine French translation of "Shakspeare's Sonnets," which he brought out with an introduction in 1857.

Born at Paris, 1829; died 1873.

HUGRY, hoo'-gre, a river of India, in the Madras presidency, rising in Mysore, and joining the Toongabudra on the right bank, after a course of about 220 miles.

HUIZEN, hoo-é-sen, a pleasantly situated village of the Netherlands, in the province of North Holland, near the Zuyder Zee, 15 miles S.E. of Amsterdam. There is a large Calvinistic church. Pop. 2,400, chiefly engaged in agriculture and fishing.

HULDA, or HOLDA, hool'-da, in Teutonic mythology, the goddess of marriage and fecundity, and the patroness of agriculture and domestic enjoyments.

HULL, hull, a river of Yorkshire, which rises among the eastern Wolds, and falls into the Humber, at Hull.

HULL, or KINGSTON-UPON-HULL, a river-port, parliamentary and municipal borough, and county in itself, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, situate on the northern side of the great inlet of the Humber, at the point where this receives the river, 53 miles E.S.E. of York. The town stands in a low level plain, about 20 miles from the mouth of the Humber, the general level of the strata varying from 6 inches to 6 feet below the high-water mark. Thus the outfall of the drainage is prevented by the rising of the tide, which is shut out by floodgates. The oldest part stands to the W. of the Hull, and is inclosed by docks. The parish of Sculcoates, lying to the N. of the Old Dock, contains some handsome streets; Myton, to the W. of the Humber Dock, is the most modern portion; Garrisenside, on the left bank of the river, communicates with Hull by a bridge of four arches. The citadel was removed in 1864, and on its site are elegant streets, and an extension of the Victoria Dock. The harbour is artificial, having been formed by deepening and widening the channel of the river, and vast docks have been erected for the accommodation of shipping. Of these, the Old Dock was begun in 1775: it enters immediately from the river Hull, about 300 yards from its mouth. It is 1,703 feet long, 254 wide, and 23 deep, and covers, with the commodious wharves and quays, an area of 9 acres. The Humber Dock was completed in 1809, and covers a space of more than 7 acres. It opens into the Humber by a lock, which will admit a 50-gun ship, and which is crossed by an iron bridge. The Junction Dock, connecting the Old and Humber docks, was completed in 1829, and can contain fifty or sixty large vessels: area, 6 acres. These three docks embrace two sides of the old town, and run from the Humber to the river Hull. The Railway Dock, with an area of nearly 3 acres, was opened in 1845, and five years after the Victoria Dock, which covers about 21 acres. In 1869 the Albert Dock, which is 23 acres in extent, was opened by the Prince of Wales. In addition to this accommodation, are the Albert and Humber Docks tidal basins, covering upwards of 6 acres, opened in the same year. The William Wright dock, occupying nearly 6 acres, with a large graving dock, was opened in 1880, and a very much larger dock is in progress, the great increase of steam tonnage having necessitated the construction of increased dock accommodation. The total annual shipping of this port has been estimated at upwards of 12 million tons. The principal churches are, the Holy Trinity church, a large and beautiful structure, of Gothic architecture and of exquisite workmanship, partly built about the year 1312, and recently restored; St. Mary's and St. John's churches, the latter a neat and simple brick building. Besides these, there are 11 other churches and a large number of chapels, with a floating chapel for mariners, and a Jews' synagogue. Of the charitable institutions, the oldest is the Trinity-House, founded in 1366, for the relief of decayed seamen and their widows; the Charter-house hospital was founded by Michael de la Pole in 1384 for the support of poor pensioners; and there are, besides, several other hospitals for the poor. The grammar-school was instituted in 1436, and its school-room is one of the best in England. The vicar's school was begun in 1734; and there are various charity and subscription schools, some of them on the Lancasterian system. Hull and Kingston colleges, having two fine buildings, founded in 1838, afford instruction similar to King's and University colleges, London. The other public edifices are the custom-house, exchange, town-hall, pilot, dock, stamp and excise offices, two theatres, concert-hall, gaol, library, mansion-house, mechanics' institute, Lyceum, Athenæum, &c. In the market-place stands a neat equestrian statue of William III., and at the end of Junction Street is a statue of Wilberforce, a native of this town. A people's park of 27 acres was given to the town in 1864 by Sir Z. C. Pearson. In it is a marble statue of the Queen.

Commerce.—Hull is connected by railway with all the principal towns in the N. of England; as also with London, by a continuation of the E. Counties Railway. It also has navigable communications inland, either by rivers or canals, with York, Sheffield, Leeds, Manchester, Liverpool, Nottingham, Birmingham, and Bristol; and is equally open to the E. coast, the continent, and the North Sea. Steam-vessels sail hence for London, Yarmouth, and many other ports on the E. coast of Scotland and England, together with the principal maritime towns of Denmark and Holland, and a large commerce is carried on with ports in the Baltic, and in the whale-fishery. The leading exports consist of woollen and cotton goods and hardware; and the imports, of almost every article of foreign production, are of more than £17,000,000 annual value. The coasting, as well as its inland trade in coals, corn, wool, manufactured goods, &c., is very large.

Lat. 53° 44′ N. Lon. 0° 10′ W.

History.—Wyke-upon-Hull was the ancient name of this town; but in 1296, Edward I., who saw its great natural advantages, purchased it, and called it Kyngeston-upon-Hull. He began the formation of the harbour, and thus commenced the prosperity of the place. By the end of the 13th century it had so progressed that its exports amounted to one-seventh of those of the whole kingdom. Under Edward III. it furnished 16 ships and 500 men for the invasion of France, whilst the complement of London was only 25 ships and 700 men. During the civil war it declared for the parliament, and sustained two severe sieges by the royalists. At the close of the reign of James II. the town and fort were in the possession of the Jacobite party, but were surprised and taken, and the prince of Orange was proclaimed king, an event still kept in memory by an annual holiday.

HULME, hulm, a township of Lancashire, included in the borough of Manchester. It contains a handsome church, cavalry barrack, town-hall, free library; and the Manchester botanic garden, with an area of nearly 18 acres, is also here. Pop. 90,324. (See MANCHESTER.)

HULST, hoolst, a town of the Netherlands, province of Zeeland, 16 miles N.W. of Antwerp. There are a beautiful church, part of which is used by Protestants and part by Roman Catholics, a town-hall, and several market places. It was formerly fortified, and is one of the oldest places in Flanders. Two large cattle-markets are held annually. Pop. 2,400.

HULTSCHIR, hoolts'-chir, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the left bank of the Oppa. There is a castle. Manf. Cloth and worsted. Coal is worked in the vicinity. Pop. 2,600.

HUMANSDORF, hoo'-mans-dorf, a division of the Eastern Province of Cape Colony, forming part of Witenhage. It is a mountainous region lying between the coast and the Winterhoch mountains. There is a considerable amount of good timber, but the resources are chiefly agriculture and the rearing of cattle. Area, 2,630 square miles. Pop. 7,900.

HUMBER, hum'-ber, one of the largest rivers of England, dividing Yorkshire from Lincolnshire. It is formed by the junction of the Ouse, the Aire, and the Trent, and is the principal outlet for the waters which fall on the E. side of the kingdom, draining, with its tributaries, nearly one-fifth of the kingdom. At the mouth of the Trent, where the Humber properly begins, the river is more than a mile in breadth. It thence flows in an easterly direction towards Hull, receiving in its course the Foulness and Hull, and the Anchholme and Ludd rivers. Gradually widening its channel to between 2 and 3 miles, it empties itself into the German Ocean, between the promontory of Spurnhead and Saltfleet, in a vast estuary, 6 or 7 miles wide. The length is 35 miles.

HUMBER, a river of Newfoundland, which enters the Gulf of St. Lawrence, after a southerly course of 100 miles.

HUMBERT, JOSEPH AIMABLE, hoom'-bair, a French revolutionary general, who owed his rise to his fine person, bravery, and bold demeanour. After having received some little education, he became a strolling workman, and afterwards a hawker of rabbit-skins, but, entering the revolutionary army in 1792, he rapidly rose to the position of colonel. In 1793 he was made a general of brigade, and served in that capacity against the insurgents of La Vendée. He was with General Hoche when he attempted to invade Ireland in 1796; but when that expedition was disorganised by a violent storm, he returned to France. In 1798 he was again sent to Ireland at the head of 1,500 men. He landed at Killala, of which he took possession. General Lake marched against him three days afterwards, with a very superior force, but which was mainly composed of yeomanry and militia. Lake was beaten at Castlebar, and Humbert sought to raise the country in the behalf of the French, but met with little success. In a short time the advanced guard of Lord Cornwallis met and defeated him, taking himself and whole force prisoners. He returned to France in 1799, and was sent to St. Domingo a few years afterwards under General Leclerc, with whose widow he came to France in 1804. Bonaparte was so enraged at this act, that he ordered him to leave Paris, and threatened more severe measures. He fled to America, and led an adventurous life in the Spanish settlements.

Born at Bouvray, 1767; died at New Orleans, 1823.

HUMBOLDT, FREDERICK HENRY ALEXANDER, Baron von, hoom'-boldt, a distinguished German philosopher and traveller, was the son of a wealthy soldier who had served under Frederick the Great of Prussia. Having previously received an excellent rudimentary education at home, he was sent with his elder brother, in 1786, to the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, to study the natural sciences. In 1788 he quitted Frankfort for Göttingen, at which Heyne, the great classical scholar (see HEYNE), was then a professor. Heyne's son-in-law, George Forster, had accompanied Captain Cook in his discoveries in the South Seas, and his glowing descriptions of those regions made a deep impression on the young man's mind. (See FORSTER, GEORGE.) In 1790 he accompanied

Forster in a tour through the Rhine districts and Holland, and afterwards visited England with him. His scientific observations made in Germany were afterwards published in 1790, under the title of "Mineralogical Considerations on certain Basaltic Formations on the Rhine." His intention being to seek employment in the civil service of the Prussian kingdom, he subsequently went to Hamburg to study book-keeping and the other forms of commercial knowledge, and afterwards studied in the mining academy of the eminent Werner, at Freiburg. In 1792 he obtained the post of mining superintendent in the works of Bayreuth, in which situation he remained till the year 1795, during which time he wrote many scientific articles for the German periodicals, and published a botanical work in Latin, called "Specimens of the Flora of Freiburg." Soon after the production of this work he resigned his post as mining superintendent, having determined to explore those parts of the world which had been unvisited by travellers. The disturbed state of the continent at the time, owing to the wars consequent on the French revolution, prevented him from executing his design for about two years, during which time he resided at Jena, and became acquainted with Göthe and Schiller, and occupied himself with the composition and publication of "Investigations on the Muscles and Nerve-fibres, with Conjectures on the Chemical Process of Life," and "On Subterranean Gases;" two small works which established his reputation as a natural philosopher. A short visit to Italy was made in 1799, and, in the same year, he went to Paris, with the view of accompanying the expedition about to be despatched from that capital to Egypt. The expedition was abandoned; but Humboldt made the acquaintance of Bonpland, who was to have been the naturalist of the journey, and the two learned men resolved to undertake a great enterprise together. Their first idea was to explore Northern Africa; but, being prevented by the English cruisers in the Mediterranean, they landed in Spain, and obtained permission from the government to travel in the Spanish possessions of South America. In the month of May, 1799, the two travellers embarked at Corunna, and, eluding the English cruisers watching the port, reached Teneriffe, where they ascended the peak and collected some valuable scientific data. Going on board their vessel again, they sailed for Cumana, in South America, which was reached in July. Humboldt and his companion now proceeded to explore the great South American continent, and to collect a body of scientific information, during five years of adventurous research, hitherto unparalleled. For 65 days he navigated, in an Indian canoe, the Orinoco Rio Negro, and the Atabapo, discovering the connection between the Orinoco and the Amazon. The botany, mineralogy, geology, the physical aspects of the country, and the habits of the natives, were all observed and noted during this great journey. He now returned to the coast and embarked for Havannah, where he sojourned for some time. Returning to South America in 1801, he travelled southward till he reached Lima, crossing the Cordilleras and Andes five times during the journey. In June, 1802, he ascended Chimborazo to an elevation of 19,300 feet, the highest point of the mountain ever attained by a human being. In December, 1802, he embarked for Guayaquil, and in the April following reached Mexico, in exploring which and the adjoining countries he spent a year. Wishing to complete his scientific observations of the island of Cuba, he once more set sail for Havannah, in 1804. A visit to the United States, and a short stay in Washington and Philadelphia succeeded, after which he quitted America for France, and arrived at Bordeaux in August, 1804. He spent nine months in Paris arranging his notes, and assisting Gay-Lussac (see LUSSAC) in making some experiments relative to the chemical composition of the atmosphere. After spending a short time in Italy and at Berlin, where he obtained permission from the king to take up his residence in the French capital while his works were being printed, he returned to Paris. In 1807 appeared the first of a large number of volumes, all published under the general title of "Travels of Humboldt and Bonpland in the Interior of America between the years 1799-1804." In this magnificent undertaking, composed partly in Latin, partly in French, he was assisted by Oetmans for the astronomical, Arago and Gay-Lussac for the chemical and meteorological, Cuvier for the Zoological, and Klaproth for the mineralogical divisions. It was mainly divided into six great sections, which again were subdivided into many more, the botanical portion alone consisting of twenty volumes, embellished with 1,200 plates. He spent a portion of the years 1827-28 at Berlin, whither he had been invited by the king of Prussia; in 1829 he, at the express desire, and at the sole expense, of the emperor Nicholas, set out with Rose and Ehrenberg to explore the Ural and Altai Mountains, the Chinese Doongarei, and the Caspian Sea, and in nine months travelled, between St. Petersburg and the Chinese frontier, over a distance of 2,320 geographical miles. The results of this expedition were the scientific examination of the beds in which are found platina and gold, botanical and geological collections, magnetic observations, astronomical determination of positions, and the discovery of diamonds in a region thought incapable of producing them. He published an account of the expedition at Paris, in 1843, under the title of "Central Asia; Researches on its Mountain-chains and Climatology." Between the years 1830 and 1848, although he desired to keep aloof from politics, he was intrusted by the king of Prussia with several diplomatic missions to the court of Louis Philippe. In 1848 he went to reside near the king of Prussia, whose court he ornamented till his death. In 1845 he commenced his great work, "Kosmos, or a Physical Description of the Universe," which was concluded in 1851, and which has become exceedingly popular in an English translation. He was a member of almost every scientific body in the world; an associate of the Academy of Sciences of Paris and Berlin; was decorated with many orders, and was a grand officer of the French Legion of Honour. By the labours of his long and valuable life he earned the title of creator of the science of comparative geography, and reviver of the study of the natural sciences. In addition to those already quoted, a few of his most important works may be given: "Essay on the Chemical Analysis of the Atmosphere;" "Pictures of Nature;" "Essay on Electrical Fishes;" "Essay on the Geography of Plants;" "Causes of the Difference in Temperature of various portions of the Earth's Surface;" "Fragments of Asiatic Geology and Climatology;" and "The Progress of Nautical Astronomy during the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries."

Born at Berlin, September, 1769; died 1859.

HUMBOLDT, KARL WILHELM, Baron von, a distinguished philologist, classical critic, and diplomatist, was elder brother of the above, with whom he pursued an educational career at the universities of Göttingen and Jena. He studied the philosophy of Kant, as well as law, and acquired a considerable knowledge of antiquities, being an eager student in that department, and also in that of æsthetics. When very young, he wrote many essays on the Greek poets and philosophers; but his first work of consequence was a critical essay on Göthe's "Hermann and Dorothea." He married in 1791, and for some years after devoted himself to poetical, literary, and scientific pursuits, during which time, at his wife's estate in Thuringia and subsequently in Jena, he was in intimate relations with Schiller. In 1802 he was nominated to the post of minister plenipotentiary to Rome; resigning this in 1808, he became head of the department of public instruction, which he quitted to retire into private life, two years afterwards. In 1812 he became Prussian ambassador at the court of Vienna; represented his country at the conference of Prague, in 1813, and signed, with Hardenberg (see HARDENBERG), the treaty of Paris. In 1819 he was recalled from England, where he was ambassador, to Berlin, to assume the functions of minister and privy councillor; but not agreeing with his sovereign as to his retrograde policy, he tendered his resignation, and once more sought a retired life, residing chiefly at Tegel, where he formed a collection of sculptures of rare excellence, and enhanced the beauty of his estate by planting and laying-out new pleasure grounds. He now occupied himself with the study of classical and semi-civilised languages and comparative grammar, varying these pursuits with critical essays on poetry, philosophy, and the fine arts. He published a small number of poems, but, on the advice of Schiller, he abandoned creative for critical authorship, for which his mind was more fitted. He wrote critical essays on Sanscrit poetry, and on Wolf's edition of Homer's "Odyssey;" published "An Examination of the Basque Language," and a treatise on the Celts and Iberians; besides a very large number of smaller works on classical literature and on speculative physiology. The latter years of his life were occupied with the study of the Malay and American languages; but failing health caused him to abandon the American in order that he might conclude his researches in the Malay tongue. At the time of his death he had almost completed his task, and his work was afterwards published by Dr. Buschmann, in 1836.

Born at Potsdam, 1767; died 1835.

HUMBOLDT, a small unnavigable river, formed by the union of two streams which rise in the Humboldt Mountains in the Utah territory, U.S. It is impregnated with alkaline matter, is 350 miles in length, and after a rapid westerly course falls into the Sink of Humboldt river. The region through which it flows is almost destitute of vegetation.

HUMBOLDT, a mountain range of Utah, United States, about 150 miles west of the Great Salt Lake, extending from S.W. to N.E, and attaining an elevation of nearly 11,000 feet above the sea-level.

HUMBOLDT, a county of California, United States. Area, 2,800 square miles. Pop. 15,512. The capital is Eureka.

HUMBOLDT, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 5,341. The capital is Dakota city.

HUMBOLDT, a county of Nevada, United States. Area, 19,000 square miles. Pop. 3,480. Unionville is the capital.

HUMBOLDT BAY, California, United States, 230 miles N.W. of San Francisco. It is about 20 miles wide and 7 deep.

HUME, DAVID, hume, a celebrated English historian and philosophical writer, the younger son of a Berwickshire gentleman. He was educated at home, and subsequently attended the Edinburgh University. He was destined for the law, but having little inclination for that profession, he tried mercantile pursuits, and became, in 1734, clerk in an eminent house at Bristol. But he did not continue long in that situation; for, having a strong propensity to literature, he went to France, and lived for some time at La Flèche, where he wrote his "Treatise on Human Nature," which he published at London, in 1738. This metaphysical work, however, met with an indifferent reception, but he provided the philosophers of the day with food for study, and pointed to discoveries, the blanks of which were filled up by the Scotch and German school of metaphysicians, which he originated, nor were his "Essays, Moral and Political," which appeared in 1742, more successful, although elegantly written, and marked by thought and culture. About this time he resided with the marquis of Annandale, an insane nobleman, as a companion, but in 1747 became secretary to General Sinclair, whom he accompanied in the expedition to the coast of France, and the attack on Port L'Orient, and in the following year attended him in a diplomatic mission to France. While abroad his "Enquiry concerning the Human Understanding" was published at London. In 1752 appeared his "Political Discourses," and his "Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals," the latter of which he accounted the best of his writings. He proposed at that time to publish his "Dialogues concerning Natural Religion," but was prevailed upon to lay them aside, his friends being alarmed at the manifest scepticism of these papers. In 1754 he published the first volume of the "History of England, from the Accession of James I., to the Revolution." This volume was poorly received; but the second, which came out in 1756, met with a better fate, and "helped," as the author said, "to buoy up its unfortunate brother." About the same period he published his "Natural History of Religion," which was smartly answered by Dr. Warburton, in a pamphlet which Mr. Hume attributed to Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Hurd. In 1759 appeared his "History of the House of Tudor," and in 1761, the more ancient part of the English history. The work had now acquired considerable celebrity, and the writer gained largely by its popularity; for besides the profit it brought him, he obtained a pension through lord Bute. In 1763 he accompanied the earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, where, in 1765 he remained as chargé d'affaires. While in France he was intimate with the savants and wits of the most distinguished circles—with D'Alembert, Holbach, Buffon, Diderot, Malesherbes, and others. There, too, he was familiar with Rousseau, whom he treated with the greatest kindness in England, and was repaid by suspicion and ingratitude. The year following he returned home, and became under-secretary of state to Mr. Conway. In 1769 he retired to his native country on a small, but to a man of his frugal habits, independent income. After his death appeared a work by him, entitled "Dialogues concerning Natural Religion," which have excited much controversy. He left a charmingly written autobiography.

Born at Edinburgh, 1711; died in the same city, 1776.

HUME, JAMES DEACON, a commercial statistician, writer on financial and commercial questions, and compiler of the Customs-statute Code. After receiving his education at Westminster School, he obtained, in 1790, a clerkship in the custom-house. In 1822 he was employed in the preparation of reports on the revenue. Up to this period the Customs legislation consisted of 1,500 different statutes, mostly contradictory,—an "intricate and labyrinthian chaos," as it was termed. He was requested to reduce this confused mass into one harmonious and intelligible code, a task he performed after three years of the most unremitting labour. The ministry of that day, fully alive to the importance of his task, rewarded him, on its completion, with a sum of £5,000, in addition to the salary of his office in the custom-house. In 1829 he was appointed joint assistant-secretary of the Board of Trade.

HUME, JOSEPH, a distinguished financial reformer and politician, was the son of a poor widow who kept a shop in Montrose, her husband, a master of a small coasting vessel, having died while he was quite young. He was educated at the local grammar school, and at the age of 13 placed in an apothecary's shop. In his 14th year he was apprenticed to a surgeon, and having obtained a medical diploma from the university of Edinburgh, and passed the Royal College of Surgeons in London, he received an appointment as surgeon to an East-Indiaman in 1797. After a short residence in India, he mastered several native languages, and became successively Persian interpreter, paymaster, and postmaster to Lord Lake's army operating against the Mahrattas. He laboured so energetically and successfully in his various employments, that he was enabled to return to England in 1811, still a young man, with a fortune of about £30,000. Having travelled in Spain, Turkey, Greece, and Egypt, he was, in 1812, elected an M.P. for Melcombe Regis; but on the dissolution of parliament, soon after, he was not returned again. Upon this he turned his attention to the establishment of savings-banks, schools on the Lancasterian principle, and other schemes of social amelioration and utility. He was returned to parliament again in 1818, for the Montrose burghs, which he represented till 1830, in which year he was returned for Middlesex. He lost this seat in 1837; but, through the influence of Mr. O'Connell, was chosen by the electors of Kilkenny to be their representative in parliament. In 1842 his old constituents of the Montrose burghs returned him to the House of Commons, and he sat for his native place till his death. During his parliamentary career he energetically struggled for financial reform, advocated the reduction of taxation, and watched the expenditure of the national funds with more perseverance and disinterested industry than any member of the House of Commons before or after his time. Military, naval, ecclesiastical, fiscal reforms were his constant effort. The abolition of military flogging, imprisonment for debt, and numberless other ameliorations, found in him an untiring advocate. In 1835 he greatly assisted in the discovery of a remarkable Orange plot, the object of which was to secure the throne of England for the duke of Cumberland, instead of giving it to the Princess Victoria, whose education was considered of too liberal a tendency. When his remains were consigned to the tomb, speakers of all shades of political opinion in the House of Commons acknowledged the value of this uncompromising labourer for reform, and enemy of privilege and monopoly.

Born at Montrose, 1777; died at Burnley Hall, Norfolk, 1854.

HUME, a county of New South Wales, Australia, on the north bank of the Murray. Area, 1,475 square miles.

HUMERPOOR, or HAMIPUR, hoo-mer-poor', a town of the North-Western Provinces of British India, capital of a district of the same name, on the right bank of the Jumna, 150 miles from Agra.

HUMMEL, JOHANN NEPOMUK, hoom'-mel, a German composer and pianist. He was the son of the director of the Imperial School of Military Music at Presburg, and displaying great musical talent from his earliest youth, became chapel-master to Count Esterhazy in 1803, and afterwards to the king of Wurtemberg, in 1816. He was only excelled in instrumental composition by Beethoven. He composed four operas, two masses, and a large quantity of smaller musical pieces.

Born at Presburg, 1778; died at Weimar, 1837.

HUMPHREYS, hum'-freys, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 375 square miles. Pop. 11,379. The capital is Waverley.

HUNAN, hoo'-nan, a fertile inland province of China, on the south side of Lake Tung-ting-hu. The chief production is rice, of which two crops are yielded annually. Malachite, lead, iron, and coal are found in the mountainous districts. Chang-cha-foo, on the river Siang, is the chief town. Area, 74,320 square miles. Pop. 21,002,604.

HUNDOUR, hun-door, a town of British India, North-West Provinces. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 25° 55′ N. Lon. 81° 52′ E.

HUNDSRUCK, hoons'-drook, an extensive and mountainous district, chiefly in the Rhenish provinces of Prussia, but extending into the palatinate of Bavaria. It is thickly wooded, and rises, at intervals, to a height of 2,300 feet. It lies between the Moselle and the Nahe, and joins the mountain-chain of the Vosges. It has a nearly equal length and breadth of 45 miles.

HUNGARY, hun'-gar-e, an extensive country in Central Europe, forming, under the title of kingdom, a considerable portion of the Austro-Hungarian empire. It is bounded W. by part of Germany, N. by Galicia, E. by Moldavia and Wallachia, and S. by Turkey. Hungary and Austria proper are united in the person of their common sovereign, and the "Delegations" or parliament. (See AUSTRIA.) The surface of Hungary varies extremely in the different provinces. The Carpathians, an immense mountain-chain beginning near Presburg, divide it from Galicia. They rise to the height in some peaks of nearly 10,000 feet, and form at the tops immense masses of granite, totally destitute of vegetation. (See CARPATHIANS.) Besides these, there are in the N. and W. several detached ranges of very considerable extent. Immense plains also exist, which in the eastern part are subjected to periodical drought and to frequently recurring blasts. The cold is very severe in winter, and in summer the hail-storms are the cause of much anxiety to farmers and vine-growers.

Rivers, Lakes, and Canals.—The Danube, Szamos, March, Maros, Drave, and Save; the Carpathians pour down into the plain the Theiss, Waag, Gran, Poprad, and Temes, all falling into the Danube. The waters of the Theiss yield large quantities of fish. The chief lakes are the Platten See, the Neusiedler See; and there is a large tract of marshes, the principal of which is Lake Palitsch. The principal canals are the Franzen Canal and the Bega Canal, both joining the Danube and Theiss.

Climate.—Among the mountains cold is predominant, the snow lying on the ground for many months. In the S. the climate is in general mild, in the sandy districts extremely hot; but on the banks of the rivers, and near the marshes, damp; dampness, indeed, being a prevailing characteristic of the climate of the level part of Hungary.

Minerals.—Important, consisting of silver, lead, copper, iron, zinc, cobalt, salt alum, and coal. Gold is also occasionally found in the sands of rivers, and is principally washed by the gipsies. Precious stones of various kinds, opals being the most valuable, are discovered in the mountains. Rock-salt is found in large quantities in the mountains of Marmaros, and also in Transylvania. As several branches of mining are as yet in their infancy, the productive power of the kingdom is likely to increase rapidly.

Pro.—The extensive plains lying along the great rivers possess all the riches of an alluvial soil. In the N., clay, stone, and gravel predominate, and the ground there produces but a scanty return, after considerable labour. In the S., too, there are many tracts unfit for the purposes of agriculture. The large heaths of Debreczin and Ketzkemet are covered either with sand or with the most scanty vegetation. Several other tracts are covered by moving sands, which are said in some cases to be increasing. In the N. barley and common rye are most frequently sown; in the S., wheat, maize, millet, and, in the marshes of the Banat, rice. Oats are cultivated throughout the kingdom. Potatoes are raised by the Sclavonians and Germans, and pulse by the followers of the Greek Church. Hemp and flax are cultivated, also tobacco and saffron. In 1872 the soil under cultivation in Hungary amounted to 40,038 square miles, and the pasture lands to 11,093. It is estimated that 239,352,300 imperial bushels of all kinds of grain are annually produced, 60,500,000 of which are exported. Fruit is grown in great quantities, and extensive pastures are found in many parts of the country. Next to the cultivation of corn and the breeding of cattle, the making of wine forms the most extensive branch of rural industry. The Hungarian wines vary greatly, both in taste and strength; the well-known Tokay being unrivalled in quality. The white wines of Pesth, Somlyó, and Villány are equal to the finest Rhenish wines, and Burgundy cannot produce wines superior to those of Karlovitz, Eger (Erlau), Buda (Ofen), Szeqzárd, &c. Dense forests and woods abound in the mountainous districts. A few buffaloes are found in certain parts of the country. Game of all kinds and fowls are plentiful.

Domestic Animals.—The Hungarian oxen are large and well shaped, and generally of a milk or grey-white colour, with lofty and spreading horns. Some of the sheep are very fine, particularly a peculiar breed, with forked horns. The horses of Hungary seldom reach a great height, and are incapable of drawing heavy loads; but they surpass almost all other horses on the continent in elegance of shape, as well as in vivacity and swiftness. Bacon being a favourite food, vast herds of swine, amounting to more than 5,000,000, are reared.

Manf. and Industries.—Woollens, silks, linens, paper, leather, oil, beer, and tobacco. Bees are largely kept, and the rearing of silkworms is carried on to a considerable extent in the Military Frontier. Hungary is behind in an industrial point of view, but since Pesth, the capital, has been brought into railway communication with Vienna and the Austrian ports, greater progress has been made. There is a main line through Transylvania. The roads are as a rule bad.

Commerce.—The chief exports are corn, tobacco, wine, particularly that of Tokay, and wool; also wax, tallow, potash, alum, antimony, gall-nuts, &c. A little leather, linen, and iron are also sent out of the country. The imports are chiefly manufactured goods and colonial produce. Nearly 1,000 vessels, some of which are steamboats, ascend and descend the Danube, engaged in carrying on the trade between the principal towns of Hungary and Vienna.

Pop.—15,642,102, of whom 38 per cent. are Magyars, 18 per cent. Germans, and 16 per cent. Sclavonians.

Religion and Education.—About 48 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholics, 10 per cent. Greek Catholics, 20 per cent. Protestants, and 17 per cent. Byzantine Greeks. The Roman Catholics have a prince primate, two archbishops, and seventeen bishops. The Greek Catholics have four bishops; the non-united Greeks a patriarch archbishop and seven bishops. The Protestant bodies are divided into districts, four for each. Education is not, on the whole, well diffused, but the higher classes are well cultured and highly intelligent. Education, however, is extending, especially in its lower branches, there being nearly 16,000 public elementary schools, and 68 establishments for training teachers, and there are 68 gymnasia for classical education. The higher branches of learning are studied in the university of Pesth, and in academies and lyceums. There are Protestant educational institutions at Debreczin, Sárospatak, and Eperjes.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are four provinces—Hungary, Croatia and Slavonia, Transylvania, and the Military Frontier. The chief towns are BUDA-PESTH, PRESBURG, ODENBURG, KASCHAU, and GROSSWARDEIN.

Constitution and Government.—The constitution of the kingdom of Hungary dates from the foundation of the kingdom about 895. There exists no charter, or constitutional code, but in place of it are fundamental statutes, published at long intervals of time. The principal of them, the "Golden Bull" of King Andrew II., was granted in 1222, and defined the form of government as an aristocratic monarchy. The Hungarian constitution has been repeatedly suspended and partially disregarded, until, at the end of the armed struggle of 1849, it was decreed to be forfeited by the rebellion of the nation. This decree was repealed in 1860, and the present sovereign, on the 8th of June, 1867, swore to maintain the constitution, and was crowned king of Hungary. The legislative power rests conjointly in the king and the diet, or Reichstag, consisting of an upper and a lower house, the first known as the house of magnates, and the second as the house of representatives, composed of representatives of the nation, elected by the vote of all citizens, of full age, who pay direct taxes. No distinction is made, either as regards electors or representatives, on account of race or religion. The house consists of 444 members. The executive of the kingdom is in a responsible ministry, consisting of a president and nine departments.

Railways and Telegraphs.—There are about 5,000 miles of railway open for traffic, and about 12,000 miles of telegraph lines.

History.—In the time of the Romans the country now called Hungary formed the western portion of Dacia and the south of Pannonia. In the 3rd century the Goths occupied all this portion of Europe, and these were driven out in 376 by the Huns, whose name, it is said, joined to that of the Avari, gave its title to the country. Charlemagne having conquered the Avari in 799, the Magyars, a people of Asiatic origin, and who, a century before, had established themselves on the Don and Dnieper, entered Hungary in 894. Arpad, the son of Almus, was their leader, and allying himself with the emperor of Germany, he defeated most of the tribes who then occupied the country. His successor embraced Christianity; and Stephen I., called the Saint, who had been the chief of the Magyars since 997, took the title of king in the year 1000. At the close of the Arpad dynasty in 1301, the Hungarians elected Wenceslaus of Bohemia, and, after his abdication, Otho of Bavaria; but Pope Boniface VIII. imposed on them Charles Robert, called Charobert, count of Anjou, and who was recognised as king in 1309. In his reign Hungary attained a high degree of prosperity; it comprised, besides Hungary proper, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia, Servia, Wallachia, Transylvania, Moldavia, and Bulgaria. Early in the 15th century the Turks invaded the kingdom. Under Ladislaus IV.—1438 to 1457—the Turks were defeated by the brave John Hunniades, the regent, whose son, Matthias I., was elected king in 1458. This monarch was possessed of great administrative as well as military abilities; his reign was flourishing, and he was the founder of a university at Presburg, and a celebrated library at Buda. His successors, however, were unable to keep out the Turks, and in 1526 Louis II. was killed at the fatal battle of Mohatz, which gave a great portion of the kingdom for many years to the Ottomans. Ferdinand of Austria and John Zapolsky now disputed the possession of the country, and the latter was defeated and obliged to fly. The nation, however, did not recognise the Austrian domination until 1570, under Maximilian II.; and it was not until 1687 that the crown of Hungary was declared hereditary in the house of Austria. After that, indeed, the emperors had to suppress the successive revolutions headed by Tekeli and Ragotszy, which were not finally put down until 1711. During these dissensions the Turks had seized on a large portion of Hungary, but were definitively driven out in 1699 by the peace of Carlowitz. From that time to 1848 the nation remained faithful to the house of Austria, especially in the cause of Maria Theresa, and in the wars with France from 1793 to 1815, when it contributed largely to the finances and military forces of the country. In 1848, however, the discontent, which had been gradually gathering force, broke out into a great insurrection, and the Magyar revolution, at one period eminently successful, was only ultimately checked by the assistance of Russia. The Emperor, Francis Joseph of Austria, was crowned king of Hungary in June, 1867. (See AUSTRIA, KOSSUTH, BATTHYANY, &c.)

HUNGERFORD, hun'-ger-ford, a borough and market-town in Berkshire, on the Kennet, 60 miles W. of London. It has a church, a handsome market-house facing the river, and free grammar-school. Adjoining the town is Hungerford park, a fine mansion, occupying the site of a residence presented by Queen Elizabeth to the earl of Essex. Pop. 3,903.—A station on the Great Western railway.

HUNNERIC, hun'-ne-rik, king of the Vandals in Africa, succeeded his father Genseric in 477. He was a violent Arian; and though he at first gave the Orthodox Christians toleration, he afterwards commenced a persecution against them, and caused upwards of 40,000 to be put to death in the most cruel manner.

HUNS, or HUNI, huns, a famous barbaric people, who are generally said to have had an Asiatic origin, and to have been of the Mongol race. They figured for the first time in European history at the end of the 4th century. (See ATTILA.)

HUNSLET, hunz'-let, a township of Yorkshire and a suburb of Leeds, with which it is connected by bridges across the Aire. (See LEEDS.) Manf. Woollens, potteries, chemicals, iron, machinery, and glass. Pop. 46,942.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire and Midland railways.

HUNT, JAMES HENRY LEIGH, hunt, English poet, essayist, and critic. He was the son of a West Indian gentleman, and was educated at Christ's Hospital, London. He had already written verses, which were published under the title "Juvenalia; or a Collection of Poems written between the Ages of Twelve and Sixteen." After leaving school, he first became assistant to his brother Stephen, an attorney, and afterwards obtained a clerkship in the War-office. In 1805 his brother John started The News, and for this paper he wrote reviews of books and theatrical criticisms. A year afterwards, he resigned his situation in the War-office, to undertake the joint editorship of the Examiner newspaper, which he and his brother John had established. The bold political essays of this print caused its proprietors to undergo three government prosecutions. The first was in 1810, for an attack on the regency. This, however, was abandoned: but, next year, the Hunts were again tried by Lord Ellenborough, for alleged seditious sentiments expressed in an article on military flogging. On this occasion, the remarkable defence by Mr. Brougham greatly contributed to their acquittal by the jury. A third article, in which the prince regent was severely criticised, and called "a fat Adonis of fifty," led to their being condemned to two years' imprisonment, with a fine of £500 each. This sentence caused Hunt to become very popular, and to receive the sympathy of Byron, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, and Moore. While in prison, he wrote "The Descent of Liberty, a Masque," "The Story of Rimini," and "The Feast of the Poets." His next literary labour was "Foliage; or, Poems Original and translated from the Greek of Homer, Theocritus, &c." In 1818 he commenced a small periodical after the model of Addison's "Spectator," &c., called the "Indicator." In 1823, the "Quarterly Review" attacks on the "cockney school" of poets, to which he belonged, elicited from his pen a satire against Mr. Gifford, its editor, called "Ultra Crepidarius." His fortunes were, at this period, at a very low ebb, and he was induced to accept the invitation of Shelley to go to Italy, where the latter and Lord Byron then were. But Shelley meeting his death almost as soon as Hunt had reached Italy, he, for some time, resided with Lord Byron, leaving his house, however, with feelings less friendly than he had entered it. In 1828, after his return to England, he published "Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries, with Recollections of the Author's Life and his Visit to Italy," a book which contained severe criticisms of Lord Byron's personal character, but which, at a later period, he admitted were of too harsh a nature. It was this book which elicited Moore's stinging little satirical poem, "The Little Dog and the Dead Lion." During the subsequent ten years he edited the "Companion," a sequel to the "Indicator;" wrote "Captain Sword and Captain Pen," contributed to the magazines and reviews, and published a play,—"The Legend of Florence." In addition to these, he superintended the publication of the dramatic works of Wycherly, Farquhar, and Congreve; wrote "The Palfrey, a Love Story of Old Times;" produced a volume of selections, called "One Hundred Romances of Real Life;" and wrote a second novel of a more ambitious nature than the first, under the title of "Sir Ralph Esher; or, Memoirs of a Gentleman of the Court of Charles II." Leading, henceforth, the uneventful life of a studious man of letters, the record of his career is nothing more than a catalogue of the names of his literary productions, with the dates of their publication. Firstly, there are his essays and criticisms on poets and poetry. Of these the chief are "Imagination and Fancy:" "Wit and Humour;" "Men, Women, and Books;" "A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla," and "A Book for a Corner." Among his genial, chatty, antiquarian sketches, we have "The Town: its Remarkable Characters and Events," and "The Old Court Suburb; or, Memorials of Kensington, Regal, Critical, and Anecdotical." "Stories from the Italian Poets, with Lives," and the dramatic works of Sheridan were of a similar character with his former editions of Congreve, &c. His last efforts were his Autobiography, in 3 vols., published in 1850, and "The Religion of the Heart; a Manual of Faith and Duty." He became the recipient, in 1847, of a pension of £200 per annum from the crown.

HUNT, WILLIAM HOLMAN, a distinguished living English artist, and one of the founders of the new school of art generally known as the Pre-Raphaelite. He has produced many fine works.

Born in London, 1827.

HUNT, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 935 square miles. Pop. 17,230. Greensville is the capital.

HUNTE, hoon'-tai, a river of Germany, which, rising in the Osnabruck marshes, in the Prussian province of Hanover, joins the Weser about 15 miles from Bremen, after a course of nearly 130 miles.

HUNTER, JOHN, hun'-ter, a celebrated anatomist and surgeon. He was one of ten children, and his father dying when he was young, his education was greatly neglected. He worked for some time as a cabinet-maker; but solicited his brother William, who had attained considerable reputation as an anatomist and physician, to take him as an assistant, which was granted, and in 1748 he removed to London. The year following he became a student at Chelsea Hospital, where he assiduously studied the rudiments of surgery. He afterwards attended St. Bartholomew's Hospital; and in 1756 was appointed house-surgeon of St. George's Hospital. In the same year, he assisted his brother in his school, and acted as demonstrator to his course of lectures. He laboured for 10 years on human anatomy, and not only made himself master of the science as it was then known, but added to it several important discoveries. He also dissected a large number of animals, which laid the foundation of his collection of comparative anatomy. In 1760 he was appointed an army surgeon, and went in that capacity to Belleisle and Portugal. On his return to England, he fixed his residence in London, and taught anatomy and surgery with the highest reputation. In 1767 he was admitted fellow of the Royal Society, and the year following his brother resigned to him his house in Jermyn Street. In 1768 he was chosen one of the surgeons of St. George's Hospital; in 1766 he was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to his majesty. His collection having become extremely large, he took a house in Leicester Square, and erected a building adjoining it for a museum, which was completed in 1785. In 1790 he was appointed inspector-general of hospitals, and surgeon-general of the army. He made more than 10,000 preparations, illustrative of human and comparative anatomy, which form the nucleus of the great collection in the Royal College of Surgeons, Lincoln's Inn Fields. His contributions to the "Philosophical Transactions" were numerous and interesting. His other works are, a treatise on the "Natural History of the Human Teeth," "Observations on the Animal Economy;" a treatise on the "Blood, Inflammation, and Gunshot-wounds."

Born at Long Calderwood, Lanarkshire, 1728; died in London, 1793.

HUNTER, WILLIAM, elder brother of the preceding, a celebrated English anatomist and physician. He was educated for the church, but an acquaintance with Dr. Cullen inclining him to the study of physic, he resided with the doctor three years. In 1740 he removed to Edinburgh, where he pursued his studies with intense application, and the year following visited London. Soon after this he was taken by Dr. Douglas into his house as dissector, and also as tutor to his son. In 1746, he was appointed lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent Garden, and the year following was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons. In 1750, he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow, and became very distinguished as a physician, particularly in midwifery. In 1762, he was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen, and the same year he published his "Medical Commentaries." In 1767, he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and furnished the Transactions of that body with many valuable papers. In 1768, he was appointed professor of anatomy to the Royal Academy, which office he discharged with great reputation, adapting his anatomical knowledge to the arts of painting and sculpture. In 1781, he succeeded Dr. Fothergill as president of the Society of Physicians in London, and his fame having spread through Europe, he was chosen member of several foreign societies. Dr. Hunter formed a splendid anatomical museum in his house in Windmill Street, at an immense expense; after which, he extended his collection to natural history and general science. He also possessed a magnificent collection of Greek and Latin books, a cabinet of ancient medals, and a large stock of shells, corals, and other curious productions. This museum he bequeathed, at his death, to his nephew Dr. Baillie and Mr. Cruikshank, for thirty years, after which it was to go to the university of Glasgow.

Born at Long Calderwood, Lanarkshire, 1718; died in London, 1783.

HUNTER, a county of New South Wales, Victoria. It is mountainous, and the chief rivers are the Hunter and the Goulburn. Area, 2,050 square miles. Pop. 1,200. The chief place is Jerry's Plains.

HUNTER ISLANDS, a group of three principal and several small islands in Bass's Strait, between Australia and Tasmania. Hunter, the largest of the group, is 16 miles long and 4 broad. The two next in size are Albatross and Three Hummock. The last derives its name from three conical hills, from about 600 feet to 800 in height. The other islands rise to a considerable elevation. There is good anchorage between Hunter and Three Hummock. Lat. about 40° 22′ S. Lon. 144° 40′ E.

HUNTERDON, hun'-ter-don, a county of New Jersey, United States. Pop. 38,570.

HUNTINGDON, hun'-ting-don, a market-town, parliamentary and municipal borough, and capital of Huntingdonshire, on the Ouse, here crossed by three bridges, which connect it with Godmanchester. It has two ancient and other churches and chapels, town-hall, theatre, and gaols, also a grammar-school with an endowment of £100 a year and two exhibitions for Cambridge University. Manf. Iron, bricks, oil, and oilcake. Pop. 4,229.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

HUNTINGDON, a county of Lower Canada, on the S. side of the St. Lawrence. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 15,500.

HUNTINGDON, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 730 square miles. Pop. 33,954. The capital is Huntingdon.

HUNTINGDON, SELINA, Countess of, one of the great patrons of Methodism, was the second daughter of Washington Shirley, Earl Ferrers, and married Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, in 1728, who died in 1746. After a dangerous illness, she became deeply religious, and during the remainder of her life, supported George Whitefield, and a number of itinerant preachers, and built several chapels in various parts of the kingdom. She established and maintained a college at Treveeca, in Wales, and liberally assisted students and others belonging to her "Connection." Her religious sentiments were rigidly Calvinistic, and she was the patroness of all of that persuasion.

Born 1707; died 1791.

HUNTINGDONSHIRE, a county of England, inclosed by the counties of Cambridge, Northampton, and Bedford. The boundaries are mostly artificial and very irregular, but its shape, on the whole, is somewhat similar to that of a square. It is almost entirely an agricultural county. The N. and N.E. parts consist of fens, which are a portion of the midland division of that extensive tract denominated the Bedford Level, which see. Towards the W. and S. the land rises considerably, leaving an intermediate valley for the waters of the Ouse. The soil is mostly clay, and there are no minerals of importance in the county. In the fens, the dampness and want of pure water operate prejudicially on the health. The uplands originally formed one large forest, and were peculiarly adapted to the pleasures of the chase. Up to the reign of Henry II. it was under forest law; and from the sport of hunting, the county derived its name.

Rivers.—The Ouse and the Nene are the most important streams. There were formerly several lakes, or meres, the largest of which was Whittlesea Mere, which have been drained and brought into cultivation.

Pro.—Wheat, oats, beans, turnips, rape, hemp, and mustard-seed. Butter is made in large quantities, and horses, cattle, and sheep of mixed breeds are extensively bred. The most celebrated article is the cheese termed Stilton, which was formerly made at a village of that name.

Area.—377 square miles.

Pop.—59,614.
Chief Towns.—HUNTINGDON, ST. IVES, ST. NEOTS, RAMSAY, and KIMBOLTON.
Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county

HUNTINGTON, hunt-ing-ton, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 384 square miles. Pop. 21,000. The capital is Huntington.

HUNTINGTON, WILLIAM, a popular preacher, who worked as a day labourer and coal heaver, but afterwards attracted attention by his preaching, and induced some wealthy person to erect a chapel in Gray's Inn Lane. He added "S. S." for "sinner saved," to his name, and wrote "The Bank of Faith," and other works which had a great sale. He was an illiterate, vulgar man, but exercised a great influence over a certain order of minds.
Born 1744; died 1813.

HUNTLY, hunt-le, a market-town and burgh of barony of Scotland, Aberdeenshire, 20 miles S.W. of Banff. The ruins of Huntly Castle are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,570.

HUNTSVILLE, a city of Alabama, United States, capital of Madison county, 10 miles N. of Tennessee river. A large trade is carried on in cotton and imported goods. Pop. 5,000, about half coloured.

HUNYAD, hoon-yad', a county in the south-west of Transylvania. It is mountainous, being traversed by part of the Carpathian chain. The capital is DEBA. Area, about 2,000 square miles. Pop. 97,000.

HUNYÁDY, JÁNOS, hoon-ya'-de, a great Hungarian leader, whose origin is doubtful, but supposed to have been the son of the Emperor Sigismund, by a Wallachian lady. He distinguished himself against the Turks in 1444, by forcing them to sue for an armistice of ten years; and successfully shielded Hungary from the lawless attacks of her own nobles. He was defeated, however, at Varna, and captured by the Voiod of Wallachia, who subsequently set him free. He was elected governor of Hungary during the minority of Ladislaus V., and in 1447, fought the battle of Rigomagö, which was lost by treachery. Shortly after the storming of Belgrade, one of his greatest achievements, he died a victim to dysentery.
Born towards the close of the 14th century.

HURD, RICHARD, hurd, bishop of Worcester, an English divine and writer, who, after leaving the university of Cambridge, in 1757, became rector of Thurcaston, in Leicestershire. In 1775 he was ordained bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence he was translated to Worcester in 1781. In 1783 he refused the archbishopric of Canterbury. His literary works are numerous; "The Golden Age of Elizabeth," "Letters on Romance and Chivalry," "Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry," and "Twelve Discourses on the Prophecies," being among the chief of them.
Born at Congreve, Staffordshire, 1720; died 1808.

HURDWAR, or HARDWAR, hoord-war', a town of British India, presidency of Bengal, on the right bank of the Ganges, 105 miles N.E. of Delhi, at the point where the river emerges from the mountains, and more than 1,000 feet above the sea level. It is one of the most renowned sacred places in India, and is the great resort of Hindoo pilgrims. Here, in the spring, the largest fair in India takes place, no less than 200,000 or 300,000 attending it. Every twelfth year this number is increased to nearly 2,000,000 pilgrims and merchants, who trade in horses, camels, and cattle; shawls, drugs, dried fruits, &c. Lat. 29° 57′ N. Lon. 78° 14′ E.

HURON, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 850 square miles. Pop. 20,089. Port Austin is the capital.

HURON, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 455 square miles. Pop. 31,609. Norwalk is the capital.

HURON, a county of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada. Area, 1,288 square miles. Pop. 26,500. Goderich is the capital.

HURREEANAH, hoor-re-a'-na, a district of British India, North-West Provinces. The soil is rich, being formed chiefly by alluvial matter brought down by rivers from the lower ranges of the Himalayas. There are extensive jungles, the haunt of tigers and other wild animals. Area, 3,300 square miles. Pop. 225,000, HURRUR, or HARAR, hur-rur', a town of East Africa, at an elevation of about 5,500 feet above the sea level. There are several mosques. There is a considerable traffic, and weaving affords employment to many of the inhabitants, who are a peculiar race, speaking a dialect different from that of the neighbouring people. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 9° 20′ N. Lon. 42° 17′ E.

HUSH, hoosh, a town of Moldavia, near the right bank of the Pruth, 42 miles S.E. of Jassy. There is a large trade in excellent tobacco. Pop. 4,000.

HUSKISSON, WILLIAM, hus'-kis-son, an English statesman, who studied medicine in Paris, and attracted attention by his speeches on political economy in the Club of 1789. He also took part in the storming of the Bastile. He began his political career in 1792 as secretary to Lord Gower, ambassador to the French court. He was under-secretary of state for War, and secretary of the Treasury, in the Pitt administration. In 1823 he became president of the Board of Trade, secretary of state for the colonies in 1827, and foreign secretary in the following year, and both in the ministry and in the house of commons, where he had sat since 1796, distinguished himself by his profound knowledge of finance and political economy. As a follower of Adam Smith, he combated the prohibitive system of commerce, advocated the relaxation of customs duties and those on colonial produce. He met his death in an unfortunate manner, having been knocked down and run over by a locomotive at Parkside, near Liverpool, at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway.
Born at Birch-Moreton Court, Worcestershire, 1770: died 1830.

HUSS, JOHN, huss, Bohemian reformer and martyr. He was educated at Prague, where he was ordained in 1400, and became rector of the university, and confessor to the queen. Meeting with some of the writings of Wickliffe, he perceived the errors of popery, and by his means a reformation was commenced in the university of Prague, to check which, the archbishop issued two decrees, whereby the new doctrines spread the more. The pope then granted a bull suppressing these errors and Huss, being cited to appear at Rome, was excommunicated for disobedience. He continued to propagate his principles, and was supported therein by Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, till 1414, when he was summoned to appear before the council of Constance. The emperor Sigismund sent him a safe-conduct, promising to preserve him in going to and returning from the council; but the members of that assembly, in violation of this pledge, decreed "that no faith is to be kept with heretics;" and as Huss refused to retract his opinions, he was degraded, and burnt alive. After his death a civil war broke out in Bohemia, in which those who followed the martyr's doctrines, and who were called Hussites, fought against King Wenceslaus. The struggle lasted till 1437. Huss's works were printed at Nuremburg in 1558.

Born at Hussinecz, Bohemia, 1373; died 1415.

HUSSIATYN, huss-é-a-tin, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, near the Russian frontier. There is a fine baronial castle. Pop. 2,700.

HUSSINECZ, hoos'-se-nets, a market-town of Prachin, Bohemia, 75 miles from Prague, celebrated for being the birthplace of John Huss.

HUSUM, hoo'-soom, a seaport of Prussia, at the mouth of the Aue, on the W. coast of the duchy of Schleswig, 20 miles N. of Schleswig. Manf. Leather and tobacco. There is a trade in wool and cattle. Pop. 5,000.

HUTCHESON, FRANCIS, hutch'-e-son, a philosophical writer, the son of a Presbyterian minister in the north of Ireland, who received his education at the university of Glasgow, after which he became pastor of a dissenting congregation in Dublin, where he also kept an academy, till 1729. He afterwards removed to Glasgow, on being appointed professor of philosophy in the university of that city. He is considered as the pioneer of the Scotch school of metaphysics, but it is as a moral philosopher that he is most distinguished. His chief works are, "An Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue;" "A Treatise on the Passions;" and "A System of Moral Philosophy."

Born in Ireland, 1694; died at Glasgow, 1747.

HUTCHINSON, ANNE, a Lincolnshire woman, who acquired celebrity in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1636, by claiming to be a medium of divine revelations, and set up as an exponent of Antinomian doctrines. She was subsequently banished from the colony, as her teachings were condemned as wicked. After residing for some time in Rhode Island, she removed to a Dutch settlement in the colony of New York, where she and fifteen members of her family were murdered by the Indians.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN, hutch'-in-son, a philological and biblical writer, founder of the sect known as Hutchinsonians. He received a liberal education, after which he became steward, first to a country gentleman, and next to the duke of Somerset, by whose influence he obtained a sinecure appointment from government. In 1754, he published the first part of his "Moses's Principia," in which he ridiculed Woodward's "Natural History of the Earth." He also attempted to refute Sir Isaac Newton's doctrine of gravitation. In the second part he maintained, in opposition to the Newtonian system, that a plenum and the air are the principles of scripture philosophy. In this work he intimated that the idea of the Trinity might be taken from the grand agents in the natural system,—fire, light, and spirit; which is said to have made an impression on the mind of Dr. Clarke. Mr. Hutchinson was a great admirer of the Hebrew language, and maintained that all its radicals were to be explained by their etymologies; by the aid of which he fancied that he had discovered the true system of natural philosophy in the writings of Moses. His works are very curious, though obscurely written.

Born at Spennithorne, Yorkshire, 1674; died 1737.

HUTCHINSON, a county of Dakota territory, United States. It is almost unpopulated. Area, 430 square miles. Pop. 5,573.

HUTTEN, ULRIC VON, hoot'-ten, a German reformer and author. He studied at Cologne and Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he took the degree of M.A. at the age of 18. He then went to Italy; but receiving no supplies from his parents, he enlisted in the army, and served at the siege of Parma. In 1509, he returned to Germany, and was reduced to such poverty as to be obliged to beg his bread. In 1512, he published a Latin poem in praise of the emperor Maximilian, which gained him reputation and friends. The same year he went to Pavia to study the law: but falling into indigence, he again entered the army. He soon obtained his discharge, and returned to his native country, where he embraced the doctrines of Luther, and wrote some elegant pieces in Latin. For his epigrams the emperor knighted him and made him poet laureate. In 1518, he discovered a manuscript of Livy, which he published, as he afterwards did Pliny, Quintilian, and Marcellinus. Being unusually frank in his utterances, and seizing every opportunity of teaching the new doctrines, he did much to prepare the way for, and promote the Reformation. His writings against the church of Rome were so severe, that the pope sent orders to the inquisitor to seize him; but Hutten fled into Switzerland with Erasmus.

Born at Steckelberg, Franconia, 1488; died in the isle of Ufenau, near Zurich, 1523.

HUTTON, CHARLES, an English mathematician, who, after receiving some education, became teacher of a school at Jesmond, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He afterwards removed to the latter place, and opened a school on his own account, with considerable success in his undertaking. He published several mathematical works, and, in 1773, offered himself as a candidate for the professorship of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy of Woolwich, and passed his examination for the post in the most successful manner. He was made fellow of the Royal Society, and, a few years afterwards, foreign secretary to the same body. His mathematical works were both numerous and valuable. He was made LL.D. of the university of Edinburgh in 1779, and is said to have received the sum of £6,000 for condensing the "Philosophical Transactions." His "Course of Mathematics" is still one of the text-books of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. Among his published works are, "Tables of Products and Powers of Numbers;" "Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary;" "Recreations in Mathematics and Natural Philosophy," &c.

Born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1737; died 1823.

HUTTON, JAMES, an English chemist and geologist, who studied at the Edinburgh university, and afterwards at Leyden, where in 1749 he took the degree of doctor of medicine. He wrote many works after his return to England, principally on agriculture, mineralogy, mathematics, and chemistry. His work entitled "Dissertations on the Philosophy of Light and Heat" was first published in 1794.

Born at Edinburgh, 1726; died 1797.

HUXLEY, THOMAS HENRY, hux'-le, the eminent naturalist and anatomist, was educated at Ealing, near London, and, after studying medicine at the Charing Cross Hospital, he, in 1846, entered the royal navy, and did duty in the medical service at Haslar. The Rattlesnake being in commission to make surveys on the eastern shores of Australia, Mr. Huxley was appointed assistant-surgeon on board, and during the survey made a valuable collection of marine animals, and gathered materials for scientific papers, which were published by the Royal and Linnæan Societies, and had the effect of making their author known throughout Europe. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1851, and in the following year was awarded a gold medal for the services which he had rendered to science. In 1854 he became professor of natural history in the Royal School of Mines. He is an LL.D. of Edinburgh, and in 1872 was lord rector of the university of Aberdeen. In 1858 he delivered his celebrated lecture "On the theory of the Vertebrate Skull," and amongst the more important of his works are "Man's Place in Nature," "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy," &c. He was an active member of the first school-board of London.

Born at Ealing, Middlesex, 1825.

HUY, hoo'-e (almost we), a town of Belgium, situate in a beautiful valley, 18 miles S.W. of Liege. It stands on the Meuse, and is, by that river, divided into two parts. This town is of considerable antiquity; but it has greatly fallen into decay. Manf. Paper, leather, soap, salt, zinc, tinwares, ironmongery, and pipes. Pop. 8,000.—This place has withstood several sieges, and had its fortifications dismantled in 1718. In 1815, however, its castle was rebuilt.

HUYGHENS, Constantine, hoi'-gens, lord of Zuylichem. He was secretary to the prince of Orange, and president of the council, and is known by fourteen books of Latin poems, under the title of "Momenta Desultoria," consisting of epigrams and miscellaneous pieces.

Born at the Hague, 1596; died 1617.

HUYGHENS, Christian, an eminent mathematician, son of the above, who, from his youth, evinced great aptitude for mathematical science, and in 1651 gave a specimen of his abilities in a book on the "Quadrature of Circles, Ellipses, &c." Not long after, he published a treatise on horology, in which he described the model of a newly-invented pendulum for clocks. In 1659 appeared his "System of Saturn," giving an account of the discovery which he made of a satellite attending that planet. In 1660 he visited England, and was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. About the same time, with Wallis and Wren, he discovered the laws of collision of elastic bodies. He afterwards resided at Paris, on the invitation of Colbert, who gave him a pension, and he was also admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His "Cosmotheoros; or a Treatise on the Plurality of Worlds," was printed the same year, and in 1703 appeared his "Opuscula Posthuma."

Born at the Hague, 1629; died at the same place, 1695.

HUYSUM, Jan van, hoi'-som, a Dutch painter of flower and fruit pieces. His reputation was so great that he fixed immoderate prices on his works. He would never suffer any person to see him while he was painting; so that his method of mixing his colours was an impenetrable secret. His flower-pieces are exquisitely beautiful, as also are his landscapes and animals.

Born at Amsterdam, 1682; died in England, 1749.

HUZAREH COUNTRY, hus-ar-e', an extensive region of Afghanistan, supposed to be the Paropamisus of the Greeks. (See Afghanistan.)

HWANG-SHE-KANG, wang-she-kang', a town of China, province of Hoo-pih, or Yang-tze-Kiang, 25 miles S.E. of Woo-chang. The town is handsome and clean, and there is a fine river walk. A considerable trade is carried on in grain, cotton, and indigo, and coal is worked in the vicinity.

HYACINTH, hi'-a-sinth, in Greek mythology a young Lacedæmonian prince of great beauty, son of Amyclas. He was the favourite of both Apollo and of Zypher, but himself preferred the former. Zephyr is said to have killed him from jealousy; but Apollo transformed him into the flower called after him, engraving on its petals the two first letters of his name. He was worshipped as a divinity at Sparta.

Born at Orleans, March 10, 1827.

HYDE, hide, a town of Cheshire, 7 miles E S E. of Manchester. Pop. 28,629, chiefly employed in coal-mines, cotton-mills, print and bleach-works.

HYDE, Earl of Clarendon. (See Clarendon.)

HYDE, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 7,765.

HYDE, a new county of Dakota territory, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles.

HYDER-ALI, or Haidar, hi'-der-a'-le, a Mahometan prince of India. His father was a general of the rajah of Mysore, and on his death, in 1751, he joined his brother, who was allied with the French. He succeeded his brother as generalissimo of the rajah of Mysore's armies, and in 1759 dispossessed his master. He distinguished himself in a number of daring exploits, for which he was raised to the pinnacle of rank and power. He carried on a successful war against the Mahrattas for many years, and even threatened the annihilation of the English settlements in India. A treaty was concluded in 1769, which was broken in 1780, and the war renewed with vigour; but the skill of Sir Eyre Coote proved superior to Hyder, who left the military operations to his son Tippoo Saib. He was a man of great resolution, but of mild character, tolerant of all religions, and promoted agriculture and commerce.

Born 1728; died 1782.

HYDERABAD, or HAIDARABAD, hi-der-ra-bad', an extensive province of India, formerly Telingana, and afterwards Golconda, confined to the country between the rivers Godavery and Kistna. It forms the S.E. portion of the Nizam's dominions. Ext. About 350 miles in extreme length, and about 300 in breadth. Pop. 9,845,594.

HYDERABAD, or HAIDARABAD, (the lion's town), capital of the above province, on the right bank of the Mussi, about six miles from Golconda, at an elevation of 1,800 feet. It is a city of about 7 miles in circumference, and is surrounded by a stone wall. It contains two palaces, some handsome mosques, and there is a fine building erected by the Nizam for the British resident. On the opposite side of the river, which is crossed by a granite bridge of nine arches, there are some huge tanks in the neighbourhood, one of which measures three miles by two, and another twenty miles round. Manf. Unimportant, and principally consisting of silks interwoven with gold, turbans, and small ornaments. Pop. of city, 123,675; including Secunderabad and other suburbs, 354,962.

HYDERABAD, capital of the division of Scinde, India. The fortress stands on a rock, the foot of which is washed by a branch of the river Indus. A good bazaar and several handsome mosques are inside the fort; but the houses are mostly composed of brick, wood, and clay, and, taken in conjunction with the narrowness and dirtiness of the streets, present an extremely mean appearance. There is here a palace of the Ameers, a square brick building inlaid with coloured porcelain tiles. Manf. Arms, and ornamental silks and cottons. Pop. of the city, 48,153; of the district, 754,624.

HYDRA, or IDRA, hi'-dra, an island in the Grecian archipelago, lying off the E. coast of the Morea, between the gulfs of Nauplia and Ægina. It is about 10 miles long and 2 broad. Its town, called also Hydra, is built on the acclivity of a number of pyramidal rocks, rising in an amphitheatre around its port. The houses are almost all of stone. The port is in the form of a crescent, and the harbour, though not large, is deep and commodious. Manf. Silk and cotton stuffs, soap, and leather. It trades not only to the ports of the Archipelago and Mediterranean, but to France, Spain, Italy, and other countries. Pop. 11,700. Lat. 37° 20′ N. Lon. 23° 30′ E.

HYDRA, in Greek mythology, a huge monster which infested the neighbourhood of Lake Lerna, in Peloponnesus, the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon.

HYÈRES. (See HIERES.)

HYGIEIA, hi-ge'-ya, in Greek mythology, the goddess of health, daughter of Æsculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients.

HYKSHOS, hik'-shos, or the Shepherd Kings, an Egyptian dynasty. Great discrepancy exists as to the period of their rule; but they formed probably the 17th dynasty, and the dominion ceased about 1500 years B.C.

HYLLUS, hil'-lus, in mythology, son of Hercules and Dejanira, who became chief of the Heraclidæa.

HYMEN, or HYMENÆUS, hi'-men, hi-me-ne'-us, in Greek mythology, the god of marriage, son of Bacchus and Venus, or, according to another version, of Apollo and one of the Muses.

HYMETTUS, hi-met'-tus, a mountain famed for its marble and honey. It is now called Telo Vouni, and is situated to the S.E. of Athens.

HYPATIA, hi-pai'-she-a, an illustrious female, was the daughter of Theon, an eminent mathematician and philosopher of Alexandria, whom she succeeded in the government of the new Platonic school in that city, had a number of disciples, and became very celebrated for her lectures on Plato and Aristotle, both at Alexandria and Athens. Synesius in particular, who afterwards became a Christian bishop, celebrated her praises in the most glowing terms. Orestes, the governor of Alexandria, had a high respect for Hypatia, and frequently consulted her on matters of importance. Between the governor and the patriarch Cyril there was a bitter enmity, which broke out into open war, and the monks, siding with their chief, assembled in a riotous manner against Orestes, who was obliged to fly from the city. They then seized Hypatia, and having torn her in pieces, burnt her mangled limbs to ashes. She wrote a commentary on Diophantus, and other works, which have been lost. Her life is the subject of a fine romance by the Rev. Charles Kingsley.

Born at Alexandria, between 370-380; died at the same place, 415.

HYPERIDES, hi-per'-i-dees, an Athenian orator, the disciple of Isocrates and Plato. He was for a long time the rival of Demosthenes, and distinguished himself by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the secrets of his country, he cut out his tongue. Only two of his numerous orations remain, which are admired for the sweetness and elegance of their style.

Died 322 B.C.

HYPERION, hi-peer'-e-on, a son of Cœlus and Terra, married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the Sun, and the Moon. Hyperion is often confounded by the poets with Helios, the sun.

HYRTL, JOSEPH, hir'-tel, an eminent anatomist, distinguished for his accurate and beautiful studies, and who made the anatomy of the ear a subject of particular investigation. He also made useful discoveries in, and contributed largely to, our knowledge of the anatomy of fish. His books, "Lehrbuch der Anatomie," and "Handbuch der Topographischen Anatomie," are text books in the German universities, and are used in English colleges.

Born at Eisenstadt, Hungary, 1811.

HYTHE, hithe, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and market-town on the coast of Kent, and one of the Cinque Ports, at the foot of a steep hill near Romney Marsh, and 11 miles from Dover. The church is a large cruciform structure, in the early English style, with a tower at the west end. In a vault or crypt under the chancel, is an immense quantity of human bones, ranged in a pile, traditionally said to be the remains of persons slain in a battle between the Britons and an invading army of Danes in the 5th century. It is a resort for seabathing, and in the neighbourhood is the government school of musketry. Pop. 3,360.—A station on the South-Eastern railway.

HYWEL AB MORGAN MAWR, hoo-el', prince of Glamorgan, in 1030. He is represented as having been one of the wisest and best of the British princes. He died at the great age of 130 years. In this line the following instances of longevity are mentioned, but on probably doubtful authority:—Morgan Mawr, aged 129; Hywel ab Rhys, 124; and Arthvael ab Rhys, 120.

Born 913; died 1045.

HYWEL AB OWAIN GWYNEDD, a prince of North Wales, some of whose poems are included in the Welsh Archæology. On the death of his father, in 1169, he endeavoured to ascend the throne in place of his brother, but was defeated and wounded; on which he went to Ireland, where he died in 1171.

I.

[For places not found in I, look in J and Y: Russian names in JE are sometimes begun with a simple E.]

IALTA, JALTA, or YALTA, a town of the Crimea, of some military and naval importance.

IAMBLICHUS, i-am'-ble-kus, king of Arabia, who was deprived of his estates by Augustus, after the battle of Actium, for supporting the cause of Marc Antony; but his son was restored to the throne by the same emperor.
Lived in the 18th century B.C.

IAMBLICHUS, a Greek author, and a musician by profession. He wrote several works in Greek; among others, one entitled "Babylonicus," preserved in the library of the Escurial in Spain.
Lived in the 2nd century.

IAMBLICHUS, a Platonic philosopher, who studied under Porphyry. He gained many disciples by his eloquence and probity. He was the author of the "Life of Pythagoras," an "Exhortation to Philosophy," and a protest against Porphyry's letter on the Egyptian mysteries.
Died 339 B.C.

IAMBLICHUS, a Greek author, was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and flourished in the reigns of Constantine and Julian the Apostate.
Died 363.

IAMBOLI, yam-bo'-le, a town of Rumelia, European Turkey, on the left bank of the Tondja, 55 miles N. of Adrianople. Manf. Woollens.

IANICULUM. (See JANICULUM.)

IAR, or YAR, yar, a Russian word, signifying "height," commencing a great number of geographical names.

IARBAS, i-ar'-bas, king of Gætulia, who sold to Dido the land upon which she built Carthage. He wished to marry that princess, but she, rather than consent, killed herself. Virgil, in his Æneid, says that Iarbas was defeated by his rival Æneas, and that Dido did not kill herself till she had been abandoned by the latter.

IAROSLAV. (See JAROSLAV.)

IASION, or IASIUS, i-ai'-se-on, in Greek mythology, a son of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himself to agriculture. He married the goddess Cybele, or Ceres, by whom he had two sons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom some have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worship and mysteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had also a daughter, whom he exposed in a forest as soon as born; but the child was suckled by a she-bear, and afterwards rendered herself famous under the name of Atalanta. Iasion was killed with a thunderbolt by Jupiter, and, after his death, ranked among the gods by the inhabitants of Arcadia.

IBA, i'-bai, a town of the island Luzon, one of the Philippines, near the coast, 80 miles N.W. of Manilla. Pop. 4,000.

IBABA, i-bai'-ba, a large town of Ambara, Abyssinia, on the southern shore of Lake Dembea, 70 miles S.W. of Gondar.

IBAGUE, i-bag'-oo-ai, a town of Colombia, South America, 70 miles S.W. of Bogota. There are rich mines of gold, silver, and copper. Pop. 5,000.

IBARRA, JOACHIM, e-bar'-ra, a Spanish printer, whose editions of the classical authors of his country are regarded as marvels of the typographical art.
Born at Saragossa, 1725; died at Madrid, 1785.

IBARRA, or SAN MIGUEL DE IBARRA, an important town of Ecuador, South America, situated on the base of the volcano of Imhabura, and 60 miles N.E. of Quito. Manf. Wool and cotton goods. Pop. 13,000.

IBEK, COTHEDDIN IBEK, i'-bek, the chief slave of Schehabeddin, sultan of India, on whose death he usurped the throne, and added to his dominions many provinces of Hindostan. An account of his conquests was written in a volume entitled "Tage al Mather."

IBEK, AZEDDIN IBEK, or IBEG, first sultan of the Mameluke Turks in Egypt. He had been an officer in the court of Malek al Saleh, sultan of Egypt; but, on his death, he married his widow, and became partner with her in the throne; but she caused him to be assassinated.

IBERIA, i-beer'-e-a, an ancient name of Spain, derived from the river Iberus.

IBERIAN PENINSULA, the S.W. peninsula of Europe, occupied by the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal.

IBERVILLE, i'-ber-vil, a county of the province of Quebec, dominion of Canada. Area, 189 square miles. Pop. 14,500, nearly all of French descent. The capital is St. Athanase.

IBERVILLE, a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 17,544. The capital is Plaquemine.

IBI, é-be, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, 18 miles N.W. of Alicante. It is situate on the side of a conical hill, and has spacious streets and a large parish church surmounted by a tower. Manf. Linen; and there are several oil and flour mills. A trade is carried on in corn, wine, wool, and cattle. Pop. 3,000.

IBO, i'-bo, one of the Querimbo Islands, Mozambique Channel, off the east coast of Africa. Lat. 12° 20′ S. Lon. 40° 38′ E.

IBRAH, é-brauh, an old town of Arabia, 70 miles S.W. of Muscat. There is a market, well attended by Bedouins.

IBRAHIM, é-brau-heem, a very common name with the Arabs and Turks. It is a variation of Abraham, and is more generally used as an individual than as a surname.

IBRAHIM, the son of Massoud, eighth caliph of the dynasty of Gaznevides, succeeded his brother Ferokzad. He acquired great reputation as a just and pious prince, notwithstanding the frequent wars he made on the borders of Hindostan, in which he gained such advantages as to acquire the name of the "Conqueror." He reigned 42 years, during which time he erected a number of cities, mosques, and hospitals; he was also a liberal encourager of arts and letters.
Died 1098.

IBRAHIM, the son of the caliph Mahadi, brother of Haroun-al-Raschid, and uncle of Amin and Mamon. He was an excellent poet and musician, and the first orator of his time. He was proclaimed caliph at Bagdad, on the death of his nephew Amin, in 817; but Mamon marching from Khorassan to Bagdad with a powerful army, Ibrahim thought it prudent to abdicate the throne.
Died at Samara, in 839.

IBRAHIM, emperor of the Turks, was the son of Achmet, and succeeded his brother Achmet IV. in 1640. He besieged and took the capital of Candia from the Venetians, in 1644; but his cruelties and debaucheries were so great that the soldiers strangled him.
Died 1649.

IBRAHIM BEY, a famous Mameluke chieftain, who for some time governed Cairo, in conjunction with Mourad Bey, but afterwards became sole ruler, and head of the Mamelukes. The French, when they invaded Egypt, defeated him, in 1799, at El-Arish. He escaped the general massacre of the Mamelukes in 1805, by refusing to accept Mahomet Ali's invitation to visit Cairo with the rest of his ill-fated followers, who perished there.
Born in Circassia, about 1735; died in exile, in Nubia, 1817.

IBRAHIM EFFENDI, a native of Poland, who attained by his courage and talents to the highest dignities in the Ottoman empire. He established the first printing-press in Turkey, in 1728. The count de Bonneval furnished him with the types, and the first work he produced was a treatise on the military art. He afterwards published the account of an expedition against the Afghans, a Turkish grammar, and a history of Turkey.
Lived in the 18th century.

IBRAHIM IMAM, the chief priest of the Mahometan religion, was a descendant of the illustrious house of the Abasides. His reputation and authority became so great, that Marvan, or Hemar, the last caliph of the Ommiades, caused him to be put to death by thrusting his head into a bag of lime.
Died 748.

IBRAHIM PASHA, an Egyptian viceroy, and adopted son of Mohammed Ali, in 1831, took Acre by storm, and conquered the whole of Syria. A prince of great gallantry and astuteness, he endeavoured to raise Egypt to the dignity of an independent kingdom, but was unsuccessful.
Born 1789; died at Cairo, 1848.

IBROS, é-bros, a town of Spain, in the province of Andalusia, on a height near the Guadalimar, 20 miles N.E. of Jaen. It is tolerably well built, and has a parish church, court-house, prison, and schools. Manf. Soap: and there are numerous flour and oil-mills. Pop. 3,600.

IBYCUS, ib'-i-kus, a Greek lyric poet, who was murdered by some robbers; but, in his dying moments, observing a number of cranes flying over his head, he implored them to be his avengers. Some time after, these murderers walking in Rhegium, seeing some cranes in the air, one of them cried to his companions, "Behold the witnesses of the death of Ibycus!" These words, being overheard, excited suspicion; they were apprehended, and, being tortured, confessed their crime, for which they were put to death.
Lived about 540 B.C.

ICA, ik'-a, a town of Peru, South America, capital of a province of the same name, 162 miles S.E. of Lima. It is one of the oldest towns in the country, having been founded in 1563. Pop. 6,000.

ICANA, ik-á'-na, a river of Brazil, South America, rising near the frontiers of Colombia, and flowing in a south-easterly direction to the Rio Negro, which it joins on the left bank, near the town of San Felipe. The length of its course is about 300 miles.

ICARUS, ik'-a-rus, in Greek mythology, son of Dædalus, who, to escape the resentment of Minos, fled with wings from Crete. His flight, being too high, proved fatal to him; for the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into the Ægean Sea, and was drowned near the island which was called after his name.

ICELAND, ice'-land, a large island in the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Denmark, and situate between the N. Atlantic and the Arctic oceans, 600 miles distant from Norway, and 500 from the N. of Scotland. It more properly belongs to America than to Europe. Its distance from the colonised part of Greenland is 166 miles; from the uninhabited part only 95; from the Faroe Isles, 220; and from Drontheim, in Norway, 330. There is considerable coast-line on the S.E., almost unbroken, but in every other direction presenting a continued succession of bold promontories and deep bays or fiords. On the north-west side is a large peninsula, attached to the main part of the island by an isthmus scarcely 5 miles in breadth. The length from east to west is about 310 miles, breadth 210 miles. The surface of this island is in the highest degree rugged and mountainous; its soil is so ungrateful, that it produces no corn, and hardly any of the necessaries of life, while volcanic eruptions are continually occurring in many of its parts. No part of the globe presents such a number of volcanic mountains, so many boiling springs, or such immense tracts of lava. Every hill almost is volcanic, and there are at least 30 with remarkable craters. Many of these mountains, too, are covered with perpetual snow and ice, which form immense glaciers, and take the common name of Jökull. The principal range runs from east to west, and the highest summits vary from 3,000 to 6,000 feet, and are called Skaptár, Snäfell, Eyjafjalla, Oeräfa (the culminating peak, 6,426 feet high), and Hecla. The last, which has an elevation of 5,095 feet, has, from its numerous and dreadful eruptions, become the most celebrated mountain of Iceland; but the eruptions of Shaptár-Jökull have been even more destructive.

Rivers and Lakes.—There are numerous rivers, mostly flowing in a northern or north-easterly direction. The Skjalfanda and the Jökulawe, on the north coast, have each a course of about 100 miles. The Jokuldalr and Lagarfijot, on the east coast, are upwards of 80 miles long, and the Thjorsa, on the south-west coast, has a course of more than 100 miles. The lakes are also numerous.

Hot Springs.—The hot springs in Iceland are all of different temperatures, from the temperature of milk to a state of violent ebullition. In some instances they are impregnated with sulphur and other mineral substances. The most remarkable of them are called the Great and New Geysers, a name derived from the Icelandic verb geysa, "to rage." These astonishing phenomena of nature throw into the air great jets of boiling water, accompanied with a noise like the firing of cannon, and a trembling of the adjacent ground. In the N.E. part of the island, near Myvatn, are three hot springs, hardly inferior to the Geysers; also a sulphur mountain, on which vast beds of sulphur are covered with so thin a crust as to be very dangerous to the passenger. At the north-east extremity of the island is the cavern of Sutzkelhir, formed of lava; whilst, on several parts of the coast, basaltic caves occur, not inferior in comparison to that of Fingal, in the island of Staffa.

Climate.—Not so severe as might be expected from its high latitude. Fogs are frequent; but the air, on the whole, is wholesome.

Zoology.—Reindeer and bears, which are sometimes brought to the island on the drifts of ice. With the exception of these, foxes are the only wild animals. The birds comprise eagles, hawks, falcons, and all kinds of sea-fowl, which are uncommonly abundant. Large flocks of swans, as well as wild ducks and geese, frequent the lakes and marshes. The down and feathers of the eider-duck form an important article of export. The streams are well supplied with salmon, and valuable fisheries of seals, torsk, and herrings are pursued along the coasts. The sheep upon the island have been estimated at upwards of 600,000, the horned cattle at 24,000, and the horses, small but vigorous animals, at 20,000. Reindeer have been introduced and naturalised. Seals and fish of nearly all kinds are found on the coast in abundance. Swans are found on the lakes, and eider-duck is an important article of the commerce of the island.

Pro.—No corn of any kind is raised; no woods are to be seen, but here and there a few stunted birch-trees. Grass, and a few hardy shrubs, are almost the only natural productions of the soil. Potatoes have been introduced, and cultivated with some success; and turnips, radishes, and similar roots thrive tolerably well. Pastures are found, which afford sustenance for the sheep and black cattle. There are few goats or pigs.

Minerals.—The most valuable is sulphur; the others are lignite, chalcedonies, rock-crystals, and the well-known double-refracting spar, for which this island has long been famous.

Trade.—The exports are fish of all kinds, oil, tallow, butter, wool, worsted stockings, down, and feathers; also the skins of sheep, foxes, and other animals. The annual value of the exports is about £900,000. Trade has been free since 1855, and there are 32 trading-stations, of which the principal is Bejkiavik.

Manf.—Entirely domestic, every family, within itself, being capable of supplying its own wants. Whatever surplus there may be consists of coarse woollens, mittens, and stockings.

Area.—30,000 square miles, less than the half of which is habitable.

Pop.—72,450, all Lutherans. The inhabitants are simple, pious, and intelligent.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are three bailiwicks, or principal divisions, subdivided into 19 smaller districts. The whole island forms one bishopric, divided into 253 parishes. The capital is REJKIAVIK, the only town in the island.

Lat. between 63° 24′ and 66° 33′ N. Lon. between 13° 31′ and 24° 17′ W.

History.—In 874, Iceland was taken possession of by a colony from Norway. In 1387 it was transferred, with Norway, to the crown of Denmark, with which it still remains, notwithstanding the union of Norway with Sweden. About the year 1530, the reformed religion was introduced, and a translation of the Bible into Icelandic appeared in 1584. The thousandth anniversary of the settlement of the island was celebrated, in 1874, by a visit from the king of Denmark.

ICENES, or ICENI, i-sē'-ni, a people of Britain, who revolted against their Roman rulers in the reign of Nero. (See BOADICEA.)

ICHANG, i'-chang, a town of China, province of Hoo-peh, on the left bank of the Yang-tze-Kiang. It is an important trading town. Lat. 30° 41′ N. Lon. 111° 3′ E. Pop. 34,000.

ICHENHAUSEN, ik-en-hau'-sen, a market-town of Bavaria, in Suabia, on the Ganz, 27 miles W. of Augsburg. Pop. 2,500.

ICHTIMAN, ik'-te-man, a town of Servia, 22 miles S.E. of Sophia. Pop. 5,000.

ICILIUS, LUCIUS, i-sil'-e-us, a Roman tribune, to whom Virginia was betrothed. When the latter was carried off by the decemvir Appius Claudius, he raised an army against the decemvirs, and, having caused their fall, was created, by the people, tribune for the second time. Sheridan Knowles has founded a tragedy, called "Virginius," upon these incidents, and Macaulay, in one of his ballads, commemorates the story of Virginius.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ICO, ē'-ko, a town of Brazil, on the right bank of the Salgado, 145 miles S.E. of Fortaleza. It is built almost entirely of wood, and, from its being encompassed by hills, the heat is almost insupportable. It has a trade in sugar, hides, cotton, and salt. Pop. 5,000.

ICOD, or FED-DE-LOS-VINOS, ē-cod, a town on the western side of Teneriffe, Canary Islands. It is well built, with a handsome and richly decorated church. The streets are steep and narrow. Manf. Taffetas, handkerchiefs, sashes, and other silk goods. The chief product of the neighbourhood is wine. Pop. 5,400.

ICONIUM, a town of Syria.

ICRICOK, ik'-re-kok, a town on the right bank of the Old Calabar river, west coast of Africa. There is a trade in cattle, sheep, and palm-oil. Lat. 5° 48′ N. Lon. 8° 10′ E.

ICY CAPE, ī'-se, a cape on the W. coast of N. America discovered by Captain Cook in 1778. Lat. 70° 20′ N. Lon. 161° 46′ E.

IDA, i'-da, a celebrated mountain of Asia Minor, about 30 miles from the site of ancient Troy. According to Greek legend, it was on Mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. From its great elevation, the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. The modern name is Kash-dagh. Lat. 36° 12′ N. Lon. 26° 54′ E.

IDA, a mountain in the centre of the island of Crete, now called Psilorite, with an elevation of 7,200 feet. The Greek legends say that Jupiter was educated here by the Corybantes, who, on that account, were called Idæi.

IDAHO, i'-da'-ho, a territory of the United States, formed, in 1863, of the eastern portion of Washington and Oregon territories, the western part of Nebraska, and a portion of northern Utah. It extends to the British possessions. There are lofty mountain ranges, and the river Salmon flows in some places between perpendicular cliffs, 2,000 feet high. Minerals. Gold in considerable quantities in the vicinity of the Salmon; coal, copper, iron, and salt. Area, 86,294 square miles. Pop. 32,610.

IDDAH, id'-da, capital of the kingdom of Eggarah, West Africa. It is situated on a cliff, nearly 200 feet high, overlooking the Niger. The houses are little better than conical mud huts, with palm-leaf roofs. Manf. cotton cloth, leather, and armour. Pop. 8,000, a fine and intelligent race. Lat. 7° 2′ N. Lon. 6° 45′ E.

IDELER, CHRISTIAN LUDWIG, i'-de-lair, a distinguished German chronologist and astronomer, who held a professorship in the University of Berlin in 1821. He wrote the "Historische Untersuchungen über die Astronomischer Beobachtungen der Sternnamen," and a handbook of mathematics, which is esteemed highly in English colleges.

Born 1766; died 1846.

IDOMENEUS, i-dom'-e-nuse, in Homeric legend, king of Crete, succeeded his father Deucalion on the throne, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war with a fleet of 90 ships. During this war he rendered himself famous by his valour. At his return he made a rash vow, in a dangerous tempest, to Neptune, that if he escaped he would offer to the god whatever living creature first presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. This was his son, who came to congratulate him on his safe return. Idomeneus performed his promise, but the inhumanity of this sacrifice rendered him so odious to his subjects that he was exiled from his country. Going to Italy, he founded a city called Salentum, in Calabria, where he died at an advanced age.

IDRIA, id'-re-a, a town of Austria, in Carniola, 28 miles N.E. of Trieste. The principal public buildings are an elegant church, castle, mining school, and hospital, and a dispensary. Manf. Silk, lace, and linen goods. Its chief claim to notice, however, are its mines of quicksilver, which, in the neighbourhood, employ the greater proportion of the inhabitants. About 400 tons are annually produced, and 60 tons of Cinnabar. Pop. 4,500.

IDRIS GAWR, i'-dris gour, a Welsh astronomer, who is ranked, with Gwidion ab Don and Gwyn ab Nudd, as the three great astronomers of Britain. A high mountain in Wales is still called Cader Idris, or the "seat of Idris." When he lived is unknown.

IDUMÆA, i-du-me'-a, an ancient district of Syria, now divided into two parts; that on the N. called Jebal, and that on the S. called Esh-Sherah, both occupied by Bedouin Arabs. It lies to the S. and S.W. of the Dead Sea.

IDUMEANS, or EDOMITES, ancient inhabitants of Palestine, said to be the descendants of Esau, who was surnamed Edom, "the red." They were at first established on the north of the Red Sea, but afterwards spread themselves over Arabia Petræa and the neighbouring countries. The name of Idumean Sea is sometimes given to the Red Sea.

IERMAK, TIMEFEEF, yer'-mak, hetman, or chief of the Cossacks of the Don, who, in 1580, undertook, at the head of six thousand men, the invasion of Siberia. After many fierce engagements, he penetrated with 500 horsemen as far as Sibir, the capital, which he took; very soon afterwards the khans of the neighbouring tribes tendered him their submission. Iermak, fearing that he should not be able to retain his conquests, solicited the aid of Ivan IV., czar of Russia, promising to become his vassal. The czar sent him reinforcements, but he was slain by a Tartar chief.

Born 1550; died 1584.

IFFLAND, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, if'-fland, a German author and actor, who became the first comedian of Germany. He subsequently produced a great number of dramas, was appointed director of the theatre at Mannheim, and afterwards of the court spectacles at Berlin. He brought out several adaptations from the French, and from the Italian comedies of Goldoni.

Born at Hanover, 1759; died 1814.

IGATIMI, eg-at'-e-me, a river of South America, rising in Paraguay, and flowing south and east joins the Parana, after a course of about 200 miles, much obstructed by cataracts, in lat. 24° 40′ S.

IGBEGBE, ig-beg-bai', a town of Western Africa, at the confluence of the Benuwe, and the Kwara, 240 miles above the point of discharge into the Gulf of Guinea. Pop. 4,000.

IGBO, ig-bo, a territory of Western Africa, extending from the Old Calabar river to the Korara. The inhabitants belong to different races.

IGLAU, ig'-lou, a fortified town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, on the right bank of the Iglawa, and capital of a circle of the same name, 50 miles W.N.W of Brunn. It consists of the old town and three suburbs. There are two very handsome churches, St. James and St. Ignatius, and four other churches, a barrack, formerly a Jesuit college, and several important public offices. Manf. Chiefly woollen goods. Pop. 20,000.

IGLESIAS, i-gle'-se-as, a town near the west coast of Sardinia, 32 miles N. W. of Cagliari. There are a cathedral, many churches, episcopal palace, several convents, and a college. A trade in wine is carried on. Pop. 11,133.

IGLO, or NEUDORF, ig'-lo, a town of Hungary, on the Hernad, 7 miles S. of Leutschau. There are smelting works for copper and iron, and a trade in flax and linen fabrics. Pop. 6,000.

IGNACIO, SAN, ig-nai'-she-o, a town of Bolivia, South America, finely situated between two lakes, near the right bank of the Paragau. It is the seat of one of the largest missionary establishments in the country; and there is a large church, with Jesuit college attached. Pop. 5,000.

IGNATIUS, St., ig'-nai-she-us (surnamed Theophorus, or "one who carried God in his heart") a father of the Church, and martyr, was a native of Syria, and a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, by whom he was made bishop of Antioch, A.D. 68. After discharging the episcopal office with great zeal for 40 years, the emperor Trajan, passing through Antioch, in his Parthian expedition, sent for him, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to renounce his religion. Ignatius continued inflexible, on which the emperor sent him under a guard of soldiers to Rome, where he suffered martyrdom, by being exposed to wild beasts in the amphitheatre for the amusement of the people. The martyr endured his sufferings with fortitude. Two pious deacons of his church gathered up his bones, and conveyed them to Antioch, where they were carefully preserved. Seven of his genuine epistles are extant, and were published by Usher at Oxford in 1645. Some others have been attributed to him; but these are generally accounted spurious, though Whiston endeavoured to prove that they were genuine, and that the others were forgeries or abridgments. The best edition of his writings is to be found in the "Patres Apostolici" of Cotelerius.
Died 107.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michael Curopalates, and of Procopia, daughter of the emperor Nicephorus. When his father was deposed by Leo the Armenian, he and his brother were confined in a monastery. Ignatius, whose former name was Nicetas, took the religious vows, and in 847 was raised to the patriarchate; but having rebuked Bardas, one of the principal lords of the court, he was banished to the isle of Terebinthos, and Photius appointed in his stead. A council was called at Constantinople to compel Ignatius to resign, which he refused to do for some time; but close confinement and rigorous usage induced him to yield. When Basil became emperor, he restored Ignatius to his dignity; upon which he immediately excommunicated Photius, and caused the 8th general council to be called at Constantinople.

IGNATIUS-LOYOLA. (See LOYOLA.)

IGOR, e'-gor, grand-duke of Russia, succeeded his father Rurick, and, after making war a long time against his neighbours, proceeded to ravage the East, deluging with blood Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. He left his throne to his wife Olga, who, in her old age, embraced Christianity.
Born 875; died 945.

IGUALADA, e'-gwa-la'-da, a town of Spain, province of Barcelona, 40 miles N.W.W. of Barcelona. Its principal buildings are an ancient Gothic church, a town-house, small theatre, and schools. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, hats, and firearms. Pop. 11,879.

IGUALAPA, eg-u-a-la'-pa, a town of Mexico, 180 miles S.W. of La Puebla. Pop. 3,000.

IGUAPE, e'-gwa-pai, a town of Brazil, in the province of Sao-Paulo, 90 miles S.W. of Santos. It has a considerable trade in rice, rum, and timber. The harbour is shallow. Pop. 8,000.

IGUARAÇU, e-gwa-ra'-soo, a town of Brazil, in the province of Parahyba, 25 miles N.W. of Pernambuco. It stands 6 miles from the sea, on a creek, and carries on a considerable trade in sugar and cotton, which are the principal products of the district. Pop. 5,000.

IHRE, JOHAN, e'-rai, a Swedish scholar, who acquired a considerable reputation at the university of Upsala. After travelling for some time on the continent, he returned to Sweden, and held several high appointments—amongst the number the professorships of belles-lettres and political economy. The work upon which his reputation is built is the "Glossarium Suiogothicum," a valuable work to philologists.
Born 1707; died 1780.

ILCHESTER, il'-ches-ter, a borough and market-town of Somersetshire, on the Ivel, over which is a stone bridge of two large arches; 33 miles S.S.W. of Bath. It is a place of great antiquity, and had once as many as sixteen churches. It is the Ischalis of Ptolemy, and one of the chief garrison towns of the Romans; but is now of comparatively little consequence, and has scarcely any trade. Pop. 1,068.

ILDEFONSO, St., il'-de-fon-so, a town of Spain, on the mountain of Guadarrama, 4 miles from Segovia. It is a place of recent date, and owes its origin to the erection of the magnificent royal palace of La Granja, built in the French style and taste, and adorned with statues and numerous other sculptures and paintings. It is a residence of the court during part of the summer, and has a royal manufactory of mirrors. Pop. 3,800.

ILE-DE-FRANCE, an old French province, which has been made into the three departments of Seine, Seine-et-Oise, and Oise. It gave a sovereign to France in the person of Hugh Capet.

ILETZK, or ILETZKAÏA-ZASHCHITA, i-letzk, a Russian town and fort in the government of Orenburg, on the Ilek, where it meets the Ural. Lat. 51° 9′ N. Lon. 54° 59′ E. It is best known for its salt beds, which are now monopolised by the government, and worked to great advantage. On the surface of the beds are found cubic blocks of transparent salt, weighing from 3 to 30 pounds, out of which many small and useful articles are made by the inhabitants.

ILFORD, GREAT, il'-ford, a village of Essex, on the Roding, 7 m. N.E. of London. It has an hospital, which was founded by Henry II. Pop. 7,645.

ILFRACOMBE, il'-fra-koom, a market-town and seaport of Devonshire, at the mouth of the Bristol Channel, 11 miles N.N.W. of Barnstaple. It carries on a considerable trade, chiefly in ore, corn, &c., from Cornwall and Devonshire to Bristol, and employs a number of vessels in the herring-fishery of the Bristol Channel. There are a commodious harbour, lighthouse, and two excellent piers. It is a fashionable watering-place, with a handsome marine hotel, and abundant accommodation for visitors, averaging five thousand in number in the summer season. There are daily steamers, in the season, to and from Bristol. There are three churches and several chapels. Pop., resident, 6,043. Stations on London and South-Westn. and Gt. Westn. Railways.

ILHAVO, il-ha'-vo, a town of Portugal, province of Beira, near the Atlantic. Pop. 8,000, mostly engaged in the fisheries.

ILIA, or RHEA, il'-i-a, re'-a, in Roman legend a daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, consecrated a vestal virgin by her uncle Amulius, that she might not become a mother, to dispossess him of his crown. He was, however, disappointed; violence was offered to Ilia, it is said, by the god Mars, in a wood, and she brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the usurper from his throne, and restored the crown to their grandfatner Numi-

ter. Ilia was buried alive by Amulius, for violating the laws of Vesta; and, because her tomb was near the Tiber, some suppose that she married the god of that river.

ILIUM, or ILION, il'-i-um, a citadel of Troy, built by Ilus, one of the most ancient kings of Troy, from whom it received its name. It is also one of the names of Troy itself.

ILKESTON, il'-kes-ton, a market-town of Derbyshire, 10 miles N.E. of Derby. The town is situate on a lofty hill, and consists of one long irregular street, lighted with gas, and rapidly rising in population. The church is an ancient structure, having been partly built in the time of Stephen. It has several chapels, various schools, and a mechanics' institute. Manf. Hosiery in all its branches, silk edgings, lace, silk mittens, and also a superior silk fabric, which is made into gloves in London. Pop. 14,119. A station on the Midland Railway.

ILLE-ET-VILAINE, eel-ai-vé-lain, a department in the N.W. of France, bounded on the N. partly by the English Channel and the department Manche, E. by Mayenne, and S. by Loire-Inférieure, and W. by Morbihan and Côtes-du-Nord. The surface is in general level, or intersected by hills of little elevation. It has numerous lakes, or rather large stagnant pools or marshes.

Rivers.—The Ille, Vilaine, Meu, and Seiche.

Pro.—Wheat, maslin, oats, buckwheat, hemp, flax, and tobacco; flax and hemp are produced to a considerable extent, and the cider made is unequalled in any other part of the country. Apple and pear trees are abundant, and from their fruits some of the best cider and perry in France is made. Poultry, as well as game, are plentiful, whilst great attention is paid to the produce of the dairy.

Manf.—Leather, sailcloth, sacking, and coarse linen, hats, cordage, and sewing threads.

Minerals.—Granite and quartz.

Pop.—615,480.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 6 arrondissements, Rennes, Fougères, Montfort, St. Malo, Vitré, and Redon, and 335 communes. The most important towns are RENNES, the capital, and ST. MALO, the principal seaport.

ILLER, il'-ler, a large river of Germany, which rises in the Tyrol, near Baad, and, after a course of about 100 miles, chiefly in a north-westerly direction, joins the Danube near Ulm. The Aurach, which joins the Iller on the left bank, is the most important affluent.

ILLERTISSEN, il'-ler-tis'-sen, a market-town of Bavaria, in Suabia, on the right bank of the Iller, 12 miles from Ulm. It has two castles, a chapel, and an hospital. Pop. 1,200. Two annual fairs are held.

ILLESCAS, il-las'-cas, an ancient town of Spain, province of Toledo, 17 miles N.E. of the city of that name. There are a noble Gothic church with a square tower of Moorish architecture surmounted by a spire; a richly decorated building containing an image of the Virgin, much resorted to by pilgrims, and a town-house, with a handsome colonnade. There are some fine buildings of the Gothic and Moorish periods. An annual fair lasts three days, and is much frequented. Pop. 1,900.

ILLIERS, il'-le-ai, a town of France, department Eure-et-Loire, 15 miles S.W. of Chartres, remarkable for the remains of an old castle. Manf. Cloth, blankets, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 3,000.

ILLINOIS, il'-le-noi, a river of the United States, formed by the union of the Kankakee and the Des Plaines, in the N.E. part of Indiana. After traversing the state of Illinois in a S.W. direction for nearly 400 miles, it joins the Mississippi in lat. 38° 58′ N., lon. 90° 25′ W., 18 miles above its junction with the Missouri. The river is 400 yards wide at its mouth. The chief tributaries are the Fox and the Vermilion. A canal has been formed from La Salle, connecting the river with Chicago, on Lake Michigan.

ILLINOIS, one of the western United States, bounded N. by Wisconsin, E. by Indiana and Lake Michigan, S. by Kentucky, and W. by Missouri and Iowa. The state is bordered on three sides by the great rivers Wabash, Ohio, and Mississippi; its N.E. corner touches upon Lake Michigan, and it is intersected by the Illinois and Kaskaskia, which runs from N.E. to S.W. into the Mississippi. The greater part of it is either flat or rolling. Extensive prairies constitute two-thirds of its surface, and the character of the various soils of which that is composed might be defined in the following manner.—1. Bottoms, bearing a heavy growth of timber. This land is of the first quality, and is found on all the principal rivers; it varies in width from 50 rods to 2 miles, and is of inexhaustible fertility. 2. Newly formed land, found at the mouth of rivers. There are many thousands of acres of this land at the mouth of the Wabash, and at the confluence of the Ohio with the Mississippi. These districts are annually inundated, and unhealthy. 3. Dry prairies, approaching the rivers, and bordering on the bottom-land, but elevated from 30 to 100 feet. The prairies of the Illinois river are the most extensive of any east of the Mississippi, and have alone been estimated at 1,200,000 acres. This soil is not inferior to the first-rate river-bottoms. 4. Wet prairies, found remote from rivers, or at their sources. The soil is generally cold and barren, abounding with swamps and ponds, and covered with a tall coarse grass. 5. Timbered land, moderately hilly, well watered, and of a rich soil. 6. Hills, of a sterile soil, and destitute of timber, or covered with stunted oaks and pines. The only part of the state which is thickly wooded is in the S.; in every other part the prairie predominates. The forests consist of oak, walnut, sugar-maple, elm, ash, sycamore, and white pine.

Pro.—Indian corn, wheat, rye, oats, buckwheat, turnips, potatoes, cotton, hemp, flax, tobacco, and the castor bean. Wheat does well, except on the bottoms, where the soil is too rich. Tobacco grows to great perfection, and flax, hemp, oats, Irish and sweet potatoes, do as well as in Kentucky. The common domestic animals are abundant, and large herds of swine feed in the forests.

Minerals.—Lead in immense quantities; indeed, the mines of this mineral in this state are considered to be the richest in the world. The others are iron, coal, and copper, ironstone, limestone, and gypsum. Salt-springs also are numerous.

Pop.—3,077,871, of whom about 30,000 are coloured. The increase has been remarkable.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The state is divided into 102 counties. The seat of government is SPRINGFIELD, but CHICAGO is the most important place.

ILLNAU (UNTER and OBER), il'-nau, two contiguous villages of Switzerland, canton of Zurich, on the right bank of the Kempt, 9 miles N.E. of Zurich. Manf. Cotton weaving and cotton and silk spinning. Pop. 2,800.

ILLOK, or UJLAK, il'-lok, a market-town of Hungary, or Slavonia, on the right bank of the Danube, 24 miles W. of Peterwardein. There are a Franciscan monastery, castle, and large barracks.

Near the town are three forts supposed to be of Roman origin, and the remains of a temple of Diana. Pop. 3,400.

ILLORA, eel-yor'-a, a town of Spain, province of Granada, at the south-eastern extremity of the Sierra de Parapanda, 23 miles N.W. of Granada. It is irregularly built, with steep and narrow streets; but there is a good public square, with a fountain. There are two churches, one an ancient and large structure, surmounted by a lofty tower. A Moorish castle in ruins is on a height above the town. Manf. Woollens and linen. Pop. 6,400.

ILLTYD VARCHOG, ill'-tud-var'-chog, or, "Iltutus the Knight," a saint who accompanied Garmon to Britain, and was placed at the head of the Congregation of Theodosius, so called from being established by that emperor. He introduced an improved method of ploughing among the Welsh. Died about 480.

ILLUECA, eel-yoo-ai'-ka, a town of Spain, in the province of Saragossa, near the left bank of the Aranda, 35 miles S.W. of Saragossa. Manf. Common woollen cloth. An annual fair is held. Pop. 2,550.

ILLYRIAN PROVINCES, the name given, in 1809, by Napoleon I. to Carniola, Dalmatia, and adjoining territory between the Adriatic sea and the river Save. In 1814, they were united to the Austrian empire, and now form the provinces of CORINTHIA, CARNIOLA, and Coast land.

ILLYRICUM, il-lir'-i-cum, the Roman name for the eastern coast of the Adriatic and adjacent islands, with the western part of Macedonia. The limits varied at different periods, but may be generally described as comprehending the modern Croatia, Dalmatia, and the Herzegovina.

ILM, ilm, a river of Germany, rising on the N.E. slope of the Thuringerwald, in Saxe-Weimar, and, after a course of 60 miles, falling into the Saal at Sulza, near the frontier of the Prussian province of Saxony.

ILMEN, il'-men, a lake of European Russia, near the W. borders of Novogorod. Ext. 27 miles long, with a breadth of 20. It receives the rivers Schelen, Lovat, Msta, and other streams, and, by the Volkhov, discharges itself into Lake Ladoga. It abounds in fish. Its banks were formerly inhabited by the Slavonian tribes, who, in 862, invited the Variogo-Russ to come and rule over them. To this event the origin of the Russian nation is traced.

ILMENAU, il'-me-no, a town of Saxe-Weimar, on the Ilm, 18 miles from Weimar, at an elevation of 1,500 feet above the sea. Manf. Woollens, ribbons, dolls, and porcelain. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in 1706, a battle was fought by the united forces of the Russians and Saxons against the Swedes.

ILMINSTER, il'-mins-ter, a market-town of Somersetshire, on the right bank of the Ile, 14 miles S.E. of Bridgewater. It stands on the acclivity of a hill, and consists of one principal street, intersected, at right angles, by smaller ones. The church is a fine cruciform Gothic building, with an elegant tower. There are endowed schools, founded in 1586. Manf. Woollens, silks, and lace. Pop. 7,341.—A station on the Great Western railway.

IL OBEID, or EL OBEID, lo-bedd', the capital of Kordovan, Africa, in lat. 13° 11′ N., lon. 29° 31′ E. It is an important trading town formed by the union of a number of villages. The chief articles of export are gum arabic, ivory, tamarinds, and ostrich feathers. It is described as a slight-built and dirty place. Pop. 30,000.

ILOCOS (NORTH and SOUTH), ee-lo'-kose, two mountainous provinces of Luzon, one of the Philippines, with a united extent of 120 miles, and a breadth of 33. In the plains there is great fertility, producing corn, coffee, sugar, indigo, cacao, and cocoa-nuts. In the mountains, buffaloes, stags, oxen, and horses abound. Manf. Cotton stuffs Pop. 357,764; about two-thirds belong to the northern provinces. The capital of North Ilocos is VIGAN; of South Ilocos, LAOAG.

ILOILO, e-lo'-e-lo, a province in the S.E. part of the island of Panay, in the Philippines. It is mountainous and thickly wooded; but, in the valleys, yields rice, cotton, maize, cacao, and tobacco of excellent quality. Turtle-fishing is extensively carried on. Manf. Fine cotton fabrics and stuffs, composed of the fibres of the leaf of the pine-apple. Pop. 410,430.—ILOILO, capital of the above province. Pop. 3,800

ILORI, ILORIN, or ALORI, il-o'-re, an African town, situate lat. 8° 30′ N., lon. 4° 33′ E., about 150 miles N.E. from the shores of the Bight of Benin. It was described by an intelligent native to Dr. Booth as larger than Constantinople, in which city he had lived for some time; but very little is known respecting it.

ILOVLA, e-love-la, a river of European Russia, rising in the W. of the government of Saratov, and, after a south-westerly course of 200 miles, falling into the Don at Fort Donskaia.

ILOVLINSKAIA, e-lov'-lin-ski-a, a town of Russia, on the right bank of the Ilovla, near its junction with the Don. Pop. 4,000.

ILSENBERG, eel'-sen-bairg, a village of Prussia, province of Saxony, at the entrance to the beautiful valley of the Ilse. There are an old and a new castle. Manf. Paper, oil, iron, copper, tin, and wire. Pop. 2,500.

ILSLEY, EAST, an ancient market-town of Berkshire, about 56 miles W. from London. The sheep fairs held here are large and important. The downs in the neighbourhood are used as training grounds for racehorses. West Ilsley is about a mile distant. Pop. 608.

ILUS, i'-lus, in legend and history, fourth king of Troy, son of Tros by Callirhoe. He extended and embellished his city, called Ilium, and also Troy, after his father Tros. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that so long as it remained in Troy, the city would remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilus rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium. For this action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess; but subsequently recovered it. He is said to have reigned between 1402 and 1347 B.C.

IMATACA, im-at'-ika, a river of Venezuela, South America, rising near the coast, and, after a course of 75 miles, joining the right bank of the Orinoco about 60 miles from its mouth.

IMBERT, BARTHOLOMEW, im'-bair, a French poet, who became a member of the academy of Nismes, and cultivated literature, particularly poetry, with success. He wrote a poem entitled "The Judgment of Paris;" and also published a volume of fables, which, though excellent, cannot be compared with La Fontaine's.

He was likewise the author of a novel entitled "The Mistakes of Love," and some other pieces.

Born at Nismes, 1747; died at Paris, 1790.

IMBERT, JOSEPH GABRIEL, a French painter, who was instructed in his art by Vander Meulen and Le Brun. At the age of 34 he entered into the order of St. Bruno, but still continued to paint.

Born at Versailles, 1657; died 1740.

IMBROS, im'-bros, a mountainous island belonging to Turkey, in the Ægean Sea. It contains four villages, of which Imbros is the chief. The island is situated about 11 miles from the mouth of the Dardanelles: it is 18 miles in length, and produces corn, wine, cotton, and oil. Pop. 4,000.

IMERETIA, or IMERETHI, im'-e-ret'-e-a, a province of Russia, now included in the trans-Caucasian government of Kutais. It stretches along the southern limit of Caucasus, having the Black Sea on the west and Georgia on the east. Very uneven and rugged, being traversed by ramifications of the Caucasus. Rivers. The Rioni and its tributaries. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, tobacco, madder, and hemp. The climate being delightful, fruits grow spontaneously, and cherries, apricots, chestnuts, and walnuts spring up in every direction. The vine, also, is said to grow spontaneously. Considerable attention is paid to the rearing of bees and silkworms. The trade is wholly in the hands of Armenians, Greeks, and Jews. In the 14th century, this province formed a part of the kingdom of Georgia; but afterwards became independent, and was governed by its own sovereigns, one of whom, in 1804, voluntarily made it over to Russia. It was formally incorporated into the empire in 1810. Pop. 100,000.

Born at Nuremberg, 1651; died 1728.

IMOLA, e-mo'-la, a fortified town of Italy, on a small island formed by the Santerno, 25 miles S.W. of Ravenna. It is defended by a strong castle, and has a cathedral, several churches and convents, a college, and a public library. Manf. Wax, oil, majolica, silk, glass, and leather, with brick and tile works. The town is also the centre of a wine trade. Pop. 29,105.—This town was founded by the Lombards on the ruins of Forum Cornelii, destroyed by Justinian, and was afterwards successively held by different chiefs who ruled in Central Italy. Julius II. annexed it to the Papal States.

IMOSCHI, e-mos'-ke, a town of the Austrian empire, in the province of Dalmatia, in a mountain situate 1,380 feet above the sea level. There are markets twice a week much frequented by Turks, and the town is rapidly increasing in importance. Pop. about 15,000.

INA, i'-na, king of the West-Saxons, one of the kings of the Heptarchy, famous for his expeditions against the neighbouring princes. In 726 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he erected an English college, which he endowed by a yearly tax on his kingdom, called Romescot, and afterwards Peterpence.

Died 728.

INAGUA, or HENEAGUA, Great and Little, in-ag'-oo-a, two of the Bahama islands, and the most southerly of the group. The larger measures fifty miles by twenty-five, the smaller eight miles by six. Pop. chiefly coloured, 1,000.

INCA, in'-ka, a town of Spain, on the island of Majorca, standing on a low hill, 16 miles N.E. of Palma. It contains a square, several churches, a town-house, and various schools. Manf. Leather, linen, soap, and brandy. It has numerous windmills in its neighbourhood. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,500.

INCH, inch, a Gaelic word, signifying island when used alone, but when with qualifying affixes, it is applied both in Scotland and Ireland to the names of both parishes and islands.

INCHBALD, MRS. ELIZABETH, inch'-bald, an English authoress, who, at the age of 16, ran away from her home in Suffolk, and tried ineffectually to obtain an engagement as actress in a London theatre. She subsequently found employment on the provincial stage; and, after a varied career, married Mr. Inchbald, an actor, who died in 1779. In 1780 she obtained an engagement to play minor parts at Covent-Garden theatre, and remained in that position till 1789, when she retired from the stage. A few years before she had written a farce, which, being successful, she continued to write for the theatre, and produced in succession nineteen plays, receiving large sums for several of them. Between the years 1806 and 1809 she edited "The British" and "Modern" Theatres, and a collection of farces, in all 42 vols. But the works which cause her name to be remembered are two novels—"A Simple Story," and "Nature and Art." She had written her autobiography, for which £1,000 had been offered and refused by her, and which was destroyed at her request after her death.

Born in Suffolk, 1753; died 1821.

INCHOFFER, MELCHOIR, inch'-hofe-er, a German Jesuit, who at first studied the law, but abandoned that profession and entered the Jesuits' college at Rome in 1607. In 1630 he wrote a book, entitled, "The Virgin Mary's Letter to the People of Messina proved to be genuine." Having quarrelled with his brethren, he wrote a satire against them, which was printed after his death, under the title of "Monarchia Folipsorum." He also wrote the "Ecclesiastical History of Hungary."

Born at Vienna, 1584; died at Milan, 1648.

INCLEDON, BENJAMIN CHARLES, in'-kel-don, English vocalist. He was a pupil of the well-known Jackson of Exeter, and for many years occupied a foremost position on the English stage. He possessed a voice of rare volume and beauty, and in naval and sentimental ballads was unrivalled.

Born at Exeter, 1764; died 1826.

INDIA, HINDOSTAN, or EAST INDIES, in'-dia, an extensive region consisting of the central of the three great peninsulas of Southern Asia. The name is derived from the Sanskrit word Sindhu, originally limited to the country watered by the river Indus; but in course of time was applied by the Persians, under the form "Hind," to the whole of the country lying south of Tartary and between Persia and China, with the islands dependent thereon. Geographers now usually divide this vast tract of country into Hither India and Further India. The first includes the great central peninsula, separated from Tartary, Thibet, and China on the N. by the Himalaya Mountains; on the W. by the Soliman Mountains from Afghanistan and Beloochistan; on the E. from Burmah by the hilly district to the east of Assam and Chittagong; and bounded on the S.W. by the Arabian Sea and S.E. by the Gulf of Bengal. Further India is a general term descriptive of BURMAH, COCHIN CHINA, SIAM, and other less important places, which are separately treated, and will not be further referred to in this place. India (limiting the designation to Hither India) is about 1,900 miles in extreme length, from the Himalayas, in the north, to Cape Comorin, the southern extremity of the peninsula, nearly following the 77th degree of east longitude; and 1,600 miles in greatest breadth at lat. 25° N. The island of CEYLON, and the LACADIVE and MALADIVE groups are considered to be parts of India. Under the heading HIMALAYAS we have described the stupendous range of mountains forming the northern boundary. Farther south are the elevated regions which include CASHMERE, NEPAUL, BHOTAN, and SIKKIM, separated by the Terai (a belt of swamps and jungles varying from 5 to 25 miles in width) from the great plain of the Ganges, extending southward to about lat. 23° N., and eastward from the plains of the Indus (from which it is separated by the Aravulli Hills) to the head of the Bay of Bengal. This is the most fertile and thickly populated part of India, containing more than half of the entire population. Near the mouth of the Ganges are immense swamps and parts subject to inundations. Westward of the Aravulli Hills are the plains of the Indus, the northern portion of which comprises the Punjaub, and the southern the Thur, or Indian Desert, stretching for about 400 miles, with a breadth of 100, in a direction generally parallel to the river Indus, but separated from it by a fertile tract averaging 15 miles in breadth. There are a few tracts or oases capable of cultivation, but the general aspect of the Thur is that of a sandy desert, similar to the immense barren tracts of Africa and Arabia. To the south of this desolate region are the table-lands of Rajpootana and Malwa, extending to the Vindhya Mountains, having an average elevation of about 2,000 feet, and known as the Highlands of Northern Hindustan. The VINDHYA Mountains, which extend eastward from Goojerat to the plains of the Ganges, between lat. 22° and 25° N., from the division between Northern Hindustan and Peninsular India, which includes the district known as the Deccan, consisting of a vast table-land, in some parts nearly 4,000 feet above the sea level, sloping gradually to the east, and enclosed by the Western and Eastern GHAUTS. The surface of the district may be described as consisting of plains, interspersed with ridges of rock, ranges of mountains, and insulated, abrupt and almost inaccessible, flat topped hills. The rivers of the Deccan rise in the Western Ghauts, and flowing eastward reach the Bay of Bengal. Farther south is the table-land of Mysore, with an average elevation above the sea-level of 3,000 feet, and almost surrounded by the NEILGHERRIES, or Blue Mountains. The Western, or Malabar coast of the peninsula is rocky, and the Western Ghauts form a continuous barrier, about 510 miles long. The eastern or Coromandel coast, the mountain range, or Eastern Ghauts, are more interrupted and are lower, with a wide tract of low ground near the sea. In the north-west, communicating with the Gulf of Cutch, is a morass, the Runn of Cutch, into which several rivers discharge, and which has a varying extent of from 5,000 to 8,000 square miles. The coast line of India is nearly 3,100 miles in length. There are only two inlets of considerable size, the Gulfs of Cutch and Cambray, both on the western side. There is not one good harbour on all the eastern coast.

Mountains.—The Vindhya attain an elevation in some parts of 6,000 feet above the sea level, and in one branch running in a north-easterly direction, of 7,364 feet in Mount Perman. They form the northern base of the triangle of peninsular India, of which the Ghants form the sides. The Western Ghauts reach a height of about 6,200 feet, but the Eastern rarely exceed 1,500 feet in elevation. The Neilgherries cover an area of 600 square miles, and at Dotacamund are more than 7,000 feet high. Ranges of inferior importance are the Aravulli, between the plains of the Ganges and the Indus, the highest summit of which is Mount Abu, 5,000 feet; the Sewalik, in northern Bengal; and the Kallywar hills, in the north-west, south of the Gulf of Cutch.

Rivers.—The great rivers INDUS, BRAHMAPOOTRA, GANGES, and NERBUDDA are described under the proper headings. The Jumna, Chumbul, Gunduck, Gogra, Hoogly, and Teesta are the most important affluents of the Ganges. The five rivers from which the Punjaub is named are the Sutlej, Beas, Ravee, Chenaub, and Jhalum, all affluents of the Indus. The Nerbudda, 800 miles long, and the Tapti (400), flowing into the Gulf of Cambay; the Myhi (550), the Luni (320), the Bunnos (180), the Bhadro (130), and about 14 other rivers of less importance, discharge on the western coast of the peninsula; and the Godavery (830), the Kistna (800), the Cavery (470), the Mahanadi (520), the Brahmini (400), and the North and South Pennas (350 and 240), flow eastwardly into the Sea of Bengal. There are few lakes, and none of considerable size.

Climate.—With the exception of the provinces of Cashmere, Kumaon, and Nepaul, where the seasons occur in their more agreeable vicissitudes, the climate is diversified only by dry and rainy months. In March, April, May, and June the heat is generally excessive. These changes are caused by the monsoons, which happen regularly at different periods of the year on the opposite coasts of Malabar and Coromandel.

Pro.—Indigo, cotton, jute, opium, sugar, millet, barley, maize, caoutchouc, tea, and cinchona. In fruits, the principal are the palm, cocoanut, tamarind, guava, mango, plantain, pineapple, orange, lemon, pomegranate, and the melon. These arrive at the greatest perfection. Rice and wheat are grown in immense quantities; and although in Bengal the former constitutes the principal article of diet to the inhabitants, this is not the case generally throughout the country. Pepper, spices, and almost every kind of garden vegetables are produced. In the forests, which are now mostly under systematic official supervision, with a trained staff, teak, oak, cypress, banyan, and poplar are plentiful, and there are an immense variety of larg trees little known in Europe, which furnish timber of fine quality.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, coal, graphite, marble, gold, nitre, alum, porcelain clay, diamonds, rubies, amethysts, agates, carnelians, and other precious stones.

Manf.—These principally consist of muslins, calicoes, and silks. In working in ivory and metals (especially carving and filigree work) the Hindoos especially excel. The shawls of Cashmere, and the chintzes and dyed goods of Masulipatam and other places on the east side of India, are famous.

Zoology.—Elephants, buffaloes, sheep, deer, lions, tigers, panthers, wild boars, and all kinds of wild beasts and game. Elephants, dromedaries, the horse and ass, are domesticated. The sheep have hair instead of wool, and the cattle are distinguished by a hunch on the shoulders. There is a great plenty of fish and fowl. Serpents, scorpions, mosquitoes, locusts, and monkeys also abound.

Pop.—257,340,062.

Political Divisions.—India (British), Native States in alliance, French and Portuguese settlements, Nepaul, and Bhotan.

Races, Religion, and Language.—(See INDIA, British.)

History.—Hindoo histories mention a race of kings as reigning between 2,000 and 3,000 years before the Christian era; and it is more authentic that several ancient nations, especially the Tyrians and Egyptians, carried on commerce with India. It was partially conquered by Darius Hystaspes, 512 B.C., and by Alexander the Great, 327 B.C. One of his successors, Selencus Nicator, is believed to have penetrated far beyond the Indus; and various successful expeditions were made by the Bactrians, Parthians, and Scythians; but trustworthy history begins with the conquest of Mahmoud of Ghuznee, A.D. 1000. His race was extinct in 1186; and the next most memorable event was the invasion by the Moguls under Genghis Khan. At the end of the 14th century, Timour, or Tamerlane, invaded Hindostan, took Delhi, conquered the greater part of the country, and slaughtered 100,000 of the people. Between 1519 and 1526 the conquest was completed by the Sultan Baber, who founded the Mogul empire. In 1733, the Nizam of the Deccan achieved independence, and about 1730 the great Mahratta families of Holkar and Scindia rose into power. Soon afterwards many independent sovereignties were established, and the Mogul empire became little more than a name. In 1739 the Persian Nadir Shah, or Kouli Khan, invaded the northern part of Hindostan, massacred 150,000 persons at Delhi, and carried away treasure amounting to £125,000 sterling. A Portuguese settlement was established at Cochin, Goa, and other places on the western coast, early in the 16th century; the French formed settlements, chiefly on the east coast, in the following century. English factories were established in 1612, and the first East India Company formed in London in 1600. The further history of Hindostan is merged in that of INDIA (British).

INDIA, BRITISH, includes the greater part of HINDOSTAN, BRITISH BURMAH, TENASSERIM, and adjacent islands, and the STRAITS SETTLEMENTS. The island of CEYLON, though geographically pertaining to India, is a British Colony, under distinct government. British India consists of the territory annexed to the British empire, and a large number of native states in alliance, and more or less independent. The physical geography of the country is described in the preceding article.

Constitution and Government.—The present form of government of the Indian empire is established by the Act 21 & 22 Victoria, cap. 106, called "An Act for the better Government of India," sanctioned August 2, 1858. By the terms of this Act, all the territories heretofore under the government of the East India Company are vested in her Majesty, and all its powers are exercised in her name. In 1876 an Act was passed by which the queen was entitled to assume, by proclamation, the title of Empress of India. One of her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, called the secretary of state for India, aided by a council of 15 members, of whom 9 at least have been resident in India for 10 years, is invested with all the powers hitherto exercised by the company or by the board of control. The executive authority in India is vested in a governor-general or viceroy, appointed by the crown, and acting under the orders of the secretary of state for India. The governor-general in council has power to make laws for all persons, whether British or native, foreigners or others, within the Indian territories under the dominion of her Majesty, and for all subjects of the crown within the dominions of Indian princes and states in alliance with her Majesty. The governor-general has the direct control over four territories or provinces, and appoints, subject to the approbation of the secretary of state for India, lieutenant-governors for the other provinces, except Madras and Bombay, governors of which are appointed directly by the crown.

Provinces and Administrative Divisions.—The three presidencies of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras are designations commonly employed, even in official publications; but have been superseded by recent arrangements of provinces and commissionerships or divisions. There are 17 provinces and 53 divisions, specified as follows:—

UNDER GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.—
Ajmere.—Ajmere.
Coorg.—Coorg.
Mysore.—Nandidroog, Ashtagram, Nagar.
Berar.—East Berar, West Berar.

UNDER LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.—
Bengal, Lower.—Burdwan, Presidency Division, Rajshahye, Cooch Behar, Dacca, Chittagong.
Behar.—Patna, Bhaugulpore.
Orissa.—Orissa.
Chota Nagpore.—Chota Nagpore.
Assam.—Cooch Behar, Assam.

UNDER LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF NORTH-WEST PROVINCE.—
North-West Provinces.—Meerut, Kumaon, Rohilkund, Agra, Jhansie, Allahabad, Benares.

UNDER LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF PUNJAB.—
Punjab.—Delhi, Hissar, Ambala, Jullundhur, Amritsur, Lahore, Rawalpindi, Mooltan, Deerajat, Peshawur, Nagpoor.

UNDER CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF OUDE.—
Oude.—Lucknow, Seetapore, Faizabad, Rai Bareli.

UNDER CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF CENTRAL PROVINCE.—
Central Provinces.—Nagpoor, Jubbulpore, Nerbudda, Chutteesghur.

UNDER GOVERNOR OF MADRAS.—
Madras.—Northern Range, Central Range, Southern Range.

UNDER GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.—
Bombay.—Northern Division (including Bombay), Southern Division.

UNDER CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF BRITISH BURMAH.—
British Burmah.—Arracan, Pegu, Tenasserim.

Area.—Provinces under direct British administration, 904,049 square miles; native states in alliance, 546,695 square miles. Total, 1,450,744 square miles.

Pop.—According to the census of 1881, British provinces, 198,790,853; native states, 55,191,742. Total, 253,982,595.

NATIVE STATES IN ALLIANCE WITH THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

The following particulars are those given by Colonel Malleson. The orthography is his. The populations are in round numbers, and subsequent changes may be compared on reference to the respective headings in these pages.

There are 188 minor chiefs, some having the title of Raja, who are mediatized and more or less dependent on the British Government.

Inhabitants.—About five-sixths of the entire population are Hindoos, who are supposed to have arrived at some remote period from the north-west, subduing the aboriginal population, remnants of which now exist in a state of abject savagery on the mountain ranges, and are known generally as the "hill tribes." The Khonds and Koles of Orissa, the Bheels of Candeish, the Chenewars of the Eastern Ghauts and Mysore, the Tanedys near Madras, and the Warles, Katodars, Baddughars, and Phansirgars of Western India, are the best known of these tribes, the more intelligent of whom are mostly robbers and murderers, and the others wretched savages of the Australian type. The most powerful and famous races of India are the Mahrattas, the Rajpoots, the Jauts, and the Sikhs. The Mahrattas derive their name from Mahrat, a province of the Deccan, but the race is supposed to be of Persian origin. They are of slight stature, and derive many of their names from pastoral occupations as farmer, shepherd, cowherd. They overran the Deccan about 1676, and afterwards endeavoured to overcome the Moguls. Their power was weakened by the battle of Paniput in 1761-4, and their independence destroyed in 1817, when the Peishwar, their great feudal chief, surrendered to the British. The last prince of the race, Sindiah, is now a pensioner of the British Government. Rajpootana, "the country of princes," is a name given to the territory lying between lat. 22° 45′ and 31° N., and lon. 68° 25′ and 77° 45′ E. The Rajpoots are a handsome, warlike people, and claim to represent two great races, Soonya and Indu, one descended from the sun, and the other from the moon. They reckon 36 royal races, subdivided into many classes. The Jauts are another warlike race, who came into prominence about the beginning of the 18th century, when they came from the banks of the Indus, and settled in the Doab (the district between the Ganges and the Jumna) as cultivators, but their love of plunder and fierce character led them to prefer war to agriculture. Physically, they are one of the finest races in India. The Sikhs were originally a religious sect, established in the 15th century at Lahore. They acquired supremacy in the Punjab, and maintained it until after a long war they were defeated by the British in 1849. They are a tall and powerful race, and among the finest military horsemen in the world. The Mahometans, who number about 41,000,000, are descended from the Afghan, Persian, and Arabian hordes, who conquered India under Timour and Baber. Sikhs, Parsees (fire-worshippers of Persian descent, chiefly settled in Bombay and on the western coast), and Mongolian races in the Himalayan provinces and India beyond the Ganges, are also considerable elements of the population. The British-born inhabitants (exclusive of the army) number about 64,000; and the Eurasians, or Indian-born persons of European descent, 91,000. There are about 10,000 Jews. Taking the population as a whole, the number of males is about equal to the females, but among the higher castes the females are in a minority—a circumstance due to the fact that the practice of female infanticide still prevails to a great extent.

Religion.—There are more than 139,000,000 Hindoos, 41,000,000 Mahometans, 2,800 Buddhists, 1,200,000 Sikhs, 897,000 Christians, 5,000,000 professors of other creeds, and several thousands who profess no known form of religion. Some of the hill tribes have a kind of fetish, or devil-worship, but the majority are in a state of the most complete heathenism. These statistics do not apply to the allied native states, respecting which there is no trustworthy information. The institution of caste is a vital element of the Hindoo religion, and the variety is great. In the North-west Provinces not less than 307 distinctive castes of Hindoos are specified, and in Bengal the number of castes is 1,000. Buddhism, which originated in India, now prevails over Central and Eastern Asia, but has now, as may be seen, comparatively few adherents in the land of its birth. The Jains, who are numerous in Western India, especially in Gujerat and Candeish, are in many respects nearly allied to the Buddhists in their belief, but add the worship of saints. The Sikh religion, a modified form of Brahminism, is confined to the Punjab and adjacent districts. The Mahometans are most numerous in Bengal and in the Deccan.

Education.—There are more than 25,000 educational institutions aided or maintained by the government, attended by 800,000 pupils.

Languages.—There are not less than 23 distinct languages spoken in India, exclusive of the almost innumerable dialects of the various hill tribes.

Commerce.—The annual exports from British India are of the average value of about £57,000,000; and the imports £40,000,000. The most important articles of export to the United Kingdom are raw cotton, jute, rice, indigo, tea, and hides. Cotton manufactures form about two-thirds of the total British imports into India. Next to the United Kingdom, the countries having the largest trade with India are China and Japan, the imports from which average £8,500,000 per annum, while the exports to them are of the average value of £12,000,000. Exports of the average annual value of £5,000,000 are also sent to Egypt in transit for the United Kingdom.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 6,300 miles of railway are open, and there are 33,000 miles of telegraph wire.

History.—The origin of our Indian empire is attributed to the following circumstance:—Broughton, an English surgeon, whose good fortune it was to open the commerce of India to his countrymen by the following accident, having been sent from Surat to Agra in the year 1636, to treat one of the daughters of the emperor Shah Jehan, had the good fortune to cure the princess. By way of recompense, the emperor, among other favours, gave him the privilege of a free commerce throughout the whole extent of his dominions. Broughton immediately returned to Bengal to purchase goods and transmit them by sea to Surat. Scarcely had he returned, when he was requested to attend the favourite of the naboh of the province, labouring under a very dangerous disease. Having fortunately restored his patient to health, the nabob settled a pension on him, confirmed the privilege of the emperor, and promised to allow the same to all the English who should come to Bengal. Broughton communicated all this to the English governor of Surat, and it was by the advice of the latter that the company sent from England, in 1640, two ships to Bengal. Such was the origin of a commerce that has since been carried to so great an extent, and even produced territorial possessions superior in extent and population to the country an association of whose subjects was their sovereign. In 1668, the island of Bombay, previously belonging to Portugal, was given to the English as the dowry of the Infanta Catherine, wife of Charles II., and transferred from the crown to the East India Company. The rise and progress of British India is, as a matter of course, for the last two centuries, closely identified with that of the East India Company, the history of which may be divided into four periods. During the first fourteen years, its members were, in a great measure, independent. In the following ninety-five years, although it had a common capital, its operations were confined by the superiority of the Dutch in the Indian seas, by the civil wars at home, and particularly by the calling in question of its exclusive privileges, which were merely a royal and not a parliamentary authority, but confined to mere commercial transactions; and finally, during the subsequent seventy years, its political power was developed. This commenced in 1748. The French had already set the example. In 1740 a French battalion had destroyed the army of the nabob of the Carnatic, and soon after, the French officers succeeded in disciplining Indian troops according to the European method. Thus far the military organisation of the company had been merely on the defensive. It now became able to act offensively; and the entire difference of the European and Indian notions of law could never fail to furnish opportunities to put this new means of power into action. In 1749 the aggression of the company began with its protection of the pretender of Tanjore. Under pretence of illegitimacy, the nabob of this district was driven out, for the purpose of obtaining some cessions of territory, and then restored, on making further concessions. The victory of Clive, at Plassy, over a large Mogul army, in 1757, was the first important step towards securing Bengal for the British; and Clive's vigorous administration, followed by that of Warren Hastings, and the successful wars with the Mahratta princes, assisted to extend and consolidate British rule. The Direction in London was now nothing more than a mere control of the real government, which had its seat in India. Its orders were antiquated before they reached Calcutta. The internal situation of the company became constantly worse; and, in 1772, it was compelled to raise a loan of £600,000 from the bank, and afterwards of £1,400,000 from the government, for its current expenses. About the end of the last century, leave was given to the company to add £2,000,000 to their capital stock, by creating 20,000 new shares; but as these shares sold at the rate of £173 each, they produced £3,460,000. The following are the dates of some of the most remarkable events connected with the growth of the Indian empire in India :—

The Nawab of Oude becomes tributary to the British	1765
The British obtain the Northern Circars by treaty with the Nisam	1766
Allahabad ceded	1798
The Nizam cedes all his possessions in Mysore	1800
Rohilcund and the Doab ceded	1801
Defeat of the Mahratta princes and cession of territory	1803
Annexation of the Punjab	1848
Annexation of Pegu	1852
Annexation of the territories of the Raja of Nagpore	1853
Oude is annexed	1856
The great Indian mutiny	1857
The Queen proclaimed sovereign of India, the political power of the East India Company having been transferred to the crown	1858
The Queen proclaimed Empress of India, or "Kaisar-i-Hind"	Jan. 1 1877

See separate headings for principal persons and places mentioned in this article.)

INDIA, FRENCH, comprises the following settlements:—Pondicherry and Karchal on the eastern coast; Chandernagore, on the Hoogly river; Yanan, in Orissa; and Mahé, on the western coast. Area, all together, 189 square miles. Pop. 282,000.

INDIA, PORTUGUESE, consists of Goa, Salsette, Bardes, Daman, Diu, &c. Area, 1,605 square miles. Pop. 481,467.

INDIA, FURTHER, INDIA-BEYOND-THE-GANGES, or INDIA-CHINA, is bounded N. by the E. Himalaya, W. by Hindostan, E. by the China Sea, and S. by the Gulf of Siam and the Straits of Malacca. The name is given in a general manner to the territory including the Burman empire, Siam, Annam, Lao, British possessions, and the Malagar states. The British possessions comprise Assam, the country on the Bay of Bengal, and that on the E. side of the Gulf of Martaban, which were taken from Burmah in the war of 1826. Besides these it includes Prince of Wales Island, Malacca and Singapore. Annam has become subject to colonising enterprises of the French.

INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO, known also as the Asiatic, Eastern, or Malay Archipelago, the greatest group of islands in the world, includes the S.E. of Asia, between the Indian and Pacific Ocean. The islands extend between lat. 17° N. to 10° S., and lon. 95° 20′ and 134° 30′ E. The largest islands are BORNEO, SUMATRA, JAVA, CELEBES, the MOLUCCAS, and the PHILIPPINES, and there are a vast number of smaller islands, the principal being Banca and Billiton, between Sumatra and Borneo, Sumbawa, Floris, Sandalwood Island, and Timor, east of Java; and Booroo and Ceram, south of the Moluccas.

INDIAN OCEAN, that part of the general ocean which is bounded on the W. by Africa; N. by Asia; E. by Australia and the Indian Archipelago; and S. by a line drawn from the southernmost point of Van Diemen's Land to the Cape of Good Hope; that is to say, from lat. 43° 35′ S. to 30° N.; and from 18° 29′ to 146° 12′. At Cape Comorin the Indian Ocean branches to form the Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Sea; this latter also divides to form the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea.

INDIAN, or WESTERN TERRITORY, a tract of country lying to the W. of the settled portions of the United States, allotted by the government to be the residence of the Indian tribes. It is bounded N. by Kansas, S. and W. by Texas, and E. by Arkansas. Lat. 33° 30′ to 37° N., and 94° 20′ to 103° W. lon., with an area of 74,127 square miles. Pop. 70,000 Indians, consisting of Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Chocktaws, Chickasaws, and remnants of other tribes.

INDIAN TERRITORIES (BRITISH AMERICA) consist of a portion only of the country formerly recognized by that designation. They comprise the unsettled region lying beyond the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, between 52½° to about 70° N. lat., and from about 103° to 141° W. lon. The population of the entire district is scanty—under 10,000 at the highest estimate—and are engaged in fishing and hunting exclusively, with perhaps 500 strangers scattered throughout the whole area.

INDIANA, in'-de-ă'-na, one of the western United States, bounded N. by Michigan, E. by Ohio, S. by Kentucky, and W. by Illinois. The Ohio forms the southern boundary of the state, and Lake Michigan touches it upon the north. Its greatest length from N. to S. is 276 miles, and its breadth 140. A ridge of hills, commencing near the mouth of the Wabash, and running in a north-east direction, nearly parallel with the Ohio, at no great distance from it, produces a broken and uneven country. North of these hills lie the flat woods, 70 miles wide; whilst, bordering on all the principal streams, except the Ohio, there are strips of bottom and prairie land, of a rich soil, usually from 3 to 6 miles in width. The prairies on the Wabash are the finest land in the state. Remote from the rivers the country is broken, and the soil light. Between the Wabash and Lake Michigan the land is mostly level, and interspersed with woodlands, prairies, lakes, and swamps.

Rivers.—The northern part is watered by the Illinois and the rivers which flow into Lake Michigan; but the Wabash is the great river of Indiana. It divides the state into two unequal parts, and in the latter part of its course divides the state from Illinois. It is navigable to La Fayette, and is connected by canal with Lake Erie and the river Ohio. White River, the principal tributary of the Wabash, is formed by two branches, which spread out widely through the whole southern half of the state. White-water river in the S.E. is a tributary of the Miami.

Pro.—Wheat, Indian corn, oats, rye, flax, hemp, potatoes, and tobacco. In the vicinity of Vevay the vineyards are esteemed the best in the United States.

Minerals.—On the banks of the Wabash, in the upper part of its course, the best kind of coal is found in apparently inexhaustible quantities; and, near the sources of several of the navigable rivers, there are salt springs, from which salt in abundance may be procured. Near Corydon is a large cave, abounding with Epsom salts and saltpetre. Besides these, iron and copper have been found, but they have not been worked to any great extent, and there are good quarries of building stone.

Manf.—Woollens, cottons, leather, hats, paper, soap; and there are iron-forges and fulling-mills.

Pop.—1,978,301, of whom about 25,000 are coloured.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 93 counties. INDIANOPOLIS, the capital; NEW ALBANY, LA FAYETTE, MADISON, EVANSVILLE, TERRE HAUTE, FORT WAYNE, VINCENNES, and MICHIGAN CITY.

History.—In 1702, the French established a settlement at Vincennes. In 1811, the Indians, who had made frequent inroads, were defeated by General Harrison, and, safety being ensured, the territory was rapidly peopled. In 1817 it was admitted as a state into the union, in which it ranks as the 6th state in respect of population.

INDIANOPOLIS, in'-di-an-op'-o-lis, a town of the United States, and the capital of Indiana. It is situate nearly in the centre of the state, on the west bank of White River, here crossed by a bridge, and navigable for steamboats. It has a state house, built upon the model of the Parthenon at Athens, 26 churches and meeting-houses, a handsome Gothic college, various schools and state institutes for the blind, deaf and dumb, and lunatics. The chamber of commerce, a fine massive building, was opened in 1875. There are seven public parks. It is the terminus of eight railways. Manf. Brass and iron machinery, woollens, and agricultural implements. Pop. 75,000.

INDIANS, the name by which the various tribes of aborigines scattered over the extensive continent of America are distinguished. They are divided into numerous tribes and nations, all in a state more or less savage, and with all the peculiar characteristics of that kind of life. They generally decline as the civilized population advances into the country; though reservations of land have always been set apart by the government of the United States for their support. There has been a great diversity of opinion amongst ethnologists as to their origin. The most probable suggestion appears to be that they are a branch of the Mongolian family, which found its way from Asia to America across the Aleutian Islands—and have sunk to their present degraded condition from a higher state of civilization. They are now rapidly dying out.

INDIBILIS, in-dib'-i-lis, prince of the Ilergetes of Spain, entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians, and assisted to gain a victory over P. Scipio, father of Scipio the Great, who was killed in the battle 212 B.C. Subsequently, he became the ally of Scipio the Great (see SCIPIO), and fought under his banner against the Carthaginians, hoping thus to be allowed to retain his kingdom by the Romans. But being deceived in these expectations, he revolted, and, after various struggles, lost his life in battle, 205 B.C.

INDIES, WEST, ANTILLES, or COLUMBIAN ARCHIPELAGO. (See ANTILLES.)

INDIGHIRKA, in-de-gir'-ka, a river of Siberia, rising in the Yablonoi, or Stavonoi Mountains, in lat. 61° N., and lon. 142° E., and, after a course of about 750 miles, falling into the Arctic Ocean by several mouths.

INDORE, or INDOOR, in-dor', a native state of India, governed by the Maharaja Holkar. (See HOLKAR and INDIA.) The territory is partly comprised in the table-land of Malwa and partly in the valley of the Nerbudda. There are also the detached district of Mehidpoor, and other small tracts enclosed by the dominions of Scindia. A portion of the Vindhayan Mountains, of moderate elevation, traverses the northern part; the south is watered by the Nerbudda. There are fertile plains and well-wooded districts. Opium is the principal product.

Pop.—1,054,237.
Chief Towns.—INDORE, the capital; MHOW and MEEIDPOOR, places of British garrisons; MHEYSUR and MUNDLESIR, ports on the Nerbudda.
History.—The dominion of Holkar was at one time much more extended than at present; but by the treaty of Mundessor, in 1818, he ceded a considerable portion to the British, by whom he had been defeated.

INDORE, or INDOOR, in-dor', a city of India, in the province of Malwa, and the capital of the state of the same name, 32 miles S. of Oojein on the left bank of the Kuthi. The city is extensive, but contains few good houses, most of which are of two stories, built of mud and burnt bricks. It has some mosques, and a new palace built of granite; but its handsomest edifice is that of the British Residency. Pop. 75,000. Lat. 22° 42' N. Lon. 75° 50' E.

INDRA, in'-dra, a Hindoo deity represented in works of art as riding on an elephant, and is generally when painted covered with eyes. His wife is named Indrani.

INDRAGIRI, or ANDRAGERY, in-dra-geer'-e, the largest river in the island of Sumatra. It rises on the western side of the island at an elevation of 3,000 feet above the sea level, and falls into the sea in lat. 0° 35' S., after a course of 200 miles.

INDRAGIRI, or ANDRAGERY, a native state on the south-east coast of the island of Sumatra, between the rivers Kampoor and Jumbi. It is very fertile, but cultivation, except of rice for food, is neglected. Gold and ivory are exported. The state is governed by a sultan, under the control of the Dutch.

INDRAMAIJO, in-dra-mai'-yo, a town of Java, 104 miles S.E. of Batavia. It is near the sea, and there is a good haven, protected by a fort, and considerable trade is carried on. Lat. 6° 12' S. Lon. 108° 19' E.

INDRE, andr, a river of France, rising in department Creuse, near the frontiers of the department of Indre, and after a course of 136 miles, falling into the Loire between Saumur and Tours.

INDRE, a town of France, department of Loire-Inférieure, 5 miles W. of Nantes. In its neighbourhood are extensive works belonging to the government, in which cannon and steam-engines are manufactured. Pop. 3,700.

INDRE, a department of France, bounded by the departments of Loire-et-Cher, Creuse, Haute-Vienne, Vienne, and Indre-et-Loire. It is in general flat, though a few low hills appear in the S.W., and help to relieve the monotonous character of its scenery.

Rivers.—The principal are the Indre, the Creuse, the Bonzanne, and the Aise.
Pro.—Corn, wine, hemp, and flax.
Minerals.—Iron, several varieties of marble, and lithographic stones.
Manf.—Fine woollens, iron made into scythes and cutlery, linen, hosiery, paper, candles, earthenware, and porcelain.
Area.—2,785 square miles.
Pop.—287,705.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements, and 245 communes. The chief towns are CHATEAUROUX, the capital; LE BLANC, LE CHÂTRE, and ISSOUDUN.

INDRE-ET-LOIRE, a department of France, bounded N. by the departments of Loire-et-Cher, the Indre, the Vienne, and the Maine. It is diversified with hill, dale, valley, and plain, with a climate remarkably mild, and alike free from the extremes of heat and cold. In the valley of the Loire the soil is generally very fertile, but in other parts poor.

Rivers.—The principal are the Loire, the Vienne, the Cher, and the Indre.
Pro.—Hemp, flax, liquorice, anise, and coriander. Agriculture has long been in a backward state, but is now being pursued with greater ardour. Fruit, especially prunes and melons, is very plentiful. Walnuts and almonds are also gathered in large quantities, and crushed for the sake of their oil. The vine is also extensively cultivated, and in ordinary seasons about 14,000,000 gallons of wine are made.
Minerals.—Iron is the most important, and there are some millstone-quarries.
Manf.—Unimportant. They consist of woollen and silk goods, leather, gunpowder, and iron.
Area.—2,362 square miles.
Pop.—329,960.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 3 arrondissements and 281 communes. The principal towns are TOURS, the capital; CHINON, and LOCHE.

INDUS, in'-dus, one of the great rivers of Asia, which rises in Tibet, on the N. of the mountain Kailas, celebrated in the mythology of the Hindoos. The geographical position of its source is defined as lying about lat. 31° 20′ N., and lon. 81° 30′ E., near the sources of the Sutlej, Brahmapootra, Ganges, and Jumna, at an elevation of 18,000 feet above the sea. After passing the city of Lahdak, in Tibet, it takes a south-westerly course, and forcing its way through the mountains called the Hindoo Koosh, enters Hindostan in about the 35th degree of northern latitude. Its course is generally to the south. In lat. 28° 20′ it is joined by the five rivers of the Punjab, united into one stream, called the Punjnud; whence declining to the south-east, it enters the province of Scinde, between the 28th and 29th degrees of latitude. It is again divided by a large island into two considerable branches; the principal or western branch, after passing the city of Tattah, divides into several streams, which form a delta between Hyderabad and the ocean, Kurachee and Lukhput-Bunder, 130 miles in length and breadth. The tide rises nearly up to Tattah, a distance of 70 miles. The quantity of water discharged by this river has been estimated at upwards of 150,000,000 tons annually. Length, estimated at 1,800 miles.

INEBOLI, in-e-bo'-le, a seaport of Turkey in Asia, on the Black Sea, 73 miles W. of Sinope. Manf. Cables for the Turkish government. There is a good export trade. Pop. 3,000.

INES DE CASTRO, e'-nais dai kas'-tro, a noble lady of Castile, famous for her beauty and her misfortunes. Don Pedro, son of Alfonso IV., king of Portugal, fell in love with and secretly married her. The king, on discovering their union, desired his son to abandon her, but on his refusing to do so, caused Ines to be assassinated. On succeeding to the throne, in 1357, Don Pedro executed the most summary vengeance upon the murderers of his former wife, and causing her body to be disinterred, crowned her remains, and proclaimed Ines his queen. The Portuguese poet Camöens founded a tragedy upon this incident, and a play has been written upon the same subject by Earl Russell.

INGELHEIM, in'-gel-hime, a market-town of Hesse-Darmstadt, province of Rheinhessen, on the Selz, 8 miles S.W. of Mainz. It is walled, and has two churches, and was a residence of Charlemagne. Manf. Paper, and it has an oil, wine, and cattle trade. Pop. 2,400.

INGEMANN, BERNHARD SEVERIN, in'-ger-man, a Danish poet and novelist, whose father, the Protestant pastor of Torkildstrup, in the island of Falster, died while his son was very young. His mother contrived, however, to send him to the university of Copenhagen, where, at the age of 23, he carried off the gold medal for his essay in answer to the question "What relation do poetry and elegance bear to each other?" A year previously he had published a volume of lyrics, and, in 1814, he produced "The Black Knights," an epic and allegorical poem, on the model of Spenser's "Faerie Queene." Subsequently, he wrote two tragedies, "Masaniello" and "Blanca," which became very popular on the Danish stage. A third drama, "The Shepherd of Tolosa," was unsuccessful; and, although he afterwards wrote several dramas, none were composed with a view to theatrical representation. After having travelled in Europe between the years 1818 and 1820, he wrote a volume of poems, and commenced a series of romances, embodying historical and traditional incidents in the mediæval history of his native country. These romances, several of which have been translated into English, were written in imitation of Sir Walter Scott, and became exceedingly popular in Denmark. In 1822 he was nominated professor of the Danish language and literature at the college of Söröe, near Copenhagen, and, in 1842, was appointed director of the same institution.

Born at Torkildstrup, island of Falster, 1789; died 1862.

INGERSOLL, CHARLES J., an American statesman, son of Jared Ingersoll, an active agent in the American revolution. Charles Ingersoll was elected to Congress in 1812, and was for fourteen years United States district attorney for Pennsylvania, and sat in Congress from 1839 to 1849. He published, in 1801, a tragedy entitled "Edwy and Elgiva;" a political pamphlet in defence of the democratic policy of Jefferson in 1808; "Inchiquin's Letters," a satirical review of American politics, in 1810; two series of "Historical Sketches of the War of 1812" (1845 and 1852), and was for a short time put under arrest in 1862 for a speech in opposition to the Lincoln administration.

Born in Philadelphia, 1782; died 1862.

INGERSOLL, a town of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, on the Thames, 80 miles S.W. of Toronto. There is a large trade in wheat, flour, and timber. Pop. 4,500.

INGHAM, ing'ham, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 33,676. The capital is Mason.

INGHEN, WILLIAM VAN, ing'-hen, a Dutch historical painter. After being the pupil of Anthony Grebber, he studied in Italy, and, on his return, settled at Amsterdam, where his works are held in great esteem.

Born at Utrecht, 1651; died about 1720.

INGHIRAMI, CAVALIER FRANCESCO, in-ge-ra'-me, an eminent Italian archæologist, who applied himself assiduously to the study of ancient art. His great work, entitled "Monumenti Etruschi," in six volumes, published in 1826, has been the source from which writers on Etruscan antiquities have derived their knowledge. He was also author of a number of other works on the Art and Remains of Antiquity, and, for a long period, was keeper of the Laurentine library at Florence.

Born at Volterra, in Tuscany, 1772; died 1846.

INGOLDSTADT, in-gol'-stat, a town and fortress of Upper Bavaria, on the left bank of the Danube, 46 miles N.W. of Munich. Its fortifications were demolished in 1800, but they have since been rebuilt stronger than they were before. It is a place of some importance, having both civil and military offices and a court of law. Its public buildings are an arsenal, town-house, old castle, hospital, a monastery, nunnery, and various schools and churches. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, gunpowder, playing cards, and potash. There is also some trade in corn. Pop. 13,200. It was the ancient Aureatum, and is spoken of by old writers as "the golden city."

INGOUVILLE, ang'-oo-veel, a town of France, department of Seine Inférieure, about half a mile from Havre, of which it may be said to form a suburb. Its form is amphitheatral, and it contains many fine villas belonging to the merchants of Havre. Manf. Ropes, china-ware, chemicals, and tiles. Pop. 5,000.

INGRASSIA, JOHN PHILIP, in-gras'-se-a, a physician of Palermo, who, in 1575, delivered his country from the fury of the plague.

Born 1511; died 1581.

INGRES, JEAN DOMINIQUE AUGUSTE, angr, a distinguished French painter. After having spent some years in the atelier of David, he won, in 1800, the second great prize for painting. In 1802 he produced one of his most celebrated works,—"The Bather." In 1804 he painted a portrait of Napoleon as first consul, and again in 1806 as emperor. He resided for fifteen years at Rome, and four years at Florence, in both of which cities he painted many of his best works. He was made chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1834 and commander in 1845. In 1862 he became a senator and member of the Imperial Council of Public Instruction.
Born at Montauban, 1781; died 1867.

INGUL, in'-gul, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Kherson, and, after a course of 170 miles, joining the Bug at the town of Nicolaev. In the lower part of its course the channel has been recently deepened and made navigable.

INGULETZ, in'-gul-etz, a river of Russia, rising in the north-east of Kherson, and forming part of the boundary between the government of Ekaterinoslav. After a course of 300 miles it joins the Dnieper, on the right bank, 9 miles above Kherson. The principal affluent is the Visun.

INGULPH, in-gulf', abbot of Croyland in the 11th century, and favourite of William the Conqueror, to whom he was secretary. He rebuilt his monastery, and obtained for it many privileges. His supposed work, the "History of Croyland Abbey," has been translated from the Latin.
Born about 1030; died 1109.

INGURE, or INGOUR, in'-goo-re, a river of Russia, rising on the southern slope of the Caucasus, on the north of Mongrelia, and flowing in a south-west course of 70 miles to the Black Sea.

INHAMBANE, in'-ham-ba-ne, a town and port of Eastern Africa, at the southern entrance of the Mozambique Channel, 8 miles from the mouth of a river of the same name. There is a good harbour. A trade is carried on in ivory and bees-wax. Lat. 23° 51′ S. Lon. 35° 24′.

INIA, in'-e-a, a river of Siberia, government of Tomsk, flowing in a generally western course, and joining the right bank of the Obi, after a course of 160 miles.

INIESTA, in-yes'-ta, a town of Spain, province of Cuenca, 44 miles S.E. of the town of that name. It is old and poorly built. There is a trade in corn, wine, oil, and saffron. Pop. 3,600.

INKERMANN, in'-ker-man, a town of Russia, in the government of Taurida, on a lofty hill S.E. of Sebastopol, in the Crimea, and in a ruinous condition. There are some remarkable caves, and a church hewn out of the rocks. Here on Nov. 5th, 1854, General Cathcart, and many other brave men fell, in a severe battle sustained by detachments of the allied forces numbering about 14,000 for several hours, against a force of more than 60,000 Russians.

INMAN, REV. JAMES, in'-man, an eminent mathematician, many years professor of mathematics at the Royal Naval College, Portsmouth dockyard. He sailed round the world with Flinders, as astronomer, was wrecked with him, and took part with the late Sir John Franklin in that celebrated action in which a fleet of British merchantmen beat off the French Admiral Lincis. While professor of mathematics at the Royal Naval College, he reduced to system the previous ill-arranged methods of navigation, and published several valuable works now in general use in the naval service. His translation of "Chapman," with his valuable annotations, was long a text-book of naval architecture.
Born 1772: died 1859.

INN, in, a river of Europe, rising in a lake at the foot of the Rhætian Alps, and forming the romantic valleys called the Upper and Lower Engadine. It traverses the Tyrol, north-easterly direction, and, after a course of about 280 miles, falls into the Danube at Passau. It is well stocked with various kinds of fish.

INNACONDAH, in-na-kon'-da, a town of India, province of Madras, 50 miles S.W. of Guntoor. There is a large export trade in saltpetre, tobacco, cloth, and chilies. Pop. 4,300.

INNIS, in'-nis, a prefix to the names of numerous parishes, towns, and islands in Ireland.

INNOCENT I., ST., in'-no-sent, Pope, was a native of Albano, and elected to the pontifical chair in 402. He proceeded to Ravenna to request the emperor Honorius to make peace with Alaric; but during his absence the latter plundered Rome.
Died at Ravenna, 417.

INNOCENT II. (GREGORIO PAPI) ascended the throne in 1130. He was elected by part only of the conclave, the rest choosing Peter de Leon, the son of a Jew, who took the name of Anacletus II., and was acknowledged by the kings of Scotland and Sicily, but Innocent was received by the other princes of Europe. Being driven from Italy, he fled to France, where he held several councils. On the death of his rival, and the abdication of his successor, Victor IV., he returned to Rome, and held the second Lateran council in 1139.
Died at Rome, 1143.

INNOCENT III. (LOTHARIO CONTI) came of a noble family. On account of his learning he was made cardinal, and, in 1198, elected pope at the age of 37. He encouraged the crusades to the Holy Land, promoted one against the Albigenses, laid the kingdom of France under interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England. He greatly extended his temporal dominions, and raised the papal authority to its highest degree of power.
Born at Anagni, 1161; died at Perugia, 1216.

INNOCENT IV. (SINIBALDO DE' FIESCHI) was a Genoese, and became chancellor of the Roman church. Gregory IX. created him a cardinal in 1227. He succeeded Celestine IV. in 1243, at which time the court of Rome was engaged in a contest with the emperor Frederick II. Innocent was obliged to retire to France, where he held the council of Lyons, in which Frederick was excommunicated. He is said to have been the first who gave red hats to the cardinals.
Died at Naples, 1254.

INNOCENT V. (PIETRO DE' CHAMPAGNIACO), a Dominican, became archbishop of Lyons, cardinal, and lastly Pope, in 1276, but died five months after his election. Some religious pieces of his have been printed.
Born 1225; died 1276.

INNOCENT VI. (ETIENNE D'ALBERT), cardinal bishop of Ostia, was advanced to the papacy in 1352. He was a man of great learning and liberality, and some of his letters are extant.

Died at Avignon, 1362.

INNOCENT VII. (COSMO DE' MIGLIORATI) was elected Pope in 1404; but not without great opposition.

Born at Abruzzo, 1336; died 1406.

INNOCENT VIII. (GIOVANNI BATTISTA CIBO), a noble Genoese, of Greek extraction, obtained the tiara, in succession to Sixtus IV. in 1484. He endeavoured to organise another crusade, but without success.

Born 1432; died 1492.

INNOCENT IX. (GIOVANNI ANTONIO FACHINETTO) ascended the papal throne on the death of Gregory XIV., in 1591, but died two months afterwards.

Born at Bologna, 1519; died at Rome, 1591.

INNOCENT X. (GIOVANNI BATTISTA PANFILI), a Roman, succeeded Urban VIII. in 1644, at the age of 73. He condemned the doctrines of Jansenius, and prosecuted the Barberini family with great violence.

Born 1571; died 1655.

INNOCENT XI. (BENEDETTO ODESCALCHI).—Innocent X. gave him a cardinal's hat and a bishopric. He was elected Pope in 1676, and reformed many abuses in the ecclesiastical state. He had a contest with Louis XIV. of France about the right of disposing of benefices and church lands claimed by that monarch, and confirmed to him by an assembly of his clergy, which nearly terminated in a separation of the French church from the Roman communion. This pope effected a coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks.

Born at Como, 1611; died 1689.

Born at Naples, 1614; died at Rome, 1700.

INNOCENT XIII. (MICHAEL ANGELO CONTI), a Roman, and the eighth Pope of his family, was elected to the papal chair in 1721. He gave a pension to the grandson of James II., and is said to have died of chagrin for having been persuaded to bestow a cardinal's hat on Dubois.

Born 1655; died 1724.

INNSPRUCK, or INNSBRUCK, ins'-brook, "bridge of the Inn," a town of the Austrian empire, the capital of the Tyrol, at the confluence of the Sill and the Inn, with a beautiful bridge over the latter river, 59 miles N. of Munich. It is almost in the centre of the valley of the Inn, and enclosed by mountains 6,000 and 8,000 feet high. Here are several public edifices, more remarkable, however, for size than elegance; such as the government-house, the town-house, the opera, the arsenal, and the barracks. The only buildings of taste are the small chapel erected by the empress Maria Theresa to the memory of her husband, and the great hall in the palace, which was the former residence of the princes of Tyrol. Besides these, there is the Hofkirche, containing the tomb of Maximilian I., although he is not interred in it, and that of Hofer, the celebrated patriot. There are several other churches, especially the Jesuits' church, the Capuchin church, the church of St. James, and the first Protestant Church in the Tyrol (1879); a fine palace built by the empress Maria Theresa, an old palace, a lyceum or academy, a medical school, and another establishment called the General Seminary for Tyrol; a museum called the Ferdinandeum, a town-house, and a register-office. Manf. Woollens, silks, cottons, gloves, and glass. Pop. 20,537.

INO, i'-no, in Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and Hermione. She married Athamas, king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicertes and Learchus, and soon conceived an implacable hatred against the children of Nephele, because they were to ascend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle were informed of her machinations, and escaped to Colchis on a golden ram. Juno, jealous of Ino's prosperity, sent Tisiphone to the palace of Athamus, and caused such disturbance therein that Athamus, taking Ino to be a lioness, and her children whelps, pursued her, and dashed her son Learchus against a wall. Ino escaped his fury, but threw herself from a high rock into the sea, with Melicertes in her arms. The gods had compassion on her, and Neptune made her a sea-deity, afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicertes also became a sea-god, known by the name of Palæmon.

INOWRAZLAW, or JUNG-BRESLAU, i'-nou-ras'-law, a town of Prussia in the government of Posen, 26 miles S.E. from Bromberg. It has a court of law and several public offices. Manf. Saltpetre works, and it has both distilleries and breweries. Pop. 7,500.

INSARA, or INSAR, in'-sar, a town of Russia, on the left bank of the Isa, 58 miles N.W. of Penza. The smelting of iron ore is carried on. Pop. 4,750.

INSTERBURG, in'-stair-boorg, a town of Prussia, province of E. Prussia, 15 miles N.W. of Gumbinnen. It has a castle, several schools, an infirmary, court of law, and other public offices. Manf. Leather, linen, and earthenware, with a trade in linseed and corn. Pop. 18,745.

INTERLACHEN, or INTERLAKEN, in-ter-la'-ken, "between the lakes," a village of Switzerland, 26 miles S.E. of Bern. It is beautifully situate near the bank of the Aar, in the valley of Boedeli, between the lakes of Brienz and Thun. It has a fine castle and a neat church. On account of its picturesque scenery, and the cheapness of living in it, it receives a large number of visitors during the summer months. Pop. 1,900.

INTRA in'-tra, a town of Northern Italy, on the W. shore of Lake Maggiore, 35 miles N. of Novara. It is beautifully situated between two small streams, the Santo Bernadino and the Santo Giovanni, both crossed by handsome stone bridges. It is well built, and there are a fine modern church and several other churches. Manf. Linen and cotton goods, brass, iron, and leather. Pop. 4,400.

INVERARY, in-ve-rair'-e, a royal parliamentary and municipal burgh and seaport of Scotland, and the chief town of the county of Argyle, 45 miles S.W. of Glasgow. It is situate on a small bay, 8 miles from the head of Loch Fyne. The town, though small, is neat and handsome. It has an established and a free church, and a gaol, which contains, also, a range of handsome court and county rooms. The chief support of the place is the herring-fishery, which appears to have flourished from time immemorial. Near to this place is Inverary Castle, a residence of the dukes of Argyle. Pop. 900.

INVERCARGILL, in-ver-kar'-gil, a town at the mouth of the New River, in the province of Otago, New Zealand. It is the terminus of the Bluff harbour and Invercargill Railway. There are several churches and banks in the town, which is connected by short lines of rail with the surrounding country, which is mainly agricultural. Pop. of town, 5,017; including suburbs, 8,000.

INVERKEITHING, in-ver-kee'-thing, a royal and parliamentary burgh and seaport of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the north coast of the Frith of Forth, 9 miles N.W. of Edinburgh. It is of great antiquity, and has a commodious harbour. In the neighbourhood are two foundries, a large distillery, brewery, and shipbuilding-yard and tanworks. Pop. 1755.

INVERNESS-SHIRE, in-ver-nes'-sheer, a large county of Scotland, stretching diagonally across the island from sea to sea, bounded on the N. by Ross-shire and part of the Moray Frith; E. by the counties of Banff and Aberdeen; S. by those of Perth and Argyle; and W. by the Atlantic Ocean. A small insulated district between the counties of Banff and Moray is annexed to it; also several of the Hebrides. These are Harris, North and South Uist, Benbecula, Skye, Barra, Eigg, and the smaller islets which are situate on the coast. The surface is generally extremely rugged and uneven, consisting of vast ranges of mountains, separated from each other by narrow and deep valleys. These mountains stretch across the whole county, and lie parallel to every valley, rising like immense walls on both sides, while the intersected parts sink deep between them, with a lake, or rapid river, or arm of the sea, flowing in the centre. The Great Glen of Albyn, or Glenmore (through which passes the Caledonian Canal), divides the county, in a N.E. and S.W. direction, into two almost equal parts. The northern extremity of this glen opens by the river Ness into the Moray Frith, and, following it south-westwards from this point, it incloses lochs Ness, Oich, and Lochy, whence it extends into the Atlantic Ocean, by the long inlet of the sea called Loch Linnhe. There are eight other inferior straths or valleys, which are subordinate to this great glen, and connected with it at different points. In the northern part is another great glen called Strath Glass, with its tributaries, running nearly north-east, and opening into the Frith of Beauly. To the south of the town of Inverness there are other straths bordered by mountains; and farther south, in the district of Badenoch, lies the great strath of the Spey. The coast, especially on the W., is broken by numerous creeks, bays, and arms of the sea; and, in the extensive mosses, huge trunks and stocks of trees are often found, and indicate the fact that, at some distant period, large forests must have covered their surface. The most extensive moss in Great Britain is near Badenoch, and in the western part is a wild and mountainous district, 70 miles in extent, known as the Rough Bounds.

Mountains.—The most extensive range is the Monadlia, or Monagh Lea (Grey Mountain), which extends from Lochaber to the vicinity of Nairn, a distance of 80 miles. In some parts this ridge is 30 miles broad, and has elevations of 3,000 feet. The Benalder range, in the south-west, is the next in point of magnitude, and presents some of the finest mountain scenery in the world. Connected with these ranges are Ben Nevis, 4,406 feet high; Mealfaurvounie, 3,060 feet; Cairngorm and Brae Riach, the one 4,050 and the other 4,304 feet high.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Ness, the Lochy, the Beauly, and the Spey are the principal rivers. Those of inferior note are the Findhorn, the Nairn, and the Nevis, all of which are fed by numerous smaller streams. Of these may be mentioned the small river Foyers, noted for its picturesque cataract. The principal lakes are Lochs Ness, Arkaig, Lochy, and Laggan, and a part of Loch Ericht is within the county. The Caledonian Canal, opened in 1822, connects the E. and W. seas from Loch Eil on the W. to the Moray Frith on the E. coast, a length of over 60 miles. The number of locks on this canal is 28, all calculated for the passage of large vessels.

Zoology.—The mountains and forests are inhabited by herds of red and roe deer; the alpine and common hare, and other game, are also abundant. Wild cats are numerous, large, and very fierce; there are also badgers, and the different varieties of the weasel tribe; whilst the lakes and rivers abound with otters. Most of the species of eagles, hawks, and owls, of different sorts, are to be found. Black game, grouse, and ptarmigan are numerous; also partridges, woodcocks, snipes, and pheasants. The rivers abound with salmon, and, in the lochs, the char is found in great perfection.

Pro.—The soil being extremely various, moss, moor, and heathy ground covering a large portion of the county, the principal employment of the farmer is the management of black cattle and sheep, especially the former; and numerous herds of goats are also to be found in every district. Oats are the principal crop; but good wheat is grown in the neighbourhood of the Moray Frith.

Minerals.—Limestone is found in every district of the county, and, in many places, approaches to the nature of marble.

Area.—4,256 square miles, more than two-thirds consisting of barren heath.

Pop.—90,414.

Chief Town.—The capital is INVERNESS.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

INVERNESS, a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh and seaport of Scotland, and the capital of the above county, is situate on both sides of the river Ness, at its entrance into the Moray Frith, 115 miles N.W. of Edinburgh. The larger portion is on the left bank of the river, and an iron suspension bridge connects the two parts of the town. Inverness has long been considered as the metropolis of the Highlands. It is a large and handsome place, adorned with many elegant houses and buildings. The eastern part of the town bears an appearance of antiquity; the western part is of more modern erection, and is not so extensive. St. Andrew's Cathedral is a fine modern Gothic structure, the first stone of which was laid by the archbishop of Canterbury in 1866. Exclusive of the various churches and chapels of different denominations, the principal public buildings are the county buildings, a fine castellated structure, the exchange, the town-hall, the assembly-rooms, the royal infirmary, the royal academy, endowed by the McIntosh fund, Bell's and the Free Church institutions, a reading-room, debating society, farmers' society, a theatre, schools, and other institutions. Inverness being the great thoroughfare to the northern counties, is greatly resorted to in the summer season by strangers; and the inns and hotels afford excellent accommodation. The shops are also numerous and handsome; and the whole town wears an aspect of cheerfulness and neatness. Manf. Woollens, iron, and brass; and there are tan-works and shipbuilding-yards. The harbours are safe and commodious. Four large annual fairs are held. Pop. 21,725. Lat. 57° 28' N. Lon. 4° 13' W.—A station on the London and North-Western, Great Northern, North British, Caledonian, Great Northern of Scotland, and Highland railways. Inverness is a place of great antiquity. The first burgh charter was granted to the town by king William the Lion (1165-1214), and was renewed by successive sovereigns until the reign of James VI., when the constitution or set of the burgh was finally settled. From the time of the revolution to about the year 1745, Inverness was in a declining state; but it is now almost wholly rebuilt, and its limits are yearly extending on every side.

INVERURY, or INVERURIE, in-ve-roo'-re, a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh in Aberdeenshire, seated on a point of land formed by the confluence of the Don and Ury, 14 miles N.W. of Aberdeen. It carries on a considerable trade in coal, lime, iron, bricks, and timber. Pop. 2,700. —A station on the Great North of Scotland railway.

INVESTIGATOR'S GROUP, a cluster of six islands off the west coast of Australia, including Flinder's (the largest), Waldegrave, Top Gallant, Ward, and Pearson's Islands. Lat. 33° 40' S. Lon. 115° E.

IO, i'-o, in Greek mythology, daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jasus or Pirene, was priestess of Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno discovering the god in her company, Jupiter changed Io into a beautiful heifer, and the goddess obtained from her spouse the animal, whose beauty she had condescended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter despatched Mercury to destroy Argus, and restore her to liberty. Io was now persecuted by Juno, who sent a malicious insect to torment her. She wandered over the earth, and crossed the sea, till at length she stopped on the banks of the Nile, still exposed to Juno's plague. Here she was changed by Jupiter into a woman, and bore Epaphus. She subsequently married Telegonus, or Osiris, king of Egypt. After death she received divine honours under the name of Isis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phœnician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for Europa, who had been stolen from them by the Greeks.

IOLAS, or IOLAUS, i'-o-las, in Greek legend is a son of Iphiclus, king of Thessaly, who assisted Hercules in conquering the Hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others. He was restored to youth and vigour by Hebe, at the request of his friend Hercules. Subsequently, he assisted the Heraclidæ against Eurystheus (see HERACLIDÆ), and is said by some to have killed that tyrant with his own hand. According to Diodorus, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia.

IOLE, i'-o-le, in Greek legend, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promised her in marriage to Hercules (see HERCULES), but he refused to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force. It was to extinguish the love of Hercules for this princess that Dejanira sent him the tunic poisoned with the centaur's blood, which caused his death. After his death, Iole married his son Hyllus. (See HYLLUS.)

IOLO GOCH, e-o'-lo goch, a Welsh bard, who lived with Owen Glendower, by whom he was employed to compose warlike songs to rouse his countrymen against the English.
Lived between 1370 and 1420.

ION, i'-on, a son of Xuthus, son of Erechtheus. He married Helice, daughter of Selinus, king of Ægiale. He succeeded to his father-in-law's throne, and built a city, which he called Helice, after his wife. His subjects were named after him, Ionians, and their country that of Ionia.

IONA, ICOLMKILL, or I-COLUMB-KILL, e-o'-na, 'the isle of Columba's cell or retreat,' an island of Scotland, one of the HEBRIDES, in the Atlantic Ocean, separated from the western point of Mull by a narrow channel, called the Sound of Iona, 7 miles from Staffa. It is about 3 miles long, and from a mile to 1½ mile broad, and is extremely interesting to the antiquary for the ruins of its ancient religious edifices. These were established about the year 563, by St. Columba, who left Ireland, his native country, with the intention of preaching Christianity to the Picts. The remains of these edifices, almost all constructed of fine syenite, together with crosses and sepulchral monuments, are the antiquities now extant. The exact date of none of the former is known, but St. Oran's chapel is supposed to have been built in the latter part of the 11th century; and the church is said to have been built by Queen Margaret early in the 13th century. It is cruciform, and the east window is a beautiful specimen of Gothic workmanship. Here are the tombs of forty-eight Scottish kings, four kings of Ireland, eight Norwegian monarchs, and one king of France. South from the cathedral and St. Oran's chapel are the ruins of the nunnery, the church of which is pretty entire; and here, also, are several monuments. There are an established church and a free church in the village of Iona, which faces the Sound, and consists of about forty thatched cottages. There is also a small but commodious inn. Pro. Barley, oats, and potatoes; but the rearing of black cattle forms the principal occupation of the inhabitants. Pop. 270.

IONIA, i-o'-ne-a, an ancient name of a country of Asia Minor, extending, according to Ptolemy, along the coast of the Ægean Sea from the river Hermus to the Meander. Ephesus, Smyrna, Clazomenæ, Erythræ, Colophon, and Miletus united to form the Ionian League. They became subject to the Persians about 557 B.C., formed an alliance with and became dependent on Athens during the Persian war, were afterwards subjected to the Spartan rule, and became again (387 B.C.) a part of the Persian empire until the time of Alexander the Great. In 64 B.C. they became subject to the Romans. In later times Ionia fell into the hands of the Turks, and few vestiges of its former greatness remain. The Ionians were wealthy, luxurious, and effeminate. The Ionic dialect of the Greek language was remarkable for its softness, owing to the number of vowels introduced; and the Ionic architecture is a graceful variation of the Greek style.

IONIA, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 33,872. The capital is Ionia.

IONIAN ISLANDS, i-o'-ni-an, a chain, consisting of seven principal islands, and a number of islets, extending along the south-west coast of Greece. The seven principal islands are Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante, Santa Maura, Ithaca or Theaki, Cerigo, and Paxo. Corfu is the most northerly, and lies opposite to Albania; Paxo, Santa Maura, Ithaca, Cephalonia, and Zante, follow each other in succession to the southward, lying along the coasts of Albania and the ancient Elis; but Cerigo is detached, being 150 miles to the south-east of Zante, and opposite to the coast of the ancient Laconia. A series of earthquake shocks in 1867 almost destroyed the two chief towns of Cephalonia. The islands are mostly of an irregular form, and much indented by the sea. Their surface is generally uneven, containing a number of barren rocks and hills, interspersed, however, with fertile plains and valleys. In these, however, there is not sufficient arable land to produce the corn required for the population.

Pro.—Corn, grapes, olives, currants, cotton, honey, wax, &c.

Manf.—Salt, olive-oil, wine, and brandy, as well as other kinds of liquors; and a coarse cotton cloth is made in Cephalonia.

Area.—1,041 square miles.

Pop.—458,330, mostly of Greek descent.

Lat.—Between 35° 48′ and 39° 55′ N. Lon. between 18° 35′ and 23° 18′ E.

History.—These islands belonged to the eastern half of the Roman empire till 1081, when they were taken possession of by the Duke of Calabria. In the 15th century, after many vicissitudes, they became an appanage of Venice, and continued so until 1797, when they were given to France by the treaty of Campo Formio, by which France and Austria divided the possessions of the republic of Venice. Two years later a Turco-Russian fleet took possession of them; and by a convention concluded between the Porte and Russia in 1800, it was stipulated that the Seven Islands, and the coast depending on them, should be constituted into a republic, tributary to the Ottoman empire. The treaty of Amiens confirmed the loss to France of the Ionian Islands, by declaring them independent, and placing them under the protection of Russia. The treaty of Tilsit, in 1807, restored them to France, in whose possession they remained till 1814. By the treaties between the allied powers, in 1815, the Ionian Islands were placed under the protectorate of Great Britain. In 1849 an insurrection broke out in Cephalonia, and was suppressed by Sir Henry Ward. Great dissatisfaction, however, continued to be manifest, and in 1858 Mr. Gladstone was sent as a special commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining what could be done to give the populations of the islands satisfaction. Finding their desire for annexation to Greece was so great that they would be satisfied with nothing else, the English government decided, a few years later, to comply with their wishes—which was done by a treaty signed in March, 1864, since which period they have formed a part of the Hellenic kingdom.

IONIAN SEA, that portion of the Mediterranean communicating with the Gulf of Venice by the Strait of Otranto, and having Greece and part of European Turkey on the E.; Sicily and the most S. part of Italy on the W. Its greatest breadth is between Cape Matapan in the Morea, and Cape Passaro in Sicily, and which is about 400 miles.

IOWA, i'-o-wa, one of the central United States, bounded on the N. by Minnesota, E. by Wisconsin and Illinois, S. by Missouri, and W. by Nebraska. It is varied both in surface and soil, but in general fertile and healthy. About three-fourths consists of prairie land, and the only timber is found near the rivers. There are nearly 4,000 miles of railway, 50 colleges, and nearly 8,000 public schools.

Rivers.—The Des Moines, Cedar (with the Iowa and other affluents), flow into the Mississippi, which marks the eastern border, as the Missouri does the western.

Pro.—Indian corn, wheat, rye, oats, buckwheat, hemp, flax, hay, and potatoes.

Minerals.—Lead, iron, coal, zinc, and limestone.

Area.—55,045 square miles.

Pop.—1,624,615, with continuous evidences of energetic progress in every respect.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 100 counties. The most important towns are DES MOINES, the capital; IOWA CITY, and KEOKUK: Fort Madison, Burlington, Muscatine, Davenport, Clinton, Bellevue, and Dubuque ports.

History.—Settlements were formed in 1832. Iowa was admitted as a territory in 1838, and as a state in 1846. It was previously known as the Sioux territory.

IOWA, a river of the United States, rising in the state of the same name. It receives numerous small affluents, and, after a course of 300 miles, joins the Mississippi, on the right bank, 30 miles above Burlington. It is navigable as far as Iowa city, 80 miles from the mouth.

IOWA CITY, formerly capital of Iowa territory, built on the plateaux rising from the Iowa river. Near the river is a public promenade, and on the highest ground is the state university, formerly the capital. There is also communication by steamboat with the Mississippi. Pop. 7,123.

IOWA, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 19,221. The capital is Marengo.

IOWA, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 23,628. Mineral Point is the capital.

IPEK, a town of Turkey in Europe, on the north of Albania, on the Beshitza, or White Drin, 60 miles N.E. of Scutari. Pop. 8,000.

IPHICRATES, i-fik'-ra-tees, a celebrated Athenian general, who, by introducing some novel improvements in warfare, defeated the Thracians and Spartans. He was the son of a shoemaker. Died 380 B.C.

IPHIGENIA, if-i-je-ni'-a, in Greek legend, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by Calchas, the soothsayer, that to appease the gods, they must sacrifice Iphigenia to Diana, because her father had killed the favourite stag of that goddess. Agamemnon heard this with the greatest horror and indignation, and rather than shed the blood of his daughter, he, as chief of the Grecian forces, commanded one of his heralds to order the army to disperse. After much solicitation from the other chiefs, Agamemnon consented, however, to immolate his daughter for the common good of Greece; but as soon as Calchas had taken the knife and was about to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia suddenly disappeared, and a hind of uncommon size was found in her place. This supernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleets set sail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had excited the compassion of the goddess Diana, who carried her to Tauriea, where she intrusted her with the care of her temple, whence she subsequently fled with her brother Orestes and his friend Pylades.

IPHIS, i'-fis, in Greek legend, a daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Crete, was, in consequence of her sex, ordered by her father to be put to death; but Isis commanded her mother, in a dream, to spare the life of her child, and to educate her as if she were a boy. Her father remained ignorant of the deceit, and subsequently gave her in marriage to Ianthe, daughter of Telestes. This involved Telethusa and her daughter in great perplexity; but Isis, on their entreaties, changed the sex of Iphis, and the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest rejoicings.

IPHITUS, if'-i-tus, in Greek legend, a son of Eurytus, king of Œchalia, was killed by Hercules, because his father Eurytus had refused him his daughter Iole, after he had won her by beating him and the other king's sons in drawing the bow.

IPHITUS, a king of Elis, who re-established the Olympic games 884 B.C., about 569 years after their institution by the Idæi Dactyli. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as everything anterior to it is involved in fabulous obscurity.

IPSAMBOOL. (See ABOUSAMBUL.)

IPSWICH, ips'-widj, a market-town, parliamentary and municipal borough and river port, and the capital of Suffolk, stands on the picturesque river Orwell, here crossed by two bridges, 68 miles N.E. from London. The streets are narrow and irregular. The houses are many of them handsome modern buildings; and the rest, though old, are neat, substantial, and commodious, and mostly covered with curious carved work. There are 13 churches and several chapels. The old church of St. Mary-le-Tower has been recently restored. It has an elegant tower and lofty spire. A new Roman Catholic church was erected in 1863. The principal public buildings and institutions are the town-hall, in the Italian style, erected in 1868, a hall of commerce, a county gaol, corn exchange, custom-house, barracks, hospital, an assembly-room, theatre, a public library, and various schools; amongst them a grammar-school, founded by Cardinal Wolsey, and endowed by Queen Elizabeth. Manf. Tobacco, snuff, artificial stone, and agricultural implements, for which it is noted. There are also extensive iron-foundries, several breweries, soap-boiling establishments, and ship-building-yards. It exports grain and local manufactures, and imports coal in considerable quantities. There is also extensive general foreign trade, especially in the importation of Norwegian timber, and in oil-cake and linseed. Ipswich is a bonding port for foreign timber. Pop. 50,762.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.—According to Camden, this town was originally called Gippeswich, from the neighbouring river Gippen or Gipping. It was destroyed by the Danes, but was subsequently restored by King John, and since the time of Edward I. it has sent two members to the House of Commons.

IPSWICH, a town in the colony of Queensland, which bids fair to rival other British settlements in all the evidences of prosperity. Pop. 6,500.

IPUT, ē-put, a river of Russia, traversing the governments of Mohilev, Smolensk, and Czernigov, and joining the left bank of the Soj near Novo-Belitza, after a course of 220 miles. There are extensive forests, furnishing fine ship-timber, on the banks.

IQUIQUE, e-que-que, a seaport transferred from Peru to Chili in 1882–3. It is remarkable for precipitous rocks, 2,000 feet high. There are valuable saltpetre works in the vicinity. Pop. 16,430. Lat. 20° 12′ S. Lon. 70° 14′ W.

IRAIL, AUGUSTIN SIMON, ē-rail, a French ecclesiastic, who wrote a tragedy called "The Trumpet of Heroism," "Memoirs for a History of the Republic of Letters," and a "History of the Re-union of Brittany with France."

Born at Puy, Valay, 1719; died 1794.

IRAK-A-JEMI, e-rak′-ai′-je-me, a province of Persia, bounded S. by Fars and Khuzistan, E. by Khorassan and the Great Salt Desert, W. by Kurdistan, N. by Azerbijan, Ghilan, and Mazanderan. It abounds in productive and well-watered valleys, in which there are excellent pasturage and considerable tracts of cultivated land. Pro. Wheat, rice, sesamum, and other grains, fruits, tobacco, opium, saffron, silk, and cotton. Lat. extending from 31° 25′ to the Elburz range, in 36° N. Lon. between 48° 20′ and 53° 20′ E. The chief towns are ISPAHAN, TEHERAN, Kashan, and Hamadan.

IRAK-ARABI, ē-rak-a′-ra-bē, a district of Asiatic Turkey, in the pachalic of Bagdad. It lies between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, and includes the ruins of Babylon and Seleuci. Pop. unascertained.

IRAN, the modern name of Persia.

IRAPUATO, ē-ra-poo-a′-to, a town of Mexico, 15 miles S. of Guanajuato. There are a nunnery and a Franciscan monastery, attached to which is a richly endowed Latin school. Pop. 13,000, chiefly engaged in agriculture.

IRBIT, or IRBITSKAIA, ir′-bit, a town of Russia, in the government of Perm, stands on the rivers Irbit and Nitza, on the frontiers of Siberia. It is an entrepôt for Siberian furs and other Asiatic merchandise passing into Europe, and a great fair is held annually, attended by many thousands of merchants and visitors, and at which goods of the value of more than £5,000,000 sterling are disposed of. There is communication by steamboats with various places on the Tobol, Irtish, and Obi. Pop. 4,250. Lat. 57° 35′ N. Lon. 62° 50′ E.

IREGH, ē-reg, a market town of Hungary, 70 miles S.W. of Pesth. There are two churches, a castle, and the ruins of an old monastery. A trade in wine is carried on, and there is a large breeding stud of horses. Pop. 2,500.

IREGH, or UREGH, a market town of the Austrian empire, in Slavonia, 11 miles S. of Peterwardein. There is a large trade in wine, produced in the district. Pop. 6,000.

IRELAND, ire′-land, the most western and smaller of the two principal islands of which the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is composed. On the N.W. and S. is the Atlantic Ocean, and on the N.E. and E. the North Channel, Irish Channel, and St. George's Channel, separating it from Great Britain. Between Howth and Holyhead the breadth of the channel is 60 miles; the greatest breadth is 130 miles between Dublin and Liverpool; but between Fair Head, in the north-east, and the Mull of Cantyre, in Scotland, the distance is only about 12 miles. Measured diagonally from Fair Head to Mizen Head in the S.W., it is 306 miles long, and from Carnsore Point in the S.E. to Benwee Head in the N.W., it is 212 broad. Measured in a meridian, and on a parallel of latitude, the greatest length and breadth respectively are only 230 and 180 miles. Between the bays of Dublin and Galway the breadth is 120 miles. The coast-line is about 2,200 miles long, generally very bold and rugged. The principal inlets are Waterford and Cork in the S., Bantry and Dingle in the S.W., the estuary of the Shannon and the vast bay of Galway on the W. and that great opening on the N.W., of which the bay of Sligo is a part. Lough Swilly and Lough Foyle, on the N., are the most considerable. On the E. side are the harbours of Belfast, Newry, and Dundalk, and the barred havens of Dublin, Drogheda, and Wexford, Bantry Bay, and Cork Harbour are of great size. The principal capes are Bengore, Fair Head, Malin Head, and Bloody Foreland on the N.; Erris Head, Achill Head, Slyne Head, Loop Head, Kerry Head, and Mizen Head, on the W.; Cape Clear and Carnsore Point on the S.; and Wicklow Head and Howth Head on the E. The islands are numerous, but generally unimportant. The face of the country presents a pleasing variety of surface. In some parts there are rich and fertile plains, watered by large and beautiful streams, while in other parts hills are found in frequent succession; but, as a whole, the country may be considered as flat. The mountain-chains are neither numerous nor important; for though the country, no doubt, contains many hills of considerable elevation, yet they are not of that height, nor are they collected into such masses, as to give to Ireland the character of a mountainous country. The hilly parts are, in general, of easy ascent, and admit of culture a considerable way up their sides; some of them, however, are precipitous, and terminate in cones or spires. The highest summits are Macgillicuddy's Reeks, one of which attains an elevation of 3,414 feet. Wicklow Hills rise to 3,000; Knockmealdown and the Carran Tual Mountains to 2,700. These are the loftiest summits in the island. The bogs form a very remarkable feature in the country, being of different kinds, and in some places very extensive, occupying, it is estimated, about a seventh part of the entire surface of the country. They are composed of a vegetable matter called peat, and are generally from 20 to 30 feet deep. The peat is used as fuel. The largest bog is that of Allen, situate in King's County, Kildare, Queen's County, and Carlow, and stretching across the centre of the island. There are other large tracts of bog in Longford, Meath and Roscommon.

Rivers.—The principal are the Shannon, the Bandon, the Lee, the Blackwater, or Broadwater, the Liffey, the Boyne, the Suir, the Barrow, the Slaney, and the Bann. The Shannon has a length of 214 miles, and is navigable to Lough Allen, or within 7 miles of its whole extent. The Blackwater has a length of 100 miles, and the Bann is noted for its salmon.

Lakes or Loughs.—The principal are Lough Neagh, Lough Erne, and Lough Corrib. The Lakes of Killarney are the most distinguished for their beauty, and Neagh for size, being 150 square miles, the largest in the British Islands. Killarney consists of three lakes,—the Lower Lake, North, and Upper Lake, in which is the island of Innisfallen, considered among the most beautiful in Europe.

Climate.—In general more temperate than the climate of other countries in the same latitude. The heat of summer is less oppressive, and the cold of winter less severe. It is also much more humid, rain being more frequent, and the atmosphere, even when there is no rain, being impregnated with a moisture which affects the walls of houses, as well as the furniture and other articles.

Zoology.—The same as in England; but no venomous reptiles.

Pro.—Wheat is grown in various counties, but oats are most extensively cultivated. Ireland has been long celebrated for the immense quantities and excellent quality of potatoes which it produces. Flax is also grown; but the dairy husbandry is the most extensive and the best managed in Ireland. Cattle, swine, and poultry are also largely reared. The fisheries are likewise extensive, but capable of far greater development.

Minerals.—Ireland is said to rest on a bed of granite; and granite is accordingly abundant, also limestone. In the north are basaltic rocks, in some places forming picturesque colonnades, of which the Giant's Causeway, in Antrim, is a celebrated specimen. A great variety of marbles are found; besides gypsum, fuller's earth, and coal. Precious stones, such as beryls, amethysts, and jaspers, have been found; also various species of crystals, which are hard, large, and very brilliant. Pieces of native gold have also been picked up; and the lead mines in Antrim, Sligo, and Tipperary formerly produced considerable quantities of silver. Copper is found in different counties, and iron-ore is abundant. In the middle of the 17th century, iron-works were very common. Mineral springs, chiefly chalybeate, exist in almost every county.

Manf.—Linen fabrics are the staple branch of industry; these are manufactured principally in Belfast and the surrounding districts of Ulster. The entire trade of Belfast has been estimated at £26,000,000 (the exports being £13,250,000 and the imports £12,750,000). The cotton manufacture is also considerable, and that of muslins is carried on in some parts. In Dublin, Cork, Waterford, Kilkenny, and Queen's County, there are manufactures of woollen stuffs, and the Irish poplins made at Dublin and elsewhere are noted for their quality. The distillation of spirits has long been followed in Ireland to a great extent; and there are breweries in different parts.

Area.—31,874 square miles, of which about three-fourths is arable land, and rather more than one-fifth uncultivated.

Pop.—5,159,839; 3,951,888 being Roman Catholics.

Divisions.—There are four provinces, Ulster, in the north; Leinster, in the east; Connaught, in the west; and Munster, in the south. These are subdivided into 32 counties. (See separate headings.)

History.—Native historians carry back the annals of the country to a very remote period, some describing events supposed to have occurred two thousand years before the Christian era; but authentic history may be said to begin in the 5th century, when Christianity was established by St. Patrick. Between that time and the beginning of the 11th century there were frequent invasions by the Danes and other Norsemen, and the numerous petty chiefs or princes were engaged in almost continual warfare among themselves. The Danes were finally defeated by Brian Boroimhe, in 1014. In the 12th century the island was divided into five kingdoms—Ulster, Leinster, Meath, Connaught, and Munster—and several petty principalities. In 1161, Dermot McMurrough, king of Leinster, having been driven from his throne, fled to England and made an alliance with Henry II. In 1161, the English under Fitzstephen and the Earl of Pembroke (Strongbow) invaded the country, and in 1171 Henry II. landed near Waterford, received the submission of the native princes, and made his son, prince John, viceroy. Several Anglo-Norman adventurers established themselves, suppressing the native clans, but in many instances adopting Irish names and manners. Notwithstanding many desperate efforts on the part of the native chiefs, descendants of the old Irish families, to liberate themselves, the English power was consolidated, and in 1542 Henry VII. assumed the title of king, instead of lord of Ireland. Between 1649 and 1656 Cromwell and Ireton reduced the whole island to obedience by a series of victories and massacres still remembered with hatred. In 1782 it was declared that, although Ireland was an imperial crown, inseparably annexed to that of Great Britain, yet the kingdom of Ireland was distinct, with a parliament of its own; and that no body of men were competent to make laws for Ireland, except the king, lords, and commons thereof. Some time afterwards, this declaration being thought insufficient, the British legislature, by an express act of parliament, relinquished all claim of right to interfere with the judgment of the Irish courts, or to make laws to bind Ireland in time to come. In 1799 a great rebellion broke out, and was not suppressed until 150,000 Irish and 20,000 English had lost their lives. In 1800 it was deemed expedient for the welfare of Ireland that it should be united to Great Britain, and both become one kingdom. Accordingly, the two parliaments passed acts for that purpose, by which the two kingdoms, at the commencement of the year 1801, were to be styled the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and that 28 peers, 4 bishops, and 100 commoners of Ireland were to be elected to represent that country in the imperial parliament, to be assembled in England, at Westminster. The Irish state Protestant church was disestablished in 1869. The government of Ireland is viceregal, a lord-lieutenant representing the sovereign, assisted by a privy council. The law is administered by a lord chancellor, a master of the rolls, and 12 judges of the supreme court.

IRELAND, Samuel William Henry, a novelist and miscellaneous writer, notorious for his forgeries of Shakspearian documents, and for producing a play purporting to be Shakspeare's, but which was soon discovered to be a gross forgery. He was the son of a London publisher and author. After receiving a fair education in London and in France, he was articled to a lawyer in New Inn. His father was an enthusiastic collector of Shakspearian relics; and it would seem that this first induced him to forge a legal document, to which the autograph of Shakspeare was attached. His simple-minded father was imposed upon; and was soon afterwards supplied with several more papers, which were published in a volume. William Henry even went so far as to concoct a play called "Vortigern," and to palm it off upon the public as an original work of Shakspeare's. It was produced at Drury-lane theatre, with John Kemble as Vortigern (who, however, did not believe in the authorship of the work), and was most unequivocally condemned, being sorry trash. The whole of the forgeries were soon afterwards exposed by Malone and others, and young Ireland was expelled his father's house. He subsequently gained a livelihood by writing a number of indifferent novels and romances, and executing hack-work for booksellers.

Born in London, 1777; died 1835.

IRELAND, NEW. (See NEW IRELAND.)

IRELAND'S EYE, a rocky islet, 1 mile from Howth harbour, in the Irish Sea. It contains the ruins of an abbey, and has a martello tower and a lighthouse.

IREN, i'-ren, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Perm, flowing in a circuitous, but generally north-western course, and joining the right bank of the Silva, after a course of 150 miles.

IRENÆUS, ST., i-re-ne'-us, bishop of Lyons, and the disciple of Polycarp, by whom he is said to have been sent into Gaul. He was at first a priest in the church of Lyons; and, on the martyrdom of Pothinus, succeeded him in the bishopric, in 177. He had a disputation with Valentinus at Rome, and held a council at Lyons, in which the Gnostic heresy was condemned. Irenæus was a great lover of peace, and laboured to allay the controversy which raged with violence, respecting the time of celebrating Easter. His most important work, entitled "Adversus Hæreses," was directed against the Gnosticism of his age.

Born in Greece, about 140; died at Lyons, about 202.

IRENE, i-re'-ne, empress of Constantinople, and a saint of the Greek church. She was wife of the emperor Leo IV., after whose death she was acknowledged sovereign in conjunction with her son Constantine V. She displayed great talents, but committed some atrocious murders on the relations of her husband; and, in order to insure her power, deprived her own son of sight. She was anxious to contract a marriage with Charlemagne, who declined the proposal. The people, irritated by her conduct, placed Nicephorus, her treasurer, on the throne, who banished her to Lesbos, where she was made to spin for a livelihood, and ultimately died of grief.

Born at Athens, 752; died at Lesbos, 803.

IRETON, HENRY, ire'-ton, a republican general, and son-in-law of Cromwell. He greatly distinguished himself in the civil war, on the side of the parliament. He studied at Oxford, in which university he took the degree of B.A., and subsequently became a student of the Middle Temple. When the revolution broke out, he entered the parliamentary army, and soon rose to the rank of colonel. At the battle of Naseby he, after fighting very bravely, was taken prisoner by the royalists, but escaped. He was appointed to command in Ireland, where he died. His body was conveyed to England, and interred in Westminster Abbey; but, at the Restoration, it was taken up and hung at Tyburn, with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw.

Born in Nottinghamshire, 1610; died at Limerick, 1651.

IRGHIZ, irg'-hiz, a river of Turkestan, rising in Lake Chalhar, in lat. 51° 20′ N., and lon. 61° 25′ E., and after a south-eastern course of about 300 miles through a sandy country, falls into Lake Aksakal.

IRGHIZ-BALCHO, a river of Russia, formed by the junction of the Karalitz and Kamelih, in the government of Saratov, and flowing in an irregular south-western course, joins the left bank of the Volga, after a course of 130 miles.

IRIS, i'-ris, in Greek mythology, daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, but more particularly of Juno. Her office was to conduct the souls of women to the shades when they expired. Her name signifies the rainbow, and she is therefore represented with all the beautiful colours of that phenomenon. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world.

IRISH SEA, i'-rish, that part of the Atlantic Ocean which washes the coasts of the central districts of Great Britain and Ireland. It lies to the N. of St. George's Channel, and to the S. of the North Channel.

IRKUT, ir'-kut, a river of Siberia, in the government of Irkutsk, rising at the foot of the mountains of Sayansk, near the frontiers of China, and, after a course of 220 miles, joining the Angara at the town of Irkutsk.

IRKUTSK, ir'-kutsk, a government of Russia, comprehending all the E. part of Siberia, or Asiatic Russia. It is traversed by the Baikal and Nerchinzk mountains, and continuations of the great Altai range extend along the southern and eastern borders.

Rivers.—The chief are the Lena, Shilka, and Angara. There are several lakes, the largest being the Baikal.

Pro.—The principal cereals, hops, and rhubarb, are cultivated.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, lead, coal, and some precious stones.

Area.—309,188 square miles.

Pop.—308,873, including Mongols, Tunguses, Bouriats, and Russians, the latter principally descendants of political exiles.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are five administrative districts. The capital is IRKUTSK.

IRKUTSK, a city, the capital of the above government, is situate in a plain, 1,200 feet above the level of the sea, near the confluence of the Irkut and the Ushkaovkar, the latter river dividing it into two parts. The houses are of wood, and the streets unpaved. It contains a cathedral, several churches, is the residence of the governor-general of Eastern Siberia, and the station of a considerable body of troops; it is also the seat of a bishopric. Government maintains here a seminary, a popular school, and a school for navigation. Irkutsk possesses also a great commercial importance. It appears half a Chinese town, from the quantities of porcelain, enamelled and lacquered ware, and Chinese articles of dress and furniture with which the houses are filled. Manf. Woollen and linen goods, hats, leather, soap, and glass. The trade is in hay, tea, and other articles imported from China; but more especially in furs, for which the American Company have here large warehouses. The society of the upper classes has a European character; but there are many exiles amongst them. Lat. 52° 17′ N. Lon. 104° 26′ E. Pop. 36,117.

IRMILQUILPAN, ir'-mil-quil'-pan, a town of Mexico, 72 miles N.W. of Mexico, beautifully situated on the right bank of the Tula, at a height of 5,400 feet above the sea. Pop. 10,000.

IROQUOIS, ir'-o-qua, or the Six Nations, a confederation of the Indians of North America, dwelling partly in the territories of the United States, partly in Canada. The names of these six nations are, the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Onondogas, the Senecas, the Cayugas, and Tuscaroras. The Iroquois number no more, at the present time, than 12,000 individuals. They are bold, courageous, proud, and hospitable, but passionately addicted to gambling and strong drinks, or "fire-water," the use of which was unknown to them till the arrival of the white man in their country; and the indulgence of this passion has decimated their tribes. When the French arrived in Canada in 1603, the Iroquois were a mighty nation, at war with the Adirondacks, these last invoking the resistance of the new comers. The Dutch, spreading themselves along the banks of the Hudson, even as far up as the present city of Albany, drove the Adirondacks before them. During the wars between the English and French, the Iroquois were divided into two great sections, both of which fought alternately on the side of both these nations. In the War of Independence, they were the allies of Great Britain. In 1779 the American troops massacred large numbers of them, and destroyed their villages. Since that period, they have been slowly but effectually driven before the advancing white man, and their tribes have become a mere remnant of their former strength.

IROQUOIS, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 756 square miles. Pop. 35,451. The capital is Middleport.

IRPEN, ir'-pen, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Kiev, and, after a course of 100 miles, joining the Dnieper, 20 miles above the town of Kiev.

IRRAWADI, or IRRAWADY, ir'-ra-wa'-de, a river of Asia, traversing the entire length of the Birman empire. It rises in lat. 28° N., lon. 98° E.; and, directing its course W.S.W., passes the cities of Amarapura and Old Ava. In lat. 21° 45′ it is joined from the N.W. by the Kyan-duayn river; and in lat. 17° 50′ it divides into two branches, one of which, running to the S.W., passes the town of Persaim or Bassein; the other, running to the S.E., passes Rangoon; but these branches again subdivide into many streams, which are met by the tide. The intermediate space is formed into a delta, similar to that of the Nile. Along the banks of this river, the greater part of the population of the Burmese dominions is settled.

IRRAWADDY, a division of Lower Burma, watered by the before-named river. Area, 16,805 square miles. Pop. 1,161,119.

IRTISCH, ir'-tish, a river of Northern Asia, rising on the S.W. side of the Altai mountains, near lat. 47° N., lon. 88° E. At Samarova it joins the left bank of the Obi, which gives name to the united stream. It abounds with fish, especially the sturgeon.

IRUN, é-roon, a town of Spain, province of Guipuzcoa, near the left bank of the Bidassoa, 12 miles E. of St. Sebastian. It is a place of great antiquity, having been in existence in the time of the Romans. There are a fine church and court-house. Pop. 2,600.

IRUPANA, e-ru-pa'-na, a town of Bolivia, in the province of La Paz. It has a large and handsome church, with many well-built houses; whilst in its neighbourhood are extensive gardens of exquisite orange-trees. Pop. Unascertained.

IRVINE, or IRWINE, ir'-vine, a seaport and royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, in Ayrshire, on the Irvine, 29 miles S.W. from Glasgow. The principal public buildings are the church, surmounted with an elegant spire, and the town-hall. Besides these, there are several other places of worship, various schools, a handsome news-room, and a subscription library. Manf. Weaving, book-muslins, hand-sewing, jaconets, and checks. There are, besides, a manufactory for anchors and cables, and several fine mills. Pop. of borough, 6,013.

IRVINE, a river of Scotland, in Ayrshire, which falls into the Firth of Clyde at Irvine.

IRVING, REV. EDWARD, ir'-ving, a minister of the Scottish church, and founder of the sect called Irvingites. After finishing his education at the University of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A., in 181[illegible] he became one of the teachers at the mathematical school of Haddington, and a year afterwards, was appointed head of the academy at Kirkaldy, where he remained for seven years, being then ordained minister of the Scottish church. After having preached in several churches, he was appointed Dr. Chalmers's assistant at St. John's church, Glasgow, gaining so much reputation for eloquence that he was installed minister of the Scottish church in Hatton Garden. His tall figure, his impressive style of preaching, and his vigorous discourses, caused him to attain great popularity in this church; the most wealthy and accomplished Londoners crowding to his church. Between the years 1823 and 1827, he published several discourses, lectures, and sermons. A new building, erected for him by subscription, in Regent Square, Gray's-Inn Road, was opened in 1829, and he preached in this place with the same success as formerly. In November, 1830, he was charged with heresy by the Presbytery of London, and a course of proceedings, extending over eighteen months, was instituted against him. About this time he introduced into his church what he termed "supernatural inspiration," but which his opponents called "the extravagances of the unknown tongues." In 1832 the London Presbytery pronounced him unfitted for his charge, and the trustees of his church declared that "The Reverend Edward Irving had rendered himself unfit to remain a minister of the Caledonian church, Regent Square, and ought to be removed therefrom." On being suspended from his duties, he preached in Gray's-Inn Road, and in Newman Street, Oxford Street. In 1833 the presbytery of Annan sentenced him to be deposed from his ministry. His health gave way soon afterwards, and he died of consumption.

Born at Annan, 1792; died at Glasgow, 1834.

IRVING, WASHINGTON, a distinguished American author. His father, a Scotch merchant, settled at New York, having died while he was still young, his education, which took place at home, devolved upon his elder brothers, young men of considerable attainments. His health, during youth and early manhood, was exceedingly delicate; and he spent a great deal of his time in wandering about Manhattan Island, observing the picturesque aspects of nature in that place, and listening to the traditions of the old Dutch and other settlers. His literary career was commenced in 1802, with a number of sketches contributed to the "New York Morning Chronicle," entitled "Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle." His health was, however, so frail that he was compelled to travel, with a view to its renovation. He crossed the Atlantic, and visited France, Italy, Switzerland, Holland, and England. On his return to New York, he, together with Mr. Kirke Paulding, commenced a series of humorous and graphic sketches, which were published under the title of "Salmagundi." After this he wrote a number of tales and essays for the magazines and newspapers, and about the same time began to study the law; but although he was admitted to the bar, he never practised as a barrister. In 1809 was published the humorous "History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker," which instantly made Irving one of the most popular American writers. On the breaking out of war between England and the United States, a few years afterwards, he was attached, with the rank of colonel, to the staff of General Tomkins, governor of New York. On the establishment of peace, he went to Liverpool to represent the commercial house of "Irving Brothers," a firm which subsequently failed; whereupon Washington Irving occupied himself exclusively with literature. After having travelled over England, he commenced his "Sketch-Book," forwarding his manuscript in instalments to New York, where it was published. He afterwards purposed to issue an English edition of his "Sketch-Book" at his own risk, but his publisher failed when the first volume had been produced. The book became so rapidly popular on both sides of the Atlantic, that Mr. Murray, who had previously refused it, resolved to become his English publisher, and henceforth Irving's reputation was made. A second volume of the "Sketch-Book," "Bracebridge Hall," and the "Tales of a Traveller," succeeded, the last work appearing in 1824; the author's residence during the interval of their composition being alternately at London and Paris. In 1826 he set out for Madrid, for the purpose of examining some important documents relative to Columbus, which had just been discovered in a Jesuit college in that city. His researches in the Spanish archives, as well as his explorations of the old cities of Spain, resulted in the publication of several of his most popular books,—the "History of the Life and Voyages of Columbus," the "Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus," "The Conquest of Granada," and "Tales of the Alhambra." In 1829 he was appointed secretary of the American legation in London, the Royal Society of Literature awarding him one of its gold medals, and the university of Oxford conferring upon him its honorary degree of LL.D. about the same time. In 1832 he retired to America. Leaving New York soon afterwards in company with Mr. Ellsworthy, the Indian commissioner, he travelled in the Far West, his knowledge of Indian and prairie life being reproduced in a series of entertaining works, the chief of which were "Tour on the Prairies," "Astoria, or Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains," and the "Adventures of Captain Bonneville." These were followed by a variety of sketches supplied to the American periodicals. In 1841 he was nominated minister plenipotentiary to the court of Spain, representing his country with distinguished success at Madrid till 1846, when he was, at his own wish, recalled. Washington Irving hereupon retired to his beautiful estate, Sunnyside, on the banks of the Hudson, about 25 miles from New York, which he had purchased a few years before. In this charming retreat he lived, engaged in literary labour till his death; narrating the rise and progress of Mohammedanism in his lives of "Mahomet" and his "Successors," and writing the biography of Oliver Goldsmith. Besides these, he revised his complete works, and published a collected edition of them. His last productions were "Chronicles of Woolfert's Roost," a series of sketches in the style of the old "Sketch-Book," and the "Life of Washington," the first volume of which was published in 1855; and this, as well as the concluding volumes, was hailed with an enthusiastic reception in America, while in England it became as popular as the previous efforts of its author.

Born at New York, 1783; died at Sunnyside, 1859.

IRWELL, ir'-wel, a river of Lancashire, rising near Bacup, and, after a course of 40 miles, falling into the Mersey at Flixton.

ISAAC, i'-sak, son of Abraham and Sarah. He was saved by the miraculous interposition of an angel, when his father was about to sacrifice him at the order of God. (See ABRAHAM.) He married Rebecca, by whom he had Esau and Jacob, the eldest of these becoming father of the Edomites, and the other, of the Israelites. He lived to the age of 180 years.

Born 2053; died 1873 B.C.

ISAAC COMNENUS, a Greek emperor, was proclaimed in 1057, in room of Michael Stratioticus, who was deposed. His reign was marked by valour and prudence, till he meddled with the property of the ecclesiastics, who excited a general discontent against him, which however subsided on the death of the Patriarch Michael, who had threatened him with deposition. He successfully repelled the encroachments of the Hungarians in 1059, and being shortly after attacked with a violent illness, which was expected to terminate fatally, appointed his general, Constantine Ducas, his successor. He recovered his health, but resigned his crown, and retired to a monastery, where he died two years after.

Died 1061.

ISAAC ANGELUS, a Greek emperor, who obtained the crown after putting to death Andronicus Comnenus, in 1185. He was a voluptuous prince, and his brother, Alexius, having gained over his officers, seized the throne, and threw him into prison, where he was deprived of his eyes, in 1195. After the death of Alexius, he was released from confinement, and placed again on the throne.

Born 1154; died in 1204.

ISAAC-KARO, ka'-ro, a Spanish rabbi, who was forced to quit Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand and Isabella, in 1499, which compelled the Jews to leave that country within four months, or turn Christians. He first went to Portugal, and thence to Jerusalem, where he led a retired life. He wrote a "Commentary on the Pentateuch," printed at Amsterdam, in 1708.

ISABEL, SANTA, e'-sa-bail, a town of Brazil, in the province of Matto-Grosso, on the Paraguassu, one of the principal streams of the Paraguay, 130 miles from St. Salvador. It consists of about 3,000 scattered huts, and is the centre of a diamond trade.

ISABELLA OF CASTILE, is'-a-bel'-la, queen of Spain, was the daughter of John II., and married, in 1469, Ferdinand II., king of Aragon. The conquest of Granada, and the discovery of America by Columbus, distinguished their reign. She was a woman of great abilities. (See FERDINAND.)

Born 1450; died 1504.

ISABELLA II., queen of Spain, succeeded to the crown in 1833, on the death of her father, Ferdinand VII., in accordance with a decree of the Cortes, made three years previously, by which the Salic law, or law excluding females from the throne, was set aside. She was driven out by a revolution in 1868.

Born 1830.

ISABELLA OF ARAGON was the daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, the son of Ferdinand, king of Naples. In 1489 she was espoused to Giovanni Galeazzo Sforza, then a minor under the guardianship of his uncle, Ludovico Sforza, who, on seeing Isabella, fell in love with her. The lovers having been married by proxy only, Ludovico contrived by divers means to keep them asunder, and declared his passion to Isabella, who repulsed him, and exhorted her husband to shake off his uncle's yoke. Ludovico soon afterwards married Alphonsina, daughter to the duke of Ferrara, a woman of an ambitious and intriguing spirit, and, by their contrivance, Giovanni Galeazzo was poisoned. Ludovico then assumed the sovereignty, and Isabella sought refuge at Naples, which soon after was taken by the French, and she had to lament the loss of all her family. She then retired to a small town in the kingdom of Naples, which had been assigned her for a residence.

Died 1524.

ISABELLA, daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France, was married in 1308 to Edward, prince of Wales, afterwards Edward II. She was a woman of licentious manners, and, after various adventures, was imprisoned by her son Edward III., in the castle of Rising, where she died after a confinement of 28 years.

Born 1290; died 1357.

ISABELLA, queen of Hungary, was the sister of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, and in 1539 married John Zapolsky, king of Hungary. In 1540 she was delivered of a son while her husband was besieging the castle of Fogarras, and he was so delighted at the news, that he gave a splendid feast to his troops, and died of intemperance on the occasion. Isabella, unable to cope with the forces of Ferdinand of Austria, with whom her husband had engaged in war, called to her aid Solyman, sultan of the Turks, who treacherously seized the capital of her dominions, and obliged her to retire to Transylvania, which country she was afterwards forced to yield to Ferdinand. In 1556 she recovered Transylvania; but, when her son came of age, she refused him a share in the government.

ISABELLA, a port on the north coast of the island of Hayti, 36 miles N.W. of Santiago, where, in 1493, Columbus established the first European settlement in the New World.

ISABELLA, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 12,159. The capital is Mount Pleasant.

ISÆUS, i-sé'-us, a Greek orator of Chalcis, who went to Athens and became the master of Demosthenes, who imitated his style in preference to that of Isocrates. Sir William Jones translated his ten orations in 1780, the remainder of his sixty-four great speeches having been lost.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ISÆUS, another Greek orator, who went to Rome about 97. Pliny, the younger, states him to have been a great master of eloquence and rhetoric.

Lived in the 1st century.

ISAIAH, or ESAIAS, i-sí'-a, (Yeshayahu, "the Salvation of God"), the principal of the four great prophets, was the son of Amoz, and nephew of Amaziah, king of Judah. He prophesied in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, from about 757 to 696 B.C., in which last year Manasseh, according to the apocryphal book, "The Ascension of Isaiah," is said to have caused him to be cut in two with a wooden saw. He is called the evangelical prophet, from the clear and constant view he has taken of the Messiah throughout his predictions. It has, however, been asserted that the last 27 chapters of the prophecies of Isaiah were written by a different and later hand; and the question, notwithstanding the length of the controversy, can hardly be said to have been settled.

Died about 698 B.C.

ISAR, or ISOR, é-sar, a river of Germany, rising in the Tyrol, 6 miles N. of Innspruck, and, after a course of 180 miles, enters the Danube a little below Deggendorf. The flow of the river is for the most part rapid; but it is navigable throughout the greater portion of its length.

Lived in the 16th century.

ISIS, i'-sis. (See THAMES.)

ISIS, one of the principal deities of the Egyptians, sister and wife of Osiris. Some suppose her to be the same as Io, who was changed into a cow by her lover Jupiter, and restored to her human form in Egypt, where she taught agriculture, and received divine honours after death. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. The Egyptians believed that the inundations of the Nile proceeded from the tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, her husband, whom Typhon had murdered. The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dress herself like this goddess, and affected to be considered a second Isis.

ISKARDO, or BALTI, is-kar'-do, a town of Central Asia, on the left bank of the Indus, in a very elevated situation, and protected by a large fortress, on a rock, 7,100 feet above the sea. Lat. 35° 10′ N. Lon. 75° 27′ E.

ISMAIL, or ISMAILOV, is'-ma-eel, a strong town of the principality of Moldavia, on the north side of the Kilia, the principal arm of the Danube, 120 miles S.W. of Odessa. It is surrounded by a moat and earthen rampart, and forms an important military station near the Turkish frontier. There are a fine palace, and a Greek and an Armenian church. Manf. Leather. There is a large trade in corn, wool, hides, and tallow. Pop., including the suburbs of Tutchkono, 26,000. This place was long in the possession of the Turks; it was stormed by the Russians, under Suwarrow, in 1790, became a Russian town after the peace of Bucharest (1812); was restored to Turkey in 1856 by the Treaty of Paris, and now belongs to the Moldavian principality.

ISMAIL PASHA, Khedive, or viceroy of Egypt, was the nephew of his predecessor, Said Pasha. He was educated at Paris, and on his return to Egypt, at the age of 19, he placed himself in opposition to the court party, but on the accession of Said Pasha was employed on several confidential missions, acted as regent during the viceroy's visit to Europe in 1861; in the following year commanded a large military force engaged in the subjugation of some rebellious tribes in the Soudan, and succeeded Said in 1863. In 1867 he visited France and England, and in 1869 presided at the grand opening of the Suez Canal. He is a man of great energy, has effected many reforms, and undertaken great works, but allowed the financial position of Egypt to get into considerable disorder, a result of which was that England purchased his shares in the Suez Canal, and English financiers undertook to investigate his position.

Born at Cairo, 1830.

ISMAILA, a town of Egypt, on the salt lake Timseh, near the Suez Canal, and the chief seat of the canal company, 46 miles S. of Port Said. It is built in the European style, is connected with the canal by a branch, and a good trade is carried on.

ISMID, or ISNIKMID, is'-mid, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, the ancient Nicomedia, 50 miles S.E. of Constantinople, on a hill, near an outlet of the Sea of Marmora. Pop. about 5,000.

ISNALLOZ, is-nal'-loze, a town of Spain, province of Granada, on a hill, 16 miles N.E. of the town of Granada. There are a fine ancient church, the ruins of an old castle, and two squares. There is a trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,800.

ISNIK, is'-nik, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 65 miles S.E. of Constantinople. It was the capital of Bithynia, and was, in 325 and 787, the seat of two celebrated councils. It is now a mere village. A lake of the same name (the ancient Ascanus) is about 20 miles long, and 6 broad.

ISOCRATES, i-sok'-ra-tees, a celebrated Greek orator, who, although master of a sweet and graceful style, was prevented by a certain weakness of speech from speaking in public. It was as a teacher of oratory that his reputation was due. His orations, twenty-one of which are extant, were intrusted to others for delivery. The defeat of the Athenians at Chæronea, by Philip of Macedon, so affected his spirits that he refused to partake of food, and died after four days of fasting.

Born at Athens, 436, B.C.; died 338, B.C.

ISOLA-BELLA and ISOLA-MADRE, two Borromean Islands. (See MAGGIORE, LAGO.)

ISOLA, e-so'-la, a town of the Austrian empire, in Illyria, 10 miles S.W. of Trieste, on the south-eastern shore of the Gulf of Trieste. There are well frequented sulphur springs. Pop. 3,000.

ISOLA-DEL-GIGLIO, dail geel'-ye-o, an island of Italy, province of Grosseto, in the Mediterranean, 18 miles from Orbitello. Area, 8 square miles. Lat. 42° 20′ N. Lon. 10° 56′ E. The town of the same name is situate on the S. side of the island. Pop. 2,000.

ISOLA-DEL-CANTONE, kan-to'-nai, a town of northern Italy, near the Scrivia, 18 miles from Genoa. There are an ancient church, several palaces, and a castle. A large trade is carried on in grain, fruit, bark, and charcoal, and two annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,100.

ISOLA GROSSA, grosé-sa, or SUNGA, an island of Austria, in the Adriatic, on the W. coast of Dalmatia, 12 miles S.W. of Zara. It is 24 miles long, and 2 broad. Generally fertile, and producing grapes, figs, and olives. Fish abound in the neighbouring seas; fresh water in the island, however, is scarce. Pop. 12,000.

ISPAHAN, ISFAHAN, or SPAHAWN, is-pa-han', formerly the capital of Persia, and long celebrated as one of the most splendid cities of the East, is on the Zenderud, 226 miles S. of Teheran. According to Chardin it was 24 miles in circuit, and contained 172 mosques, 48 colleges, 1,800 caravanseras, and 273 public baths. The most splendid edifice was the palace built by Shah Abbas, known as the Chehel-Sitoon, or palace of forty pillars. The walls and buildings of the palace still remain nearly entire; but it has been stripped of all its costly furniture, and everything valuable which could be removed. The Maidan Shah, as a square, seems equally distinguished; it is one-third of a mile in length, and about half that breadth. It was formerly encircled by a canal, bordered by very fine plane trees; but all vestiges of both are now obliterated. The finest shops of the town are here. There are some splendid buildings (particularly the Mesjid Shah, a superb edifice), in the whole circuit of it; but the palace, forming one of the sides, is its chief ornament. Another remarkable object is the Chahar Bagh, "four gardens," a name given to an avenue of more than a mile, reaching from the Maidan to the mountains east of Ispahan. It is composed of four rows of very large and beautiful plane trees. Here is the mosque of Sultan Hussein, now converted into a medresa, or college. Some of the mosques display great magnificence. The principal one is of vast extent, built of stone, with a lining of marble, the cupolas ornamented with gold, and the gates with silver. Three handsome bridges across the Zenderud communicate with the suburbs. One has 33 arches, and on either side a gallery of 70 arcades extends from end to end. The streets are narrow, winding, and irregular, and, being quite unpaved, the wind, when it is high, raises such clouds of dust that the sun cannot be seen.

Manf.—These are still very extensive. In gold brocade this city is unrivalled; it is also the greatest emporium of inland commerce in the Persian empire, being the chief medium of communication with India and Cabul on one side and Turkey on the other. The bazaars still show great activity in the people; and all kinds of woven fabrics, from the coarsest nankin and calico to the richest velvet and satin, are made. Gold and silver trinkets, paper and paper boxes, guns, pistols, sword-blades, glass, and earthenware, also give occupation to a number of the inhabitants.

Lat. 32° 40′ N. Lon. 51° 43′ E.

History.—Ispahan was taken by Timor in 1387, who gave it up to indiscriminate massacre. It revived from this calamity; and at length Shah Abbas, the ablest and most fortunate prince of his dynasty, fixed at Ispahan the seat of his dominion, and spared no cost in embellishing it with the most splendid edifices. In 1722 it was taken by the Afghans, and many of its most superb edifices entirely destroyed. In 1729 it was retaken by Nadir Shah, but no pains were taken by that conqueror to restore it to its former prosperity. Since that time Ispahan has never been a royal residence, and it has fallen gradually more and more into decay, and presents only the wreck of what it formerly was.

ISSAQUINA, is'-sa-kwé'-na, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 10,004, the great majority coloured. The capital is Tallulah.

ISSIK-KUL, is-sik'-korl', a lake of Central Asia, 113 miles long and 38 wide. It is 4,476 feet above the sea. The water is brackish, and never freezes. The name signifies "Warm lake." Lat. 41° 30′ N. Lon. 78° E.

ISSNY, is'-sne, a town of Wurtemburg, in the circle of the Danube, 48 miles S. of Ulm. It is walled, and has a castle, various schools, and two hospitals. Manf. Glass, thimbles, and needles. Pop. 2,200. This was once an imperial free town.

ISSOIRE, is'-swawr, a town of France, department Puy de Dôme, 20 miles S.E. of Clermont, at the confluence of the Couze and Allier. It has some fortifications, numerous oil-mills, and a trade in nut-oil and cattle. Pop. 6,000.

ISSOUDUN, is'-soo-du(r), a walled town of France, in the department of the Indre, here crossed by three bridges, 17 miles N.E. of Châteauroux. Manf. Woollen cloth, yarn, lace, hosiery, leather, steam-engines, and agricultural implements. Pop. 14,928.—This place, in 1651, was partly consumed by fire; but it has since been built with wider and more regular streets.

ISSUS, is'-sus, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Persians, under Darius their king, in October, 333 B.C. This spot is likewise famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, 194 A.D.

ISSY, is'-se, a town of France, department of the Seine, 3 miles S.W. of Paris. Manf. Chemicals, lime, whiting, and bricks. Pop. 9,000.

ISTALIF, is-ta-lif', a town of Afghanistan, at the base of the Hindu-Kush, 22 miles N.W. of Cabul. Manf. Cotton fabrics, and dyeing is carried on. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 34° 46′ N. Lon. 68° 58′ E.

ISTAMBOUL, or STAMBOUL, e-stamboo', the Turkish name of the capital of the Ottoman empire. (See CONSTANTINOPLE.)

ISTIB, is-tib', a town of European Turkey, 58 miles S.W. of Ghiustendil. The town is surrounded by an ancient wall, and has several mosques. The suburb of Yeni-Keni is inhabited chiefly by Greeks. The remains of a castle, erected by the early kings of Bulgaria, are on a height near the town. Pop. 8,000.

ISTRES, istr, a town of France, department Bouches-du-Rhône, 18 miles S.E. of Arles. It is surrounded by decayed ramparts, overlooked by the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Chemicals and soda. Pop. 3,900.

ISTRIA, ees'-ire-a, a peninsula of the Austrian empire, in the southern part of Illyria, formed by the gulfs of Trieste and Fiume, which indent the land from the Adriatic, and bounded on the N. by Carniola. It is mountainous, especially in the N., where it is traversed by branches of the Alps. Pro. Wine, olives; and the mulberry is extensively cultivated. There are also large forests, which yield excellent timber. Pop. 233,000.

ITABIRA, it-ab'-e-ra, a town of Brazil, province of Minas-Geraes, on the left bank of the Velhas. There are gold mines, which are partially worked, in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000.

ISVORNIK. (See ZVORNIK.)

ITALY, it'-a-le, a peninsula in the south of Europe, marked, in its general boundaries, on the N. by Austria and Switzerland, W. by France and the Mediterranean, S. by the Mediterranean, and E. by the Ionian and Adriatic Seas. It consists partly of islands and partly of mainland. Measured nearly through the centre of the peninsula, in a N.W. direction, it is about 580 miles long, with a breadth of 310 at its widest part, but diminishing as it extends southward. In the centre it is only 150 miles broad, and at its narrowest point it does not exceed 15. The coast-line is estimated at 2,000 miles, and much indented. The chief gulfs and bays are those of Gaeta, Genoa, Naples, Salerno, and Policastro on the western side; Squillace and Taranto on the south-eastern; and Manfredonia, Venice, and Trieste, in the Adriatic. The straits are those of Messina, also called Bonifacio and Faro. The most important capes are Campanella, Spartivento, Di Leuca, Passaro, Corso, and Carbonara. The principal islands are Sicily (with the Lipari group, and various small islands), Ischia, Elba (and some adjacent islets) and Sardinia. Geographically, Corsica may be said to belong to Italy, but politically it is a portion of France. These islands are separately described under the proper headings, and this article is limited to continental Italy. The surface of the country is very diversified. In the north is the great and fertile plain of Lombardy, extending from the Maritime Alps, on the west, to the Adriatic Sea, on the east, and traversed by the river Po and its tributaries. Other plains are those of Venice, extensive level regions to the north-east of Rome, the Campo Felice, in the province of Naples, and the plain of the Basilicata, 100 miles long and about 25 broad, stretching along the shores of the Gulf of Taranto, in the southern part of the peninsula. There are marshy districts, especially the Pontine Marshes, between Rome and the sea, and the flats along the north shores of the Adriatic, between the Gulf of Trieste and the Gulf of Venice. The mountains, consisting of the Alps and Apennines, present every variety of form and elevation, of rugged rocks and precipices, thick and extensive forests, waterfalls, and all the component parts of picturesque scenery. (See ALPS and APENNINES.) The only active volcano on the continent of Europe is VESUVIUS, near Naples. The valleys are delightful beyond description; and even the plains are enlivened more than in most other countries by gentle elevations, rivers, and woods. All this is heightened by the clearness of the atmosphere, which imparts to every object a peculiar brightness of colouring and distinctness of outline. The climate is generally agreeable, temperate, and salubrious in the northern parts, and peculiarly genial in central Italy. In the southern part the heat is frequently intense, and increased by the destructive sirocco, or hot winds, blowing from Africa. Many districts are unhealthy in the summer and autumn months, the malaria producing an intermitting fever of the worst kind, which is peculiar to Italy. The cause of this evil has been ascribed to the pestilential air of the stagnant marshes.

Rivers.—The most important is the Po, which receives as tributaries the Chisone, Maira, Grana, Dora Riparia, Dora Baltea, Bormida, Tanaro, Sesia, Ticino, Adda, Oglio, Mincio, Trebbia, Parma, and Panaro. The other rivers of the north, or rather north-west of Italy, are the Adige, Brenta, Piave, and Tagliamento; all flowing southward from the Alps. In the centre of Italy, the Tiber, flowing into the Mediterranean, is the principal. There are also the Arno, Volturno, Garigliano, and Bradano. Many of these streams are only navigable for boats or very small vessels. The deficiency of water communication has been compensated by the construction of a vast number of canals, the most important of which is one between the Ticino and Milan, navigable by vessels of considerable size, and 28 miles long. Another large canal unites the Adige with the Po. Altogether there are about 500 canals in northern Italy, and several have been constructed to assist in draining the Pontine marshes.

Lakes.—Garda, and the Lago Maggiore, or Lake of Locarno. After these come the lakes of Lugano, Como, Iseo, and Iseo; the lakes of Perugia (anciently Thrasymene), Bolsena, Castel Gandolfo, Bracciano, Celano, Varano, and Averno. Many of these lakes are remarkable for the variety of their scenery. That round Maggiore is the most beautiful, that round Como the most sublime.

Pro.—Grapes, olives, lemons, figs, melons, pistachio nuts, and other fruits of great variety, and of the most delicious quality; corn and other cereals (especially in the northern provinces); pulse, rice, maize, and other vegetables; cotton, and still more, silk, for the production of which many millions of mulberry trees are cultivated in the plain of Lombardy, where the rearing of silkworms is one of the principal industries. The finest oil and olives are important products. As meadows and pastures are extensive, especially in the plains of the Po, vast herds of cows are reared, from whose milk a peculiar kind of cheese is made, and which other countries have not yet succeeded in imitating. This forms an important article of export to every quarter of the globe.

Minerals.—In the north, towards the German frontier, as well as in the Venetian and Genoese territory, and in Tuscany, there are quarries of beautiful marble, and caverns of stalactites are met with in many parts. In the Apennines are found alabaster, jasper, agate, rock-crystal, chalcedony, lapis-lazuli, crysolite, with other valuable stones. These mountains abound in basalt, dried lava, sulphur, pozzolana sand, and similar volcanic matter. The other mineral productions are alum, copper, and iron. Mineral springs, both cold and hot, are found in various parts of Italy.

Zoology.—The mountains and forests contain a number of wild animals; among others, the boar, the stag, the wolf, the marmot, the badger, the chamois, and the wild goat. The lynx or tiger-cat is found in the mountains of Abruzzo, and the crested porcupine and the tarantula in the south of Italy. Hares, foxes, and the kinds of wild fowl that come under the name of game, are sufficiently abundant. Many species of African waterfowl frequent the southern coast. The nautilus, which perhaps suggested to man his first idea of navigating the seas by means of sails, is found along the shores of Italy. Coral is also found in some parts. The fisheries are most productive, immense numbers of anchovies and tunnies are exported; and the rivers are well stocked with salmon, trout, and other fish.

Manf.—Silk is the staple, and after it come linen and woollen. Wine and strong spirits are also made in quantities. The articles for commercial exchanges are very limited, and consist less of manufactures than of raw produce. With the Levant the intercourse is still considerable.

Commerce.—The commercial intercourse is chiefly with France, the United Kingdom, Austria, and Switzerland. The imports from France average eight millions sterling per annum, and the exports very nearly the same. Next in order of importance are the commercial transactions with the United Kingdom, and after that, but far below, those of Austria and Switzerland. Corn and cotton manufactures form the chief imports. The principal exports are silk, raw and manufactured, and spirits and oils, the first of which averages £7,000,000 and the second £4,000,000 sterling per annum. The greater portion of these exports, representing the chief productions of the kingdom, is sent to France.

Area.—112,677 square miles, inclusive of the islands.

Pop.—29,361,032. The density of population is about 36 per cent. more than that of France.

Religion and Education.—More than 99 per cent. of the population are professedly Roman Catholics. There are about 20,000 native Protestants, chiefly in Piedmont, and 40,000 Jews, mostly engaged in commerce, scattered about the peninsula. About three-fourths of the population can neither read nor write, and in some parts, especially in the southern provinces and Sicily, only about one in ten can read and write. Since the establishment of the new Italian kingdom, 33 great model schools have been opened. There are 22 universities, many of them of ancient foundation. The oldest are Bologna, founded in the year 1119; Naples, founded in 1244; Padua, in 1228; Rome, in 1244; Perugia, in 1320; Pisa, in 1329; Siena, in 1349; Pavia, in 1390; Turin, in 1412; Parma, in 1422; and Florence, in 1443. The other universities are, in alphabetical order, Cagliari, Camerino, Catanea, Ferrara, Genoa, Macerata, Messina, Modena, Palermo, Sassiari, and Urbino. The number of students at all the universities is about 11,000. Six high schools—Naples, Pavia, Turin, Bologna, Florence, and Parma—have been declared first-class universities of the kingdom.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 4,600 miles of railway are open, 1,250 miles of which belong to the state. There are nearly 13,000 miles of telegraph lines, two-thirds being state property.

Administrative Divisions.—The kingdom is divided into 69 provinces. The following statement shows the older divisions of the peninsula, and the corresponding provinces as now existing:—

Old States and Provinces.	Modern Provinces.
Lombardy	Modena, Parma.
Venice, or Venetia	Belluno, Padova (Padua), Rovigo, Treviso, Friuli (or Udine), Venezia, Verona, Vicenza.
Tuscany, Grand Duchy of	Arezzo, Firenze (Florence), Grosseto, Livorno (Leghorn), Lucca, Pisa, Siena.
Pontifical States	Ancona, Arcoli Piceno, Bologna, Ferrari, Forli, Macerata, Pesaro and Urbino, Ravenna, Roma (Rome).
Naples, Kingdom of.	Abruzzo Citeriore, Abruzzo Ulteriore I. (Teramo), Abruzzo Ulteriore II. (Aquila), Basilicata, Calabria Citeriore, Calabria Ulteriore I. (Reggio), Calabria Ulteriore II. (Catanzaro), Capitanata, Molise, Napoli, Principato Citeriore, Principato Ulteriore, Terra di Bari, Terra di Livoro, Terra d'Otranto. In the island of Sicily—Caltanisetta, Catania, Girgenti, Messina, Palermo, Siracusa, Trapani.
Sardinia, Kingdom of.	Genova. In island of Sardinia—Cagliari, Sassari.
Modena, Duchy of	Modena.
Parma, Duchy of	Parma, Alessandria, Benevento, Bergamo, Como, Cremona, Cuneo, Mantova (Mantua), Massa and Carrara, Milano (Milan), Novara, Pavia, Piacenza, Porto Maurizio, Reggio, Emilia, Sondrio, Torino (Turin), Umbria.

Great Towns.—The 12 towns having the largest population are Naples, 476,089; Milan, 309,614; Rome, 271,702; Turin, 243,000; Palermo, 239,041; Genoa, 138,081; Florence, 134,992; Venice, 127,355; Messina, 124,283; Bologna, 103,998; Catania, 99,025; Leghorn, 94,000.

Constitution and Government.—The executive power of the state belongs exclusively to the sovereign, and is exercised by him through responsible ministers; while the legislative authority rests conjointly in the king and parliament, the latter consisting of two chambers, an upper one, the senate, and a lower one, called the chamber of deputies. The senate is composed of the princes of the royal house who are of age, and of an unlimited number of members, who are nominated by the king for life; a condition of the nomination being that the person should either fill a high office, or have acquired fame in science, literature, or any other pursuit tending to the benefit of the nation, or, finally, should pay taxes to the annual amount of £120. The number of senators is about 270. The deputies of the lower house are elected by a majority of all citizens who are twenty-five years of age, and pay taxes to the amount of £1 12s. The duration of parliaments is five years; but the king has the power to dissolve the lower house at any time, being bound only to order new elections, and convoke a new meeting within four months. It is incumbent upon the executive to call the parliament together annually. Each of the chambers has the right of introducing new bills, the same as the government; but all money bills must originate in the house of deputies.

History.—This is the Italia of the ancients, and received its name from Italus, a king of the country, who came from Arcadia; or from italos, a Greek word which signifies "an ox," an animal very common in that part of Europe. The ancient inhabitants called themselves Aborigines, "offspring of the soil," and the country was soon after peopled by colonies from Greece. It was originally divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increase of the Roman power changed the face of it. (See Etruria, Rome, &c.) In 476, Odoacer, a leader of a band of mercenaries, was proclaimed king of Italy, and for nearly 80 years the country was the prey of Gothic barbarians. In 552 they were defeated, and Italy was governed as a province of the Eastern empire. The Lombards invaded the country in 568, but in the next century were conquered by Pepin and Charlemagne, the latter being crowned emperor of Italy in 774. About the 10th century, the chief towns began to rise into great importance, and free cities, under republican forms of government, became wealthy, magnificent, and powerful. Previous to the 16th century the country was desolated by intestine wars, and the struggle of Spain, France, and Germany for the supremacy. The battle of Pavia, in 1525, established the ascendancy of the emperor of Germany; but early in the 18th century Austria became predominant. The victories of Bonaparte, in 1797-8, changed the government, and the greater part of the peninsula was for several years practically a dependency of France. After the peace of 1814 the Lombardo-Venetian provinces were allotted to Austria; the kingdom of Sardinia and the Genoese provinces, to the royal house of Savoy; Lucca was created a duchy, the duchy of Tuscany was restored, the Bourbons regained possession of Naples, the pope of the Papal States, and the family of Este of the duchy of Modena and other territories. In 1848 the Milanese and Venetians unsuccessfully revolted against Austria, and in 1859 a war broke out between Piedmont and Austria, resulting in the defeat of the latter power. The kingdom of Italy was established in 1861, under the sovereignty of the king of Piedmont; in 1866, Austria ceded Venetia to the new kingdom, and in 1870 Rome was occupied by the Italian army, and made the capital.

ITAMARACA, e-ta-mar'-a-ka, an island of Brazil, in the province of Pernambuco, separated from the mainland by a narrow channel, long known as the river Santa Cruz. It is 12 miles long, and 8 broad, fertile, and producing cotton and sugar-cane in considerable quantities. It has also extensive salt-works and some rum-distilleries. The capital, Conceiçao-d'Itamaraca faces the mainland. Pop. 8,000.

ITAPARICA, é-ta-par'-e-ka, an island of Brazil, 23 miles W. of Bahia. It is 24 miles long, with a breadth of 8 at its widest part. The island abounds with cocoa-trees. There are five churches and two schools. Manf. Ropes, and material for the whale fishery.

ITAPICURU, é-ta-pe-koo-roo, two rivers of Brazil, the one rising in the mountains of Jacobina, and, after a course of 350 miles, falling into the Atlantic about 90 miles N.E. from Bahia; the other rising in the province of Maranhao, and, after a course of 500 miles, falling into the Atlantic, 20 miles E. of Maranhao.

ITASCA, i-tas'-ka, or LAC LA BICHE, a small lake of the United States of America, 170 miles W. of Lake Superior. It is at an elevation of 1,500 feet above the sea, and is one of the sources of the Mississippi.

ITASCA, an almost uninhabited county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 9,600 square miles.

ITATA, a river of Chili, rising on the W. slope of the Chilian Andes, and, after a course of 150 miles, falling into the Pacific, in lat. 36° S.

ITAWAMBA, i-taw'-am-ba, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 10,663. The capital is Fulton.

ITHACA, or THIAKI, ith'-a-ka, one of the Ionian Islands, in the Gulf of Patras, between the W. coast of Greece and Cephalonia. Ext. 15 miles long, by 4 broad, except in the middle, where it is nearly divided by the Gulf of Molo. The town of Vathi is its seaport and capital. Ithaca is celebrated, in Homeric legend, as the home of Ulysses. It has always been noted for its rugged and barren aspect. Pro. Olives, currants, corn, almonds, oranges, honey, and wine. The inhabitants, however, derive the greatest portion of their sustenance from the sea, being mostly fishermen. Lat. 38° 30′ N. Lon. 20° 39′ E. Pop. 13,000.

ITHACA, the capital of Tomkins county, New York, United States, at the S. extremity of Cayuga Lake 162 miles S.W. of Albany. It has a court-house, a gaol, a flourishing academy, and a lyceum, and is the seat of Cornell University. Pop. 10,000.

ITRI, e'-tre, a town of Italy, 7 miles N. of Gaeta, on the ancient Appian Way. It is defended by a strong old castle. Pop. 7,000.

ITSHIL. (See ADANA.)

ITU, e'-too, a town of Brazil, 50 miles W. of Santo Paulo. The greater number of its houses are constructed of a framework of wood, with the interstices filled up with mud or earth. Its principal buildings are several churches, two convents, a court-house, an infirmary, and various schools. The soil in the district in which it stands is fertile, and sugar-cane is extensively cultivated. Pop. 10,000.

ITUCAMBIRA, e'-too-kam-be-ra, a river of Brazil, rising in the Serra de Santo Antonio, and, after a course of 120 miles, falling into the Jequitinhonha. Gold is found in its sands.

ITURBIDE, or YTURBIDE, AUGUSTIN DE, e-tur'-be-de, emperor of Mexico, was the son of a Spanish nobleman and a wealthy Creole lady. Having distinguished himself against the insurgents in several insurrectionary movements, he was intrusted with the command of the army, but he then took part against the government, and, in 1822, was chosen emperor of Mexico, and the crown was made hereditary in his family. His despotic conduct excited dissatisfaction, and he was compelled to abdicate in the following year. He received a pension on condition of residing in Italy, and went to Leghorn, but next year returned in disguise, and landed at the port of Solo-la-Marina. He was almost immediately arrested, and shot two days afterwards.

Born at Valladolid, Mexico, 1799; died 1824.

ITURUP, or STATEN ISLAND, it'-u-rup, one of the largest and most important of the Kurile Islands, in the N. Pacific, where the Japanese have a settlement. It is 140 miles long, with an average breadth of 20, fertile, and of volcanic origin. Agriculture was introduced into it by the Japanese; but the natives chiefly live upon the produce of the chase and the fisheries. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 44° 29' N. Lon. 146° 34' E.

ITZEHOE, it'-sai-ho, a town of Prussia, in Holstein, on the Stor, 32 miles N.W. of Hamburg. It consists of an old and new town, connected by a long bridge. Its principal public buildings are the parish church, an hospital, several other benevolent institutions, a statehouse, in which the provincial assemblies of Holstein are held, and various schools. It is the oldest town in the duchy, and was twice taken during the Thirty Years' War, and was burned down by the Swedes in 1657. Manf. Tobacco, chicory, sugar, and brandy. There is also a trade in horses and cattle. Pop. 6,700.

IVAHI, or UBAHI, a river of Brazil, rising in the south of the province Santo Paulo, and joining the left bank of the Parana, at the junction of the provinces Matto Grosso, Santo Paulo, and Paraguay. It is about 300 miles long, with many cataracts.

IVAN III., grand duke of Moscow, and the founder of the Russian empire, reigned from 1462 to 1505. He delivered his country from the Tartars in 1481, brought all the provinces of Russia under his sway, and took possession of Novgorod after a seven years' siege. He introduced the arts of civilization into his dominions. His second wife was Zoe, or Sophia, niece of the last Byzantine emperor. Ivan was the first to adopt the title of czar, having for his arms the double-headed eagle of Constantinople.

IVAN IV., surnamed the Cruel, ascended the throne at the age of four years, in 1533. His mother was appointed regent, and sustained, in his name, a great struggle against the nobles of the kingdom. He attained his majority in 1544, and made war against the Poles, the Swedes, and the Tartars, all of whom were in turn vanquished. He committed numberless cruelties upon these peoples, as well as upon his own subjects. He killed with his own hand his eldest son; but his reign was marked by a great advance in civilization. He definitely adopted the title of "czar," and added to it that of "autocrat." He concluded a commercial treaty with Queen Elizabeth.

Born 1529; died 1584.

IVAN V., ALEXOVITCH, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother, Feodor Alexiowitz, in 1682. But being of weak intellect, he was placed in a monastery, and the sceptre given to his brother Peter. The Princess Sophia, hoping to reign in the room of Ivan, excited an insurrection, which ended by the appointment of Ivan and Peter joint sovereigns, and Sophia co-regent. This government lasted six years, when Sophia, having projected the death of Peter, that she might reign alone, the conspiracy was discovered, and the princess confined in a convent. From that time Peter reigned sole monarch.

Born 1666; died 1696.

IVAN VI., of Brunswick-Wolfenbuttel, was declared czar when but three months old, after the death of his great-aunt, Anne Iwanovna, in 1740. Anne left him to the guardianship of the duke de Biren, who being deposed shortly after, the regency was transferred to the emperor's mother. In 1741 he was dethroned and confined in a fortress, whence he was carried away by a monk; but was retaken and placed in a monastery, where he was afterwards murdered.

Born 1740; died 1764.

IVANOVO, a-van-o'-vo, a town of Russia, 60 miles N.E. of Vladimar. It is a well-built busy place. Manf. Cotton, machinery, and chemicals. Pop. 10,000.

IVES, JOHN, ives, an English antiquary. He became Suffolk herald extraordinary, and fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He published, in addition to works on heraldry and antiquities, "Remarks on the Garianonum of the Romans, the Site and Remains fixed and described," in 1774.

Born at Yarmouth, 1716; died 1776.

IVES, ST., a municipal and parliamentary borough and market-town of Cornwall, on the Bay of St. Ives, 10 miles N.E. of Penzance. It consists chiefly of one long street, branching off at the south into two smaller ones. The buildings in general are mean. The church is a spacious granite building, with an elegant tower, built in the 16th century, and there are independent and Methodist meeting-houses. There is a pier or breakwater, 615 feet long, completed in 1872. The pilchard-fishery is carried on in the bay to a great extent. To protect the port from the north-west winds, a breakwater stretches across the bay. Pop. 6,441. —A station on the South Devon railway.

IVES, ST., a market-town of Huntingdon, on the left bank of the Ouse, over which is a handsome stone bridge, 6 miles E. from Huntingdon. The church is a handsome building with a lofty spire. The markets for cattle and sheep, held in this town, are among the largest in the kingdom. Pop. 3,248.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

IVETAUX, NICHOLAS VAUQUELIN, Seigneur de, eev'-to, a French poet. He became preceptor to the duke de Vendôme, son of Gabrielle d'Estrées, and afterwards to Louis XIII. when dauphin; but his life was so irregular, that he was banished from court; on which he took a house in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, where he lived in luxury and debauchery. He wrote "The Institution of a Prince," and a number of stanzas, sonnets, and other poetical pieces.

Born at Fresnaye, 1559; died at Paris, 1649.

IVIÇA, or IBIÇA, or IVIZA, e-ve'-sa, an island of the Mediterranean, belonging to Spain. It is the smallest of the three principal islands of the Baleares, 50 miles S.W. of Majorca, 23 miles long, and 12 broad at its widest part, and fertile; producing corn, wine, oil, fruit, flax, and hemp, with little labour. About 15,000 tons of salt are annually got from evaporation; and it forms, with fish and wood, the chief articles of export. Pop. 11,000.

IVORY, JAMES, i'-vo-re, an eminent mathematician, was the son of a watchmaker in Dundee, and was sent to the universities of St. Andrew and of Edinburgh, for the purpose of being educated for the Scottish church, but was engaged, in 1796, as teacher in an academy at Dundee, and was subsequently a partner in a flax-spinning factory in Forfarshire. His unwearied pursuit of science, however, enabled him to undertake the duties of professor of mathematics at the Royal Military College in Buckinghamshire; and when that institution removed to Sandhurst, in Berkshire, he was continued in his post, and remained in it till his retirement into private life, in 1819. While professor at Sandhurst, and afterwards, he wrote a great number of very valuable mathematical books, besides contributing fifteen papers to the "Transactions of the Royal Society of London." An edition of Euclid; "A New Series for the Rectification of the Cube;" "A New Method of resolving Cubic Equations;" and many mathematical and astronomical treatises, were the result of his laborious life. He was fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, and corresponding member of the learned societies of Paris, Berlin, and Gottingen. He enjoyed a pension of £300 per annum, from the year 1831 till his death, and was invested by William IV. with the Hanoverian Guelphic order of knighthood.

Born at Dundee, 1765; died in London, 1842.

IXION, ix-i'-on, in Greek legend, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegias, married Dia, daughter of Eionius or Deioneus, to whom he promised a present for choosing him as son-in-law. His unwillingness to fulfil this promise led Deioneus to steal away some of his horses. Ixion concealed his resentment, and invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa; whereupon he threw him into a pit, which he had previously filled with burning coals. This treachery so irritated the neighbouring princes, that all shunned and despised Ixion. Jupiter, taking compassion upon him, carried him to heaven, and placed him at the tables of the gods. Here he became enamoured of Juno; whereat Jupiter was so displeased that he banished him from heaven; but when he heard that Ixion had the rashness to boast that he had gained the affections of Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in Hades, which continually whirled round. The wheel was perpetually in motion; therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal.

IZAACKE, RICHARD, i'-zak, an English antiquary, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He afterwards became chamberlain and town-clerk of Exeter, his native city, the history and memorials of which he wrote. This work was continued by his son.

JACKSON, a city in the United States, in the state of Mississippi, of which it is the capital. It is situated about 180 miles N. of New Orleans, on the right bank of the Pearl River. The principal buildings are the state-house (an elegant building), the city hall, institutions for lunatics and the deaf and dumb and blind, and the state penitentiary. Large shipments of cotton are made here. Pop. 5,204.

JACKSON, a city of the United States, situated on the left bank of the Grand river, in the state of Michigan, 76 miles W. from Detroit, and capital of the county of the same name. The river is crossed by an iron bridge, and the large state penitentiary is here. The city is a great railroad centre. There is a good general trade, and an extensive manufacture of agricultural implements. Bituminous coal is worked in the neighbourhood. Pop. 16,500.

JACKSON, a city of the United States, capital of Madison county, Tennessee, on the Forked Deer river. It is pleasantly situated in a fertile district, is an important railway centre, and is the seat of West Tennessee college. A large quantity of cotton is shipped. Pop. 5,377.

JACKSON, ANDREW, an American general, and twice President of the United States, was the son of a Scotchman, who emigrated to America in 1765. At the breaking out of the war of Independence, he was studying theology in the Waxhaw Academy; but this event made himself and his two brothers soldiers. On the termination of the war with the mother country, he resolved to study the law, but abandoned it after a short time to resume his military career. In 1797 he was chosen senator, and shortly afterwards was appointed by the legislature of Tennessee major-general of the forces of that state. Up to the year 1812 he resided upon his farm at Nashville, on the Cumberland River; but on the renewal of hostilities between England and America in that year, he put himself at the head of some three thousand volunteers, and took up a defensive position in the lower country of the Mississippi. He set his followers an example of endurance, when short of supplies, by living on hickory nuts, and so acquired the nickname of "Old Hickory." In 1814 the United States government conferred the rank of major-general upon him, and the next year he repulsed the British forces in their attack on New Orleans. For several subsequent years he commanded expeditions against the Indians, displaying both cruelty and recklessness in some of his proceedings. In 1821 he was nominated governor of the newly-acquired state of Florida; and, after holding it for a year, was again elected to represent the state of Tennessee in the senate. Jackson was elected president in 1828, and again in 1832.

Born at Waxhaw, South Carolina, 1767; died at Nashville, Tennessee, 1845.

JACKSON, ARTHUR, a nonconformist divine, who was ejected from the living of St. Faith's, in London, in 1662. He was fined £500 for refusing to give evidence against Christopher Love, and also imprisoned. At the Restoration he was chosen by the assembly of ministers to present a Bible to Charles II. He was also one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference. He wrote a Commentary on the Bible.

Born 1593; died 1666.

JACKSON JOHN, an English divine, who received his education at Jesus College, Cambridge. He obtained the rectory of Rossington, in Yorkshire, and the mastership of Wigston's Hospital, in Lancashire. He was an acute metaphysician, and a zealous advocate for Arianism, and wrote some tracts against the doctrine of the Trinity, and others against Collins and Tindal; but his best work is his "Chronological Antiquities," published in 2 vols. 4to, 1752.

Born at Lensey, Yorkshire, 1686; died 1768.

JACKSON, JAMES, better known as "Stonewall" Jackson, the American Confederate general, was a native of Virginia, received his military education at West Point, and entered the army as second lieutenant in an artillery corps in 1846. He served in the Mexican war, and was raised to the rank of captain for his conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. In 1852 he became professor of mathematics and military science in the university of Virginia. On the breaking out of the war of secession he received the appointment of brigadier-general in the Confederate army. He rendered great service to the cause with which he was identified at Bull's Run in 1861, at Ball's Bluff, throughout the Virginian campaign in 1862; led the invasion of Maryland, and captured Harper's Ferry. He died in May 1863, at Chancellorville, from wounds received from his own men, who mistook him and his staff for the enemy.

Born 1826; died 1863.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, a musical composer and ingenious writer. Having received a liberal education, he was placed under the tuition of the organist of Exeter Cathedral, and afterwards with Mr. Travers, an eminent musician in London. In 1777 he was appointed organist in the cathedral of his native city. He published many excellent songs, canzonets, hymns, and sonatas, of his own composition. His chief literary productions were, "Thirty Letters on various Subjects," "On the Present State of Music," and "The Four Ages," 8vo. One of Mr. Jackson's sons was secretary to Lord Macartney in his embassy to China; another was ambassador to the king of Sardinia, and afterwards at Paris and Berlin.

Born at Exeter, 1730; died at the same place, 1803.

JACKSON, PORT. (See SYDNEY.)

JACKSON'S RIVER, a head-water of James's River, in Virginia, joined by Carpenter's Creek, and receiving the name of Fluvanna river. It is noted for a fall of 200 feet.

JACKSONVILLE, a town of Illinois, United States, capital of Morgan county, 200 miles S.W. of Chicago. There are six churches, a college, and state asylum for the deaf and dumb, blind, and insane. Manf. Cotton, oil, leather, and iron castings. Pop. 7,300.

JACKSONVILLE, a city and port of Florida, United States, capital of Duval county. A considerable shipping and coasting trade, especially in timber, cotton, fruit, and vegetables, is carried on. There are several suburban villages connected by ferry. Pop. 10,000.

JACMEL, or JACQUEMEL, jak'-mel, a seaport town on the south coast of the island of Hayti, at the head of a bay of the same name, 28 miles S.W. of Port-au-Prince. The upper part is commonly named Belair. There is a good roadstead, and the West India mail steamers make it a place of call. Pop. 6,000.

JACOB, jā'-kob, the son of Isaac and Rebecca, whose sons were founders of the twelve tribes of Israel. His name was altered to Israel by an angel; whence his posterity have been called Israelites. He lived to the age of 147 years.

Born 1837 B.C.; died in the land of Goshen, 1689 B.C.

JACOB, BEN NAPHTHALI, a learned Jew, was educated in the school of Tiberius, in Palestine. The invention of the Masoretic points and accents is ascribed to him and Ben Aser.

Lived in the 5th century.

JACOB, a Cistercian monk of Hungary, who quitted his order under the conviction that he was called to deliver the Holy Land from the infidels. He gathered together a prodigious number of fanatics in Germany and France, who being chiefly peasants, obtained the name of the Shepherds. When St. Louis, king of France, was taken by the Saracens, Jacob pretended that the holy Virgin had commanded him to preach a crusade for his deliverance. The queen for some time tolerated this extravagance, but at last she caused the rabble to be dispersed, and Jacob was, shortly after, slain by a butcher.

Lived in the 12th century.

JACOB, JOHN, officer in the Indian army, and famous as commander of the Scinde Horse. He served first in the Bombay artillery, and in 1841 was appointed to command a body of irregular cavalry, in which position he greatly distinguished himself at Meanee, and on other occasions. Although formidable to those whose occupation was rapine and plunder, Jacob was a benefactor to the people over whom he virtually ruled. On the spot where his troops had encamped, which was a sterile waste for miles around, Jacob, in less than thirteen years, had built a village containing 30,000 people, and the district was transformed into one fertile garden. The city was called Jacobabad. He invented the valuable rifle called after his name. But, although still a young man, he, in the year 1858, gave sudden signs of a break-up of constitution. The ardent soldier had exhausted even his iron frame; a brain-fever ensued, and in a few days he was carried off.

Born 1813; died at Jacobabad, 1858.

JACOB, BEN HAIM, a rabbi, who published a collection of the Masora at Venice, in 1525, in 4 vols., with the text of the Bible, a work greatly esteemed by the Jews.

Lived in the 16th century.

JACOB, or JACOBUS BARADÆUS, a disciple of Severus, patriarch of Constantinople. He was one of the principal leaders of the Eutychians, on which account that sect gained the name of Jacobites.

Lived in the 6th century.

JACOBI, FRIEDERICH HEINRICH, ya-ko'-be, a German metaphysical philosopher, who occupied several distinguished posts under the government of Dusseldorff, and, in 1804, became president of the Academy of Sciences at Munich. He published a great number of literary and philosophical works, in some of which he combated the doctrines of Kant. His principal works are "Letters on the Doctrines of Spinosa," "Hume and Belief; or Idealism and Realism," and "Letter to Fichte." His complete works, in 6 vols., were published at Leipsic between 1812-1824.

Born at Dusseldorff, 1743; died 1819.

JACOBI, KARL GUSTAV JAKOB, an eminent Prussian mathematician, celebrated for investigations in the higher branches of mathematical and especially for his researches on the subject of Elliptic Functions, for which he received the great medal of the Academy of Sciences of Paris in 1829. He was educated at the Berlin University, and was appointed professor at Königsberg in 1829; was subsequently removed to Berlin, where he died in 1851.

Born 1804; died 1851.

JACOBINA, ja-ko-be'-na, a town of Brazil, province of Bahia, on the left bank of the Itapicura, 210 miles N.W. of Bahia. It has a parish church, other churches, and several schools. In its neighbourhood are grown rice, millet, tobacco, and various fruits, which thrive admirably. Pop. of the district, 10,000, supported principally by agricultural produce and a trade in cattle, sheep, and goats.

JACOBS, JURIAN, jai'-kobs, a painter of the Flemish school. He was the disciple of Francis Snyders, whose manner he imitated. The animals introduced into his historical pictures are admirably painted.

Born in Switzerland, 1610; died 1664.

JACOPONE, DA TODI, ya-ko-po'-nai, an old Italian poet, celebrated for his "Sacred Canticles," and for being the author of the "Stabat Mater." His Canticles were printed at Venice in 1617.

Died 1306.

JACOBSTADT, a seaport of Finland, on a bay in the Gulf of Bothnia, 53 miles N.E. of Vasa. There are a small harbour and a building dock, and a good trade is carried on. Pop. 1,900.

JACOTOT, JEAN JOSEPH, zhak'-o-to', the inventor of a now obsolete "Universal Method of Education," which was said to be capable of producing the most remarkable results, which, however, were probably due to the exceptional ability of its author as a teacher. He served originally in the army of Napoleon, by whom he was appointed, in 1799, to the mathematical chair in the Normal School. He became afterwards secretary to the minister at war, and a director of the Polytechnic; was subsequently (1815) lecturer on French literature in the university at Louvain, in Belgium, and then director of the Military Normal School.

Born at Dijon, 1770; died in Paris, 1840.

JACOVA, or YAKOVA, ya-ko'-va, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, in the pachalic of Scutari, on the White Drin. Pop. 18,000.

JACQUARD, JOSEPH MARIE, zhak'-ard, a celebrated mechanician, and inventor of the Jacquard loom. He was the son of a poor weaver, and is said to have had no school education, having taught himself to read and write. From an early age he evinced a great aptitude for mechanical studies. After having inherited his father's looms and stock in trade, he, for some time, worked as a weaver; but was subsequently compelled to sell all his working apparatus, having contracted many debts through his unfortunate experiments in weaving, cutlery, and type-founding. He served with the republican army in the defence of Lyons and on the Rhine; but afterwards returned to his native city, and applied himself energetically to perfect the splendid piece of mechanism which bears his name. Napoleon, who appreciated the invention, conferred a small pension upon him; but the silk weavers broke up his machine and threatened his life. The Jacquard loom, or a modification of the apparatus, is now universally employed.

Born at Lyons, 1752; died at Ouillins, near Lyons, 1834.

JACQUELINE, of Bavaria, jak'-a-line, countess of Hainaut, Holland, Zealand, and Friesland, daughter and heiress of William VI. of Bavaria, and Margaret of Burgundy. She was betrothed at the age of 5 to prince John of France, but he dying young, she married, when 17 years old, her cousin,

John IV., duke of Brabant. This marriage she afterwards induced the anti-pope Benedict XIII. to annul, and in 1423 married Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, uncle of Henry VI. of England, who entered Hainaut with 5,000 men to demand possession of her estates. The duke of Burgundy, cousin of John of Brabant, challenged Gloucester to single combat, but the duel was forbidden by the pope, and the citizens of Hainaut surrendered Jacqueline to her enemies. She was imprisoned in Ghent, but escaped in male attire to Holland. She afterwards made a treaty with the duke of Burgundy, disavowing her marriage with Gloucester as illegal. She afterwards married Francis of Borselen, governor of Zealand, who was arrested by Burgundy, but released on the surrender by Jacqueline of all her estates to the duke. She died childless.

Born 1400; died 1436.

JACQUELOT, ISAAC, zhak'-lo, a learned French Protestant, was the son of a minister at Vassy. At the age of 21 he became assistant to his father; but, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Heidelberg, and thence to the Hague. The king of Prussia invited him to his capital, where he became his majesty's chaplain, and had a pension.

Born 1647; died 1708.

JACQUES CARTIER, zhak'-kar'-te-air, a county of Quebec province, dominion of Canada, occupying the western portion of Montreal Island. Pop. 12,345, chiefly of French descent. The capital is Pointe Claire.

JACQUET, LOUIS, zha'-kai, a French writer and ecclesiastic, who wrote an ingenious parallel between the Greek and French tragic poets, and some prize essays, which were rewarded by the academy of Besançon. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Rousseau, whom in disposition and manners he greatly resembled.

Born at Lyons, 1732; died 1793.

JADDUS, jad'-dus, high priest of the Jews, who, when Alexander the Great intended to pillage Jerusalem and the temple, went to meet him in his pontifical habits. The sight so struck the victor, that he fell at the feet of Jaddus, declaring he had seen in a vision a man dressed in precisely the same garments, who had promised him the empire of Asia, and this so altered his sentiments, that he offered sacrifices to the God of Israel.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

JAEL, ja'-el, a Jewish woman, wife of Heber the Kenite. When Sisera, the general of Jabin, king of Hazor, sought refuge in her tent after the defeat of his army, and had lain down to sleep, she drove a nail through his head, and killed him.

JAEN, ha'-en, a province of Spain, forming the eastern part of Andalusia, and inclosed by the provinces of Granada, Murcia, Cordova, and La Mancha. It was formerly an independent Moorish kingdom. It is generally mountainous, and the centre forming a valley along the banks of the Guadalquiver. The hilly districts are devoted to pasturage, and the level to agriculture, although this is by no means well pursued. Rivers. The Guadalquiver is the principal. Minerals. Lead and copper. Area, 4,451 square miles Pop. 430,149.

JAEN, a city of Spain, and the capital of the above province, 50 miles N. of Granada. It was formerly surrounded by Moorish walls, flanked with towers, is neatly built, and has several handsome churches and squares, one of which is spacious and encompassed by elegant houses. It is a bishop's see; and the cathedral is a noble structure, with four entrances, and adorned on the outside with statues and bas-reliefs; in the interior it is set off by magnificent drapery, and has some fine paintings. There are, besides, several other churches, nunneries, an episcopal palace, colleges, museum, various hospitals, schools, a theatre, and a bull-ring capable of seating 8,000 people. Water is distributed to all parts of the town in great profusion by means of public fountains. Manf. Woollens, linens, soap, and brandy. It was formerly famous for its silk manufacture. Pop. 24,395.—This town was known to the Romans, but its present name was given to it by the Moors, who made it the capital of the kingdom of Jaen, which was the smallest of the four states into which Andalusia was divided.

JAEN DE BRACAMOROS, a town of Ecuador, South America, near the junction of the Chinchipe with the Maranon. Gold is obtained in the vicinity. Pop. 40,000.

JAFFA, or YAFFA, jaf'-fa, a town of Palestine, near the coast of the Mediterranean, 31 miles N.W. of Jerusalem. It stands on a small eminence in the form of a sugar-loaf; on the summit is a small citadel, which commands the town, whilst the bottom of the hill is surrounded by a wall without a rampart. The general appearance of the place is now very desolate. The harbour is one of the worst in the Mediterranean. The commerce consists in the importation of grain, particularly of rice, from Egypt. Jaffa has always been a favourite resort of pilgrims to the Holy Land. The Latins, Greeks, and Armenians have each small convents for the reception of pilgrims. A little to the west is the celebrated tower of Ramlah, 120 feet high, whence an extensive view is obtained. Pop. 5,000.—This is the ancient Joppa, which was a seaport in the time of Solomon. It was the port of Jerusalem, and the landing-place of the cedars with which the temple in that city was built. In 1799 it was taken by Bonaparte, who here shot 1,200 Turkish prisoners, who had broken their parole.

JAFFNA, or JAFFNAPATAM, jaf'-na-pa-tam', a seaport on the north side of Ceylon. It fronts Palk's Straits, 209 miles N. of Colombo. The town is fortified, and possesses a good citadel; but it was taken, after a short resistance, by the British troops in 1795. There is an old church in the form of a Greek cross. The inhabitants are principally Tamils and Moors; but since Ceylon was taken by the English, many of the country-born Dutch families have settled here. It has a trade in palmyra timber, tobacco, and shells. There is a fine Hindoo temple in the vicinity. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 9° 47′ N. Lon. 80° 9′ E.

JAGELLONS, ja-gel-lons, the name of an ancient dynasty of the grand-duchy of Lithuania, which afterwards gave monarchs to Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia. Its founder was the grand-duke Jagellon, who, in 1386, married Hedwige, daughter of the king of Hungary and Poland. He subsequently embraced the Christian religion, and became king of Poland, under the title of Ladislaus IV. His descendants reigned both in Lithuania and Poland, but Alexander Jagellons united both crowns in 1501. Several Jagellons reigned at a later period in Hungary and Bohemia.

JAGEPORE, ja-ge-por', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Orissa and the presidency of Bengal, 35 miles from Cuttack. It is a large straggling town, and has a manufactory of cotton cloths. Lat. 20° 50′ N. Lon. 86° 35′ E. Pop. unascertained.

JAGERNDORF, or KARNOW, yai'-jern-dorf, a town of the Austrian empire, in Silesia, 14 miles N.W. of Troppau. It has a handsome parish church, with two towers 230 feet high, the loftiest in Silesia. Manf. Cloth, hosiery, and linens. Pop. 8,500.

JAGO, RICHARD, jai'-go, an English poet, was educated at University College, Oxford. He entered into orders, and in 1724 obtained the vicarage of Snitterfield, in Warwickshire. In 1771 he was presented to the living of Kilmcote, in Leicestershire.

Born in Warwickshire, 1715; died 1781.

JAGO, ST., one of the Cape de Verd Islands.

JAGO, ST., DE LA VEGA, subsequently named Spanish Town, formerly the capital of Jamaica.

JAGUARIBE, ha'-gwa-re-bai, a river of Brazil, rising in the mountains of Boa Vesta, and, after a course of 460 miles, falling into the Atlantic, in lat. 4° 8′ S., lon. 37° 50′ W.—Its principal affluents are the Salgado and the Banabuihu.

JAHICOS, ha'-he-cose, a town of Brazil, in the province of Piauhy, 70 miles S.E. of Oeiras. It has several churches and schools, and is situate in a district of considerable fertility. Pop. 2,000.

JAHN, JOHANN, yan, a learned German orientalist. He was professor of Oriental languages and Biblical criticism first at the convent of Brück; on the suppression of this convent he was transferred to Olmutz, and subsequently to Vienna, where he also filled the chair of dogmatic theology. In 1803 he was removed to the canonry of St. Stephen's, in the same city. He wrote grammars of the Arabian, Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldean tongues, an "Introduction to the Old Testament," "Biblical Archæology," "A Manual of General Hermeneutics," and an edition of the Hebrew Bible. A collection of posthumous "Remains" was published in 1821.

Born at Taswitz, Moravia, 1750; died at Vienna, 1815.

JAILUM, JELUM, JILUM, or BEHUT, je'-lum, (the ancient Hydaspes), a river of Hindostan, the most westerly, and supposed to be the principal of the five great rivers which intersect the Punjab, E. of the Indus. It rises near the S. point of Cashmere, in lat. 33° 33′ N.; lon. 75° 40′ E., and, after a course of 450 miles, joins the Chenab, 75 miles from Mooltan.

JAIME, SAN, zhame, a town of Venezuela, South America, on a height on the left bank of the Portuguesa, 28 miles N.W. of San Fernando. Pop. 7,000.

JAKUTSK, or YAKUTSK, ya-kootsk', is situated on the left bank of the river Lena, in Eastern Siberia, of which it is the chief town. Lat. 62° 1′ N. Lon. 119° 44′ E. It is the principal market for traffic with the Nomadic tribes of the territory, and great quantities of merchandise, chiefly furs and ivory, are brought to the annual fair held in the month of June. Large supplies of butter are also bought to Jakutsk by the Jakuts, who possess immense herds of cattle. The chief industry of the town is the manufacture of candles. Pop. 4,982.

JALAPA, or XALAPA, ha'-la-pa, a city of Mexico, 60 miles W. from Vera Cruz. It stands at the foot of a basaltic mountain nearly 4,335 feet above the level of the sea. Its church is said to have been founded by Cortes, and in its neighbourhood is found the Exogonium purga, from which jalap is obtained,—a name derived from the town. Pop. 10,000.

JALISCO. (See GUADALAXARA.)

JALLAIS, zhal-lai', a town of France, department Maine-et-Loire, 7 miles E. of Beaupreau. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 3,400.

JALLIEU, jal-lyuh', a town of France, department Isère, 35 miles N.W. of Grenoble. Manf. Printed cottons and paper. There is a trade in hemp. Pop. 3,400.

JALLORE, or JHALORE, jal-lor', a town and fortress of Hindostan, in Ajmeer, 70 miles S.W. of Joudpoor. The fortress is accounted the strongest in this part of India. Pop. 15,000.

JALOMNITZA, ya'-lom-nitz'-a, a river of Europe, rising in the Carpathian mountains, on the frontiers of Transylvania, and, after a course of 170 miles, falling into the Danube, 9 miles N. of Hirchova. It receives the united streams of the Proava and Telesin, and other affluents.

JALON, ha'-lone, a river of Spain, rising in the province of Soria, and, after a course of 120 miles, generally in a north-easterly direction, joining the Ebro, 12 miles above Saragossa. It is not navigable.

JALOUTROVOSK, ja'-loo-tro-vosk, a town of Siberia, and the capital of a district of the same name. It is in the government of Tobolsk, and stands on the Tobol, a little above its confluence with the Iset, in lat. 56° 38′ N.; lon. 61° 20′ E. Pop. 2,100.

JAMAICA, ja-mai'-ka, one of the West-India islands, or Antilles, belonging to Great Britain, and the most considerable and valuable of her possessions in that quarter, lying about 90 miles to the S. of Cuba. It is about 150 miles in length, and, on a medium, 50 miles in breadth. It has a coast-line of 500 miles, indented with many excellent harbours, of which Port Royal, or the harbour of Kingston, is the largest. A lofty range of mountains, called the Blue Mountains, runs through the whole island from E. to W., dividing it into two parts, and rising, in some of its summits, to an elevation of 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. On the N. and S. sides of these mountains the aspect of the country is extremely different. On the former the land rises from the shore into hills, which are more remarkable for beauty than boldness, being all of gentle acclivity, and generally separated from each other by expansive vales and undulating surfaces. Every valley has its rivulet, and every hill its cascade. On the S. side of the island the scenery consists of the stupendous ridges of Blue Mountains, of abrupt precipices, and inaccessible cliffs, as the shore is approached. The name of the island is derived from the aboriginal word, "Xaymaica," "land of wood and water." The climate is hot on the plains, the thermometer standing at 80°, and, in the colder season, from 70 to 80. On the higher grounds the cold is greater. The year, however, as in all tropical countries, may be divided between the wet and the dry seasons.

Rivers.—About 70 streams take their rise in the mountains, and usually run with great rapidity to the sea on both sides of the island. None of them are navigable except for boats. Black River is the deepest, and has the greatest current. It falls into Black-River Bay, on the S.W. coast, and has, at its entrance, about 18 feet of water. There are springs, both sulphurous and chalybeate, in different parts of the country.

Zoology.—The indigenous quadrupeds were the agouti, the peccary or Mexican hog, the armadillo, the opossum, the racoon, the musk-rat, the aico, and the monkey. Of these only the agouti and the monkey now remain. Horned cattle and mules are numerous, and so are sheep, goats, and hogs. Of the lizard there are many varieties. The woods and marshes abound with different kinds of wild fowl, some of them of exquisite flavour. Among them may especially be noticed the ringdove and rice-bird of South Carolina. Parrots are still found in the groves; but the flamingo is nowhere to be seen. Domestic fowls, however, are abundant, and fish are plentiful along the coasts.

Pro.—The soil has, in some places, been considered deep and fertile; but, on the whole, the island has been pronounced unfruitful and laborious, compared with those countries which have been generally regarded as fertile. Sugar, indigo, cotton, and coffee are the most important natural productions; maize, or Indian corn, and rice, are also cultivated. The bread-fruit tree, with several other useful plants, was introduced by Sir Joseph Banks; whilst different kinds of grass, of excellent quality, are found spontaneously growing upon the island. There are also excellent vegetables of native growth. The other indigenous productions are plantains, bananas, yams of several varieties, calalue, a species of spinach, eddoes, cassava, and sweet potatoes. Fruits are found in equal perfection and variety, and no country affords so magnificent a dessert. The mountains are covered with woods, containing trees of prodigious growth and solidity; and some, as the well-known mahogany, are well adapted for cabinet work.

Exp.—Sugar, rum, molasses, coffee, cocoa, cotton, indigo, pimento, ginger, arrowroot, and logwood.

Area.—6,400 square miles.

Pop.—580,804, of whom only about 13,000 are whites, the remainder being negroes.

Chief Towns.—KINGSTON (the capital), PORT ROYAL, and SPANISH TOWN.

Lat. Between 17° 40′ and 18° 30′ N. Lon. between 76° 15′ and 78° 25′ W.

Government.—Formerly administered by a governor, an executive, and a legislative council, appointed by the crown, and a house of assembly, elected by the freeholders of the island. Since the disturbances of 1865 the representative constitution has been suspended.

History.—Jamaica was discovered by Columbus in 1494, and was, in 1503, first colonised by the Spaniards. In 1655 it was taken by the English, and was afterwards settled by 3,000 British soldiers, disbanded from the parliamentary army. These were subsequently followed by 1,500 royalists; and, from this beginning, the colony gradually increased in importance. In 1865 there was a serious outbreak of the coloured population at Morant Bay, which was suppressed with a severity that excited great indignation in England. (See EYRE.)

JAMAICA, a township of New York, United States, 12 miles E. of New York. Manf. Pianofortes and carriages. Pop. 6,500.

JAMARI, or CANDESS, ha-mar′-e, a river of Brazil, rising in the province of Matto Grosso, flowing generally in a north-west direction and falling into the Madeira, after a course of about 300 miles.

JAMBEE, or JAMBI, jam′-be, the capital of a district of the same name in Sumatra, on the south-east side of the island, about 60 miles from the sea, on both sides of a river of the same name, which is navigable for boats. The town is large, but the air unwholesome. There is a trade principally with Singapore. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 1° 22′ S. Lon. 103° 35′ E.

JAMBURG, jam′-boorg, a town of Russia, 70 miles S.W. of St. Petersburg, on the right bank of the Luga, here crossed by a wooden bridge. It has several churches, and a market-place adorned with an obelisk. Manf. Woollens, linens, camlets, and silks. There are also some saw-mills and glass-works. Pop. 1,500.

JAMES, ST., a town of France, in the department Manche, 12 miles S.E. of Avranches. Manf. Cloth, known as the drap de St. George, and druggets. Pop. 3,200.—Here William the Conqueror built a strong fortress, which remained in possession of the English till 1448.

JAMES, ST., the Great, was the son of Zebedee and Salome, and called to the apostleship with his brother, John the Evangelist, while they were mending nets with their father. James was beheaded at Jerusalem by Herod Agrippa.

Died about 44.

JAMES, ST., the Less, another of the apostles, obtained the name of Just on account of his virtues. He was the first bishop of Jerusalem. One of his epistles, addressed to the dispersed, converted Hebrews, is among the canonical epistles of the New Testament. He was put to death by the high priest Ananias.

Died about 63.

SOVEREIGNS OF SCOTLAND.

JAMES I. (1406-1437), the son of Robert III., was taken by the English on his passage to France, whither he had been sent by his father, that he might be safe from the treachery of his uncle, the duke of Albany. He continued in captivity 18 years. In 1424 he obtained his liberty, and on giving hostages for the payment of £40,000, he was allowed to return to Scotland. Previous to which he married the daughter of the earl of Somerset. He has the reputation of having been the ablest of the Stuart dynasty. He was murdered in the 44th year of his age by Sir R. Graham, who had been banished and deprived of his possessions for treasonable language.

Born 1393; died 1437.

JAMES II. succeeded the preceding king, his father, at the age of six years. His reign was marked by strenuous efforts to diminish the excessive power of the house of Douglas, which had risen to such a pitch as to overshadow the crown.

Born 1430; killed at the siege of Roxburgh, 1460.

JAMES III. was the son and successor of the above, and ascended the throne in 1460. He put to death his brother John, and committed so many cruelties that his subjects revolted.

Born about 1453; killed 1488.

JAMES IV. succeeded his father, the last-mentioned, at the age of about 15 years. He defeated the rebellious lords, and assisted Louis XII., king of France, against the English; but was slain at the battle of Flodden Field.

Born about 1473; died 1513.

JAMES V., the son of the above, was only a year old at the time of his father's death. At the age of 17 he assumed the government, and assisted Francis I. of France against the emperor Charles V., for which the French king gave him his daughter Margaret in marriage. On her decease, he married Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. On his death, James left his crown to Mary Stuart, his daughter.

Born 1512; died 1542.

SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND.

JAMES I. of England, and VI. of Scotland, was the son of Henry, Lord Darnley, by Mary queen of Scots, daughter of James V. When only a year old, he was proclaimed king, on the forced resignation of his mother, and, in 1603, he succeeded Queen Elizabeth on the English throne. A plot was soon after discovered to seize on him, and place his cousin, the Lady Arabella Stuart, upon the English throne in his stead, for which Lords Cobham and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh, were indicted. But, in 1605, the more desperate attempt to blow up the king, the prince, and both houses of parliament, known as the Gunpowder Plot, was discovered, for which Guy Fawkes and many other persons were executed. In 1606 he established episcopacy in Scotland, and made peace with Spain. In 1612, his son, Prince Henry, by Anne of Denmark, died, and the same year his daughter was married to Frederick, the elector-palatine. One of the greatest blots of his reign, was the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh, fifteen years after sentence. James was a man of learning, and affected to be a profound scholar, particularly in theology, being not indifferently acquainted with polemics, of which he was so fond as to found Chelsea College, for the maintenance of learned men, who were to employ themselves in managing controversies, especially with the church of Rome. Charles II., however, applied it to the better purpose of affording a home for soldiers worn out in the service of their country. He wrote, among other books, a "Commentary on the Revelation," in which he calls the pope Antichrist: "Basilicon Doron: or, Advice to his Son;" "Dæmonology: or, a Discourse on Witchcraft;" "A Counterblast against Tobacco."

Born at the castle of Edinburgh, 1566; died in England, 1625.

JAMES II., king of England, was the second son of Charles I. He was declared Duke of York soon after his birth. During the civil war he resided in France, where he imbibed the principles of the Catholic faith. At the Restoration he returned to England, and secretly married Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, who afterwards became queens of England; viz., Mary and Anne. In the Dutch war he signalized himself as commander of the English fleet, and showed great skill and bravery. On the death of his first wife, he married Mary Beatrice of Modena. He succeeded to the throne on the death of Charles II., in 1685; but his zeal for his religion, despotic temper, and habitual insincerity, leading him into measures subversive of the constitution, the prince of Orange, who married his daughter Mary, was invited to England by several of the English nobility; and the king finding himself abandoned by his friends, withdrew to France. (See STUART.)

Born in London, 1633; died at St. Germains, 1701.

JAMES I., king of Aragon, called the "Warrior," succeeded his father, Peter the Catholic, in 1213. He conquered the kingdoms of Majorca and Minorca, Valence, and other countries, from the Moors. Before he expired, he resigned the crown to his successor, and took the habit of the Cistercian monks, according to the superstition of the age.

Born 1206; died at Valence, 1276.

JAMES II., king of Aragon, succeeded his brother, Alphonso III., in 1291. He carried on a long war against Navarre and the Moors, and united Catalonia to his crown.

Born 1260; died at Barcelona, 1327.

JAMES OF VORAGINE, a Dominican and bishop, who became provincial of his order, and archbishop of Genoa. He compiled a "Golden Legend," full of pious fables, which has been many times reprinted.

Born at Genoa, about 1330; died about 1398.

JAMES, THOMAS, a learned divine, was educated first at Winchester school, and next at New College, Oxford, where he was chosen fellow, with the degree of D.D. He was appointed first keeper of Bodley's Library, and made sub-dean of Wells. He collated MSS. of the ancient fathers, with a view to publish them, but failed in his design for want of encouragement. He wrote several learned books, the chief of which is, "A Treatise of the Corruption of the Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers."

Born at Newport, Isle of Wight, 1571; died at Oxford, 1632.

JAMES, RICHARD, nephew of the above, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, whence he removed to Corpus Christi, of which he became fellow. He travelled in Russia, and published a narrative of his journey in 1619. He was of great service to Selden and Sir Robert Cotton, being a man of extensive learning, and profoundly acquainted with ancient MSS. He published several books in Latin.

Born 1592; died in London, 1631.

JAMES, ROBERT, an English physician, who received his education at St. John's College, Oxford. After practising in the country, he removed to London, and, in 1743, published his "Medical Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio, in which he was assisted by Dr. Johnson,—a work of considerable merit in its day. He also published other works in connection with his profession; but he is best known by a medicine, at one time universally celebrated under the name of James's powder, which gave a fortune to his family.

Born at Kinverston, Staffordshire, 1703; died 1776.

JAMES, GEORGE PAYNE RAINSFORD, a modern English novelist, historian, and poet. He received the rudiments of his education at a school in Greenwich; but was sent, about the age of 15, to Paris, where he remained several years. When only 17 he wrote several Eastern tales, which were afterwards published for the benefit of the Literary Fund. From that period till the year 1825 he continued to contribute anonymously to the magazines and periodicals; but, encouraged by Sir Walter Scott and Washington Irving, he wrote and published an historical novel, in the style of the former, called "Richelieu." Of his novels, it will be sufficient to enumerate a few of the best: these are, "Darnley," "Henry Masterton," "Philip Augustus," "The Gipsy," "The Smuggler," and "Morley Ernstein." The most successful of his historical works are, "The Life of the Black Prince," "The History of Charlemagne," and the lives of some Foreign Statesmen, which he contributed to "Lardner's Cyclopædia." During the period of his greatest popularity he had been appointed historiographer of England by William IV.; but soon resigned the office. Mr. James was appointed British consul at Norfolk, Virginia, in 1852. He was sent, in 1858, as Britannic consul-general for the Adriatic ports to Venice.

Born in London, 1801; died at Venice, 1860.

JAMES, JOHN ANGELL, a well-known and highly-respected congregational minister, pastor for many years of the church in Carr's Lane, Birmingham. He was born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, studied for a short time at the Gosport College, and was ordained at Birmingham at the age of twenty. Some of his works have had a very wide circulation. The best known amongst them is the "Anxious Inquirer."

Born 1785; died 1859.

JAMES, a new county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. Unascertained. The capital is Oltewah.

JAMES BAY, a bay situate at the bottom of Hudson's Bay, British America. It is 280 miles long, with a width ranging between 75 and 170. It contains several islands, and receives some considerable rivers. Lat. between 51° and 55° N. Lon. between 79° and 82° 30′ W.

JAMES ISLAND, one of the largest of the Galapagos group in the Pacific. It is 50 miles long, by 20 broad. Volcanic and barren; its coasts however, are the resort of great numbers of turtles, whilst the interior swarms with tortoises. Lat. 12′ S. Lon. 90° 55′ W.

JAMES CITY, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 184 square miles. Pop. 4,500. Williamsburg is the capital.

JAMES RIVER, a river of Virginia, United States, formed by the union of two streams, Jackson's and Cowpasture, and enters Chesapeake Bay by a wide estuary. It is navigable for vessels of considerable size as high as Richmond, 80 miles from its mouth.

JAMESON, MRS. ANNA, jaim'-son, a modern English authoress, was eldest daughter of Mr. Murphy, an artist of Dublin, who afterwards became painter in ordinary to the Princess Charlotte. As a young woman, Anna Murphy occupied the post of governess in two or three families of distinction; but, at the age of 27, she married Mr. Robert Jameson, a barrister, who, several years afterwards, was appointed to an official post in Canada. Mrs. Jameson joined her husband subsequently; but a separation eventually took place by mutual agreement; upon which she returned to London, and devoted herself henceforth to literature and the fine arts. She had already made her appearance as an authoress, having published the "Diary of an Ennuyée," in 1826, a work which was reprinted, with many additions, under the title "Visits and Sketches at Home and Abroad." In 1829 appeared her "Loves of the Poets," a series of imaginative sketches; after that, "Female Biography," "Romance of Biography," "Beauties of the Court of Charles II.," "Female Sovereigns," and "Characteristics of Women," a work similar to the "Loves of the Poets," but of a higher and more ambitious character. In 1838 she published "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada," which contained a record of her visit to Canada; and, in 1840, she put forth a translation of "The Dramas of Princess Amelia of Saxony." In all her works of foreign travel hitherto published, social and artistic criticisms were to be found; but, about this time, she commenced writing books of an exclusively artistic character; the first of these being her "Handbook to the Public Galleries of Art in and near London," which was published in 1842. Akin to this production were her "Companion to the most celebrated Private Galleries of Art in London;" "Lives of the Early Italian Painters;" a collection of Essays, chiefly artistic, called "Memoirs and Essays;" "The Poetry of Sacred and Legendary Art;" "The Legends of the Monastic Orders," and "The Legends of the Madonna;" this last appearing in 1852. All these works displayed a profound acquaintance with the principles, and a refined appreciation of the great examples of art. Indeed, her labours may be said to have been the precursor of that enlarged and discriminative fine art criticism which has since sprung up in England. The "Handbook to the Courts of Modern Sculpture at the Crystal Palace" was written by her; but, in addition to her artistic criticisms, she was author of a few small works, in which she sought to ascertain "whether there was any hope or possibility of organising, into some wise and recognised system, the talent and energy, the piety and tenderness of our women for the good of the whole community." For two years before her death she had been assiduously engaged upon "The Scripture and Legendary History of our Lord, &c., as represented in Christian Art," and it was while prosecuting her researches for this purpose at the British Museum that she caught a cold, which caused her death.

Born in Dublin, 1797; died in London, 1860.

JAMESON, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch antiquarian and lexicographer. He was sent by his father, at the early age of nine years, to the university of Glasgow, and subsequently attended lectures at the university of Edinburgh. In 1779 he obtained a license to preach from the presbytery of Glasgow. He produced, in 1808, his "Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language," and, in 1818, "An Abridgment of the Scottish Dictionary;" which last are valuable on account of the very large collection of old words, idioms, and customs, peculiar to his native country, contained therein. He had, for several years before his death, been in receipt of a pension, first from the Royal Society of Literature, and, afterwards from the civil list.

Born at Glasgow, 1759; died at Edinburgh, 1838.

JAMESON, ROBERT, a distinguished Scotch naturalist, was born at Leith. At the age of 26 he visited Freyberg for the purpose of studying under Werner, and in 1804 was appointed to the chair of Natural History in the Edinburgh University. His published works comprise "A System of Mineralogy" (1804), "A Mineralogical Description of the County of Dumbarton" (1805); "Elements of Geognosy," (1809); "Manual of Minerals and Mountain Rocks" (1821); "Elements of Mineralogy" (1837). He also founded in conjunction with Sir David Brewster "The Edinburgh Philosophical Journal" (1819), and in 1826 "The Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal." This last magazine he continued to edit until his death. "The Wernerian Society of Edinburgh" was founded by him in 1808.

Born 1774; died 1854.

JAMESONE, GEORGE, jame'-sone, a Scotch painter, termed by Walpole the Vandyck of Scotland. He studied under Rubens, with Vandyck at Antwerp, and, on his return to his native country, painted the portraits of many of the most distinguished Scotch noblemen then living, as well as one of the English king, Charles I.

Born at Aberdeen, 1586; died 1644.

JAMES TOWN, see HELENA, ST.

JAMESTOWN, a town of New York, United States, 58 miles S.W. of Buffalo, on Chatanque Lake, near lake Erie. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 9,500.

JAMIESON, jai'-me-son, a township of Victoria, Australia, at the junction of the Goulburn and Jannesa rivers, 162 miles N.E. of Melbourne. It is in the midst of a rich mining district.

JAMITZER, WENZEL, yai'-mit'-zer, a famous goldsmith and engraver. He worked in gold and silver, and modelled and chased flowers and animals with exquisite delicacy. He also excelled in niello work and enamel, and wrote a treatise on perspective.

Born at Vienna, 1508; died 1568.

JAMNITZ, yam-nitz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, on a height above the Zeletawa. There are a castle and four churches. Argentiferous lead is worked in the vicinity. Pop. 2,600.

JAMU, or JUMOO, ja-moo', a town in the Punjab, British India, 88 miles N.E. of Lahore, with extensive ruins in its vicinity. Pop. 8,000.

JAMYN, AMADIS, zha'-meen, a French poet, and secretary to Charles IX. Besides his poetical works, he wrote academical discourses in prose, and completed the translation of Homer's Iliad into French verse, which was left imperfect by Salel.

Born 1530; died 1585.

JANESVILLE, jaines'-vil, a city on both sides of the Rock river, in Wisconsin, United States. It is situated partly on a plain and partly on a bluff rising 100 feet above the river level. There is a large state asylum for the blind. There are numerous mills and factories worked principally by water power. The city is 45 miles S.E. from Madison, and is connected with Chicago, Milwaukee, &c., by railway. Pop. 8,800.

JANICON, FRANCIS MICHAEL, zha'-ne-kawng, a French political writer, who settled in Holland. He was the author of "The Present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and their Dependencies."

Born at Paris, 1674; died at the Hague, 1730.

JANICULUM, MOUNT, one of the seven hills of Rome. (See ROME.)

JANIN, JULES-GABRIEL, zha'-na, a modern French critic and author. Shortly after leaving college, he began to write squibs and political satires for the "Figaro," and continued to do so until that publication was suppressed by the government, in 1825. His vivacious and fearless pen was next employed in the columns of the "Messager des Chambres," and so trenchant were his attacks upon the despotic Polignac ministry of Charles X., that, in 1829, the journal to which he contributed was subjected to a heavy fine. In this year appeared his first novel, "The Dead Donkey and the Guillotined Woman," which was nothing else than a satire upon the style of Victor Hugo, as head of the "Romantic" school. So highly did his own party already esteem him, that, although only 25 years of age, he was styled by them "the Prince of Critics." During the three or four following years he published two novels, — "The Confession" and "Barnave," as well as a couple of volumes of short tales. In 1833 he commenced what proved to be the greatest of all his literary undertakings,—the dramatic notices and literary reviews for the "Journal des Débats." Janin also wrote many introductions, biographies, and critical essays for the republication of classic French authors. To the "Revue de Paris" he contributed two remarkable sketches, one of Mirabeau, the other of Lord Byron. He also wrote, compiled, and edited, more than a score of illustrated tours in France, novels, essays, and works of general literature. He also wrote a series of letters on the Great Exhibition of 1851. A collection of his dramatic feuilletons has been published, under the pretentious title of "Dramatic and Literary History."

Born at St. Etienne, La Loire, 1804; died 1874.

JANINA, JANNINA, or YANINA, ya-né'-na, a Turkish city, capital of an eyelet, or government of the same name (the ancient Epirus), situate on a lake, which communicates with the river Peneus, 40 miles W. of Larissa. The habitations of the higher classes participate of an Oriental character. It has about nineteen mosques and a large number of bazaars, where jewellery and articles of dress are displayed in great abundance. It carries on a considerable trade, and exports for the Italian ports wool, corn, oil, and tobacco. Inwardly, through Roumelia and Albania, it sends embroidered velvets, stuffs, and cloths, with the stocks of guns and pistols mounted in chased silver. This place in the time of Ali Pasha enjoyed a high degree of prosperity; but since his death, in 1822, it has greatly fallen into decay. Pop. 20,000.

JANKOVATZ, yan'-ko-vatz, a town of the Austrian empire, 81 miles S.E. of Pesth. Pop. 8,000.

JAN MAYEN'S LAND, yan mi'-en, an island in the Arctic Ocean, 150 miles from the E. coast of Greenland. Upon it is a volcanic mountain 1,500 feet high, frequently in eruption. Another mountain, Burenberg, is 687 feet high, and snow capped. The island was discovered in 1611, by Jan Mayen, the Dutch navigator.

JANSEN, or JANSENIUS, CORNELIUS, jan'-sen, a celebrated Roman Catholic prelate, was educated at Utrecht, whence he removed to Louvain, where he was chosen principal of the college of St. Pulcheria. Being deputed by his university to go on a mission to the king of Spain, that monarch employed him to write a book against France, for which he was rewarded, in 1636, with the bishopric of Ypres, in Flanders. He wrote several books; but that by which he is best known is his "Augustinus," which was published after his death, and occasioned a fierce contest among the divines of the Romish church, which even the papal bulls could not suppress. In 1641 the inquisitors prohibited the perusal of the book: Urban VIII. censured it as heretical; and Innocent X., in 1653, condemned some of the doctrines as heretical, and a violent persecution was excited against all who maintained them. The book was again condemned in 1656. Jansenism, notwithstanding, found numerous disciples in France and the Low Countries.

Born near Leerdam, Holland, 1585; died at Ypres, 1638.

JANSONIUS, NICHOLAS. (See JENSON.)

JANSSEN, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, who resided in England many years, and, in several respects, was equal to Vandyck. He painted portraits of James I. and his family, and most of the English nobility.

Born 1590; died 1665.

JANSSENS, ABRAHAM, a Dutch historical painter. His colouring was so superior, that a picture of his, representing the descent from the cross, in the church of Ghent, has been taken for the work of Rubens, and is scarcely inferior to the works of that painter.

Born at Antwerp, 1569; died 1631.

JANSSENS, VICTOR HONORIUS, an historical painter. He was patronized by the duke of Holstein, who sent him to Rome for improvement. On his return to his own country, he adorned the churches and convents with his works.

Born at Brussels, 1664; died 1739.

JANTRA, jan-tra, a river of European Turkey, rising in the N. slope of the Balkans, flowing through Bulgaria, and, after a course of 80 miles, falling into the Danube, 25 miles S.W. of Rustchuk.

JANUARIA, or SOBRAL, yan-oo-air'-e-a, a town of Brazil, in the province of Ceara, 120 miles N.W. of Fortaleza. It has a trade in cotton, and raw and dressed hides. Pop. about 3,000.

JANUARIA, a town of Brazil, province of Minas-Geraes, near the Pardo and Preto, 150 miles N. of Minas Novas. Its houses mostly consist of brick, in a framework of wood. Its trade is chiefly carried on in cotton, timber, and horses. Pop. 6,000.

JANUARIUS, St., jan-u-air'-e-us, bishop of Benevento, who was beheaded at Pozzuoli, in the persecution under Diocletian. His body was removed to Naples, where a beautiful chapel was erected to his memory in the cathedral. What renders his name remarkable is a pretended miracle exhibited yearly by the priests, who have what they term his blood in a phial. On bringing out what is called the head of the saint, the blood, nitherto in a congealed state, liquefies. This mummery is always practised when Vesuvius shows signs of a convulsion, and the people devoutly believe that the influence of the saint will prevent an earthquake.

JANUS, jā'-nus, in Roman legend, the most ancient king of Italy. He was a native of Thessaly, and son of Apollo. Establishing himself in Italy, he built a small town on the Tiber, and called it Janiculum. He so greatly improved the barbarous races over whom he reigned, and had such a peaceable kingdom, that he was regarded as the god of peace. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his son Jupiter, went to Italy, where Janus received him with great hospitality, and made him his colleague upon the throne. Janus is represented with two faces, because he was acquainted with the past and with the future; or, according to others, because he represented the sun, which opens the day at its rising, and closes it at its setting. He is shown in some statues with four heads. He was chiefly worshipped among the Romans, who erected many temples in his honour. Janus was represented in his statues chiefly as a young man. His temple, which was always open in time of war, was only closed three times in 700 years, the Romans, during that period, being continually fighting in some portion of the globe. There was a street in Rome called after his name, and situate near his temple, which was frequented by the usurers.

JAPAN, Empire of, or NIPHON, ja-pan', an extensive empire, consisting of several large, and about 3,800 small islands, situate at the E. extremity of Asia, in the N. Pacific Ocean. It is bounded on the N. by the Sea of Okhotsk, on the E. and S. by the Pacific Ocean, and on the N.W. by the Strait of Corea, the Sea of Japan, and the Gulf of Tartary. The principal of the islands are Niphon (which is the native name of the whole empire), Shikoku, and Kiushiu. The large island of Jesso, or Yesso, is immediately N. of Niphon. The most important of the smaller islands are Sado, Tsoussima, Amadsi, Yki, Yaksima, Oosima, Tanegasima, with the groups of Okisima, Gohissima, and Kosikisima. The general aspect of these islands is rugged and irregular, presenting almost every variety of mountain, rock, and hill, interspersed, in some parts, with plains of considerable extent. Some of the mountains are of a great height, and are covered with perpetual snow. This is particularly the case with Niphon, which is traversed throughout its whole length by a regular mountain-chain, whose loftiest summit, called Fusiyama, a volcano, and the sacred mountain of Japan, attains an elevation of 14,127 feet. There are several fine harbours. Volcanoes and earthquakes are felt in every part of the empire, often to a desolating extent. The climate exhibits great varieties, being intensely cold in the north, and very genial in the south. The cold is greater on the western than on the eastern coast.

Pro.—Various: but, on the whole, rich in vegetables. Among the most remarkable plants is the Rhus Vernix, or varnish-tree, affording a milky juice, with which the natives varnish, or, as we call it, japan, all their household furniture, dishes, and plates. The mulberry-tree is remarkable both for its abundance and utility. The tea shrub is still more common, and its leaves of the same universal use as in China, although its produce is inferior to the plant of that country. Tobacco, ginger, and pepper are cultivated. Fruits are abundant; consisting of a species of winter pear, of very large size, but not fit to be eaten raw; nuts, chestnuts, walnuts, figs, oranges, lemons, apricots. peaches, plums, and a peculiar species of citron. The floral kingdom is varied, rich, and beautiful, much time being devoted to its cultivation. The general crops are rice, barley, wheat, turnips, horseradish, carrots, melons, gourds, and cucumbers. Nothing can exceed the agricultural industry of the Japanese people. Though a great part of the soil is irregular, even the sides of the hills are formed by stone walls into terraces rising one above another, indicating the great attention which is given to rural industry. In the south the palm, banana, bamboo, and myalle flourish, and in the north the plants known in botany as Japonica are cultivated.

Minerals.—The chief natural riches of Japan are those which belong to the mineral kingdom. Several provinces produce gold in considerable quantity, and the gold mines of Matsumai and Sado are famous. Silver is also found; but copper is the metal of all others for which Japan is the most distinguished. Iron appears in three provinces only; sulphur is abundant; pearls of a fine quality are met with along the shores; also ambergris. The other mineral substances are, naphtha of a reddish colour, agates, carnelians, and jaspers.

Zoology.—Sheep and pigs are very few in number. Oxen and cows are employed merely for labour, milk and butter not being used as articles of food. There is a species of large buffalo, resembling a camel, which is used for draught in the cities; horses—which are small, but excellent, being employed only for occasions of state, are, on the whole, far from numerous. The caprice or superstition of a single emperor introduced the breeding of dogs with a care scarcely known in any other country: they are esteemed as sacred. Cats are numerous, yet the islands are overrun with rats and mice. There are some small bears, hares, and deer. Foxes still keep their ground against the skilful and persevering warfare of the natives, who view them with abhorrence, and regard them as animated by demons. The birds are numerous, and include falcons, pheasants, ducks, geese, storks, ravens, pigeons, larks, teal, pelicans, cranes, and herons. The falcon is held in high estimation. Scorpions, centipedes, and the insect tribes are abundant. Tortoises, lizards, and snakes are also found. The seas are well supplied with fish, large quantities of which are taken, as their flesh forms the principal portion of the food of the inhabitants.

Area.—The total area of the empire and its dependencies is estimated at 156,604 square miles.

Pop.—37,027,300. The inhabitants belong to the great Mongol-Tartar family, and, like other people of the same stock, are distinguished by broad skulls, high cheekbones, small eyes obliquely set, long black hair, and a yellow complexion. They are well made, active, intelligent, and have recently shown a wonderful power of adapting themselves to progressive ideas, a power shared by none other of the Mongolian races. They have been described, not inaptly, as "the Britons of the East." The upper classes especially are frank and courteous.

Lat. including the dependencies of the Loo-Choo Islands, from 24° 16′ to 50° N. Lon. 128° to 151° E.

Religion, Language, and Education.—The state religion is Buddhism, derived from China, but an older form exists, named Sinto or Sin-sin, "the way of the gods." The language is polysyllabic, and has an alphabet of 47 letters. There are four different forms of the written language. Education is very general. In 1871, the Mikado appointed a board of public instruction, which is reported to be very active. Public primary schools are increasing rapidly, especially in towns; but the movement is far more marked in the western provinces and on the coast than in the interior. Private schools are more abundant still. In order to facilitate the acquirement of foreign languages, the government of the Mikado engaged, in 1872, several European professors, and also sent, at the public expense, a large number of students to America and Europe.

Arts and Manf.—Being intelligent, and of a peculiarly active character of mind, the Japanese acquire knowledge with great facility. They possess the art of printing, borrowed from the Chinese, practise engraving, and among their books can show extensive works on botany and zoology, in which all the indigenous plants and animals are described, and exhibited in well-executed coloured plates. Latterly lithochrome printing has been produced with success. Japan and the neighbouring countries are delineated in maps which possess topographical accuracy, though without the divisions of latitude and longitude. The principal manufactures are those of silk and cotton, in which they equal any other Asiatic nation. To this may be added that species of lacquered ware, formed of a mixture of gold and copper, of which they possess almost the exclusive secret, and which we call japanned ware. In the manufacture of porcelain they are said to be superior to the Chinese. Telescopes, thermometers, watches, and clocks are made; and good paper, from the bark of the mulberry and other trees. Their architecture is slight, owing, perhaps, to the frequency of earthquakes. They work well in iron and copper, and have the art of making glass.

Commerce.—The chief imports consist of sugar, coffee, spices, lead, tin, and iron-ware; and from Europe, of printed cottons, cambrics, shirtings, ginghams, flannels, and window-glass. The chief exports are copper, camphor, tea, silk, lacquered ware, painted paper, &c. Foreign commerce is now being encouraged, and, under treaties with several European States, the ports of Nagasaki, Kanagawa, Yokohama, Hiogo-Ozaka, Niigata, Hakodadi, and the city of Yedo, are thrown open to all nations.

Railways and Telegraphs.—The first line of railway, from Yokohama to Yedo, 17 miles long, was opened in June, 1875, and other lines have since been constructed. The ports of Hiogo-Ozaka, Nagasaki, and Hakodadi are connected with each other and with Europe by lines of telegraph.

Administrative Division and Chief Towns.—Japan proper is geographically divided into the three islands, Niphon (the central and most important), Kiushiu ("the nine provinces"), and Shekoku ("the four states"). For administrative purposes, there are seven large districts, called "Do," or roads, which are subdivided into 25 provinces. The most important towns are YEDO, the capital; YOKOHAMA, NAGASAKI, KANAGAWA, and HAKODADI.

Constitution and Government.—The system of government of the Japanese empire is that of an absolute monarchy. It was adopted in the year 1869, when the now ruling sovereign overthrew, after a short war, the power of the formerly independent Daimios, or feudal nobles, reducing them to the position of simple tenants of the vast estates in their hereditary possessions. The sovereign bears the name of Supreme Lord, or Emperor; but the appellation by which he is generally known in foreign countries is the ancient title of Mikado, or "The Venerable." His power is absolute and unlimited, in temporal as well as spiritual affairs. He acts through an executive ministry, divided into eight departments, of the Imperial House, of Foreign Affairs, War, Navy, Finances and the Interior, Justice, Public Instruction, and Ecclesiastical Affairs. At the side of the Ministry stands the "Sain," or Senate, composed of thirty members, and the "Shoin," or Council of State, of an unlimited number of members, both nominated by the Mikado, and consulted by him at his pleasure. There exists no regular law of succession to the throne, but in case of the death or abdication of the Mikado, the crown devolves generally, not on his son, but on either the eldest or the most distinguished member of his house. The throne can be, and has frequently been, occupied by a female, who, however, is not allowed to remain single, but must seek a consort within the limits of the Shi Shinnō, or four royal families of Japan. The Mikado is, theoretically, an absolute Sovereign, who reigns and governs; but the work of government is carried on by the Great Council, which is divided into three sections denominated Centre, Right, and Left. The Centre is composed of the Prime Minister, Vice Prime Minister, and five advisers. The Left is made up exclusively of the Council of State. The Right includes all the Ministers and Vice-Ministers of the eight departments into which the administration is divided. The Ministers, either individually or united in a Cabinet, decide all ordinary questions; but points of real importance are reserved for the Great Council, presided over by the Mikado. A representative assembly or parliament was summoned in 1869, and again in 1875, for the discussion of matters referring to the interior economy of the empire. The local administration in the provinces is in the hands of prefects, one of them residing in each of the 75 districts into which Japan is divided.

History.—The first account of Japan which reached Western Europe was given by Marco Polo, in the 13th century, who speaks of it under the name of Cepango, or Zepangou. It was reached in 1542, by the navigator Mendez Pinto, who was driven by a storm upon its coasts. The Portuguese then attempted to open an intercourse with the inhabitants; but, after effecting a settlement at Nagasaki, they were expelled the country. They were succeeded by the Dutch, who obtained a factory on the island of Firando, and at first carried on a lucrative trade; but they were gradually laid under such restrictions, that their profits were much diminished, and they were forced to submit to the most degrading search from the public functionaries appointed to prevent any illicit intercourse with the inhabitants. The Russians, by forming establishments on the eastern coast of Asia, became neighbours to Japan, and the merchants of Okhotsk made several attempts to open an intercourse, but were generally unsuccessful. In the time of Elizabeth, an Englishman named William Adams being wrecked on the coast of Japan, was taken into favour with the emperor, and commercial relations were opened with England; but, in the reign of James I., all the ports were closed against Europeans, and the flag of the English was withdrawn. From that time till 1854, when a treaty was concluded, by which several ports were opened to foreigners, Japan was a terra incognita. Previous to the end of the 16th century, the supreme power was vested in the hereditary Mikado, but in 1583 a military leader partially deposed him and assumed the governing power with the title of Shogun. The Mikados, thenceforth, were recognised as sacred or spiritual sovereigns only, lived in complete seclusion, and took no part whatever in public affairs. A powerful aristocracy, or daimios, exercised almost uncontrolled power in the various provinces; but, in 1868, a revolution took place, the Mikado was restored to supreme power, and the daimios were deprived of their arbitrary privileges, and became simple governors of provinces. Consequent upon the change and the intercourse with the Western world, the most marvellous political progress known to history has taken place in Japan. The arts, sciences, and literature of Western Europe are equally studied and imitated; railroads and newspapers, the pioneers of culture, are springing into existence, and members of the noblest Japanese families are educated in Europe and America.

JAPAN, SEA OF, that part of the N. Pacific inclosed on the E. and S. by the Japan islands, and on the W. by the Corea and Manthooria. It communicates with the Pacific on the E. by the strait of La Perouse, or Matsmai or Sangar, and S. by that of Corea. The breadth at the widest part is about 540 miles.

JAPAN, or DJAPAN, a town of Java, on the left bank of the Kediri. It is a busy place, and the residence of the provincial governor. There are several mosques, and near the town are the ruins of the old town of Medand Kamalam.

JAPARA, or DJAPARA, ja-pa'-ra, a capital of a residency of the same name, on the N. coast of the island of Java, about 3 miles from the mouth of the Japara. It is the capital of a province of the same name, and has a mosque, a governor's house, a school, and a fort. A considerable trade is carried on. Lat. 6° 32′ S.; Lon. 110° 43′ E. About 3 miles inland are the ruins of the Javanese town of Japara.

JAPHET, jā'-fet, son of Noah, whose posterity is said to have peopled part of Asia and Europe.
Born about 2448 B.C.

JAPIX, or JAPICKS, GYSBERT, jā'-pix, a Frisian poet. He was the son of a poor carpenter of Bolswaart, in Friesland, his family name being Holckama, which the poet changed into Japix, that word signifying "son of Jacob," which was his father's Christian name. Little is known of the poet's life, except that he was a schoolmaster and parish clerk in Bolsword. His chief poems in manuscript are to be found in the Bodleian library. In 1829, Sir John Bowring translated and published some poems of Japix in the "Foreign Quarterly Review." A bust of the poet was set up by public subscription in St. Martin's church, at Bolswaart, in 1823.
Born at Bolswaart, Friesland, 1603; died at the same place, of the plague, 1666.

JAPURA, or CAQUETA, ja-poo'-ra, a large river of S. America, an affluent of the Amazon. It rises in the Andes of Ecuador, about 50 miles N.E. of Pasto, and, after a course of 1,000 miles, falls into the Amazon, in lat. 3° S., lon. 65° W. For the last 350 miles it is a Brazilian river. It has many affluents, both on the N. and S.; but its navigation is interrupted by a great cataract, which occurs in lat. 1° 10′ S.; lon. 72° 20′ W.

JAQUELOT, ISAAC, zhak'-lo, a Protestant theologian, who left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and resided first at Heidelberg and afterwards at Berlin, where he became preacher to the king, and pastor to the French Protestant congregation. He wrote extensively on theological subjects. The chief of his works are—"Dissertation on the Existence of God," "Treatise on the Veracity of the Inspired Books of the Old and New Testament." He had also many discussions with Bayle and Jurieu.
Born at Vassy, 1647; died at Berlin, 1708.

JARAFUEL, hai-ra-foi'-el, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, on the left bank of the Hoz, 45 miles S.W. of Valencia. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, shoes, soap, and white wax. Pop. 2,100.

JARAIZ, hai'-roiz, a town of Spain, province of Caceres, at the confluence of the Jaranda and Jarandilleja, 60 miles N.E. of Caceres. There are a massive church and a dilapidated palace. Pop. 2,000.

JARCHAS, jar'-kas, the most learned of the Indian Brahmins, and a great astronomer, according to Jerome. He is said to have given Apollonius of Tyana seven magical rings called by the names of the planets.

JARCHI, SOLOMON BEN ISAAC, jar'-ki, a celebrated rabbi, who spent thirty years in travelling through Europe and the Eastern countries. He wrote "Commentaries on the Bible," which are highly esteemed by the Jews.
Born at Troyes, France, 1040; died 1105.

JARDANE, jar-dai'-ne, in Greek legend, the slave of Omphale, who bore a son to Hercules named Alceus, who became king of Lydia, and whose descendants formed the Lydian dynasty of the Heraclidæ.

JARDYN, KAREL DU, yar'-dine, a Dutch landscape painter, who studied and worked in Italy, where he acquired a great reputation; and so greatly was he esteemed, that, though a Protestant, his remains were interred in consecrated ground.
Born at Amsterdam, 1640; died at Venice, 1678.

JARGEAU, zhar'-zho, a town of France, department Loiret, on the left bank of the Loire, 10 miles E. of Orleans. In its neighbourhood good red wine is manufactured. Pop. 2,500.—In 1428 this place was taken, after a siege, by the earl of Salisbury.

JARMERITZ, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia. There are a palace of the prince of Kaunitz, and a large free church. Four annual horse and cattle markets are held. Pop. 3,200.

JARNAC, GUY DE CHABOT, lord of, zhar'-nak, a French gentleman of the chamber to Francis I. and Henry II., who fought a duel with a courtier named La Châteigneraie in 1547. His adversary defeated him; but, as he stood over him, Jarnac gave him a mortal thrust under the hough. The title coups de Jarnac has since been given to treacherous blows.
Born 1515; died 1570.

JARNAC, a town of France, department Charente, on the right bank of the Charente, here crossed by a handsome suspension bridge, 16 miles N.W. of Angoulême. It is well built, and has a considerable trade in Cognac brandy, red wine, leather, and cattle. Pop. 4,200.—Here, in 1569, the Protestants under Coligny and the prince of Condé were defeated, when the latter was slain.

JAROMIRZ, ya'-ro-mirtz', a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, at the confluence of the Aufre with the Elbe, 68 miles N.E. of Prague. The town is walled, and there are three suburbs. The Elbe is crossed by a chain bridge. Manf. Cloth. Pop. 3,500.—The town suffered greatly during the Hussite war.

JAROSLAV, yar'-os-lav, a government in the interior of European Russia, inclosed by Vologda, Kostroma, Vladimir, Tver, and Novgorod, and divided into nine districts. It is flat, although of an elevated surface, broken in some parts by low ridges or the high banks of its streams. Pro. Hemp and flax are the principal crops; but, in the S., apples and cherries are extensively grown, though the soil is not generally fertile. Manf. Linens and hardware. Area, 14,000 square miles. Pop. about 1,000,000. Lat. between 56° 45′ and 59° N. Lon. between 37° 35′ and 41° 30′ E.

JAROSLAV, a city of European Russia, the capital of the above government, on the right bank of the Volga, 162 miles N.E. of Moscow. It consists almost entirely of wooden houses, but contains more than 40 churches, built of stone. It has a richly endowed seminary, is the see of an archbishop, the residence of a governor, and has several important courts and public offices. Manf. White lead, leather, paper, cotton, silk, and linen. There are also extensive flour-mills. The silk and linen industries are declining. Pop. 38,000.—This place was founded in 1025 by Jaroslav, the son of Vladimir the Great. Its prosperity may be ascribed to the introduction of the linen manufacture by Peter the Great.

JAROSLAW, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, on the left bank of the San, 62 miles N.W. of Lemberg. It is situate in a beautiful district, and has a handsome cathedral, two monasteries, and various schools. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, yarn, rosoglio, and refined wax. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 8,700.

JARROW, or JARROW-ON-TYNE, jar'-ro, a town of Durham, 6 miles S. of Gateshead. There are two churches, one of which, St. Paul's, recently restored and enlarged, is an ancient structure, in which the Venerable Bede preached and was buried. There are a market-hall, a large public-hall, and a good market-place. There are extensive iron shipbuilding and marine engine works, blast-furnaces, lead works, rolling-mills, and staithes for loading ships with coal. New docks have been constructed. Manf. Paper, iron, and chemicals. Pop. 25,531.—A station on the North-Eastern railway.

JARRY, NICHOLAS, zhar'-re, an eminent French caligraphist, who was appointed "Master Penman" to Louis XIV., and executed for that king, and for the chief lords of his court, many works which rank as masterpieces of the art. His "Garland of Julia," which he executed in 1641 for the duke of Montausier, consisting of 30 folio leaves, was sold, in 1714, for the sum of £580.

Born at Paris, 1620; died 1674.

JARS, GABRIEL, zhars, a French mineralogist. He visited, with Duhamel, the mines of Saxony, Bohemia, Austria, Hungary, and Carinthia, also those of England, and other countries. In 1768 he became a member of the French Academy of Sciences. His brother published his observations, under the title of "Voyages Métallurgiques."

Born at Lyons, 1732; died at Clermont, Auvergne, 1769.

JARUN, or JAROM, jai-roon', a town of Persia, province of Fars, 98 miles S. of Shiraz. The town is famous for the number and beauty of the palm trees surrounding it. There is a trade in cottons, tobacco, and iron. Pop. 4,000.

JASENOVAC, yas'-en-o-vach, a town of the Austrian empire, on the military frontier, on the left bank of the Save. There are large Greek and Roman Catholic churches. Ship-building is carried on, and there is a trade with Bosnia. Pop. 2,310.

JASLO, yas'-lo, a town of the Austrian empire, in Gallicia, at the confluence of several small streams with the Wysloka, 138 miles S.W. of Lemberg. It has an old castle. Pop. 2,200.

JASLOWIEC, yas'-lo-vich, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia. There are the ruins of an old castle and a large water-cure establishment. Pop. 2,300.

JASMIN, JACQUES, zhas'-ma, a Gascon poet of great popularity in France. He was the son of a tailor, and was himself early put to the trade of a hairdresser, which, despite his successful career as a poet, he continued to practise. His songs and poems were all of them written in the patois, or rural dialect, spoken on the banks of the Garonne. Soon after the publication of his collection of poems, "Les Papillotes,"—"the "Curlpapers," he was elected member of the academies of Agen and Bordeaux. Two of the most celebrated critics in France, Charles Nodier and Saint-Beuve, have commended Jasmin's productions, describing them as full of feeling and joyous grace. The poet usually recited his poems in his native town, and, having a fine voice and manner, the delivery of these lyrics, varying in dialect but little from those of the old troubadours of the 11th and 12th centuries, is said to have produced very great effect upon his hearers. Louis Philippe and the duke and duchess of Orleans bestowed upon him handsome gratuities; Toulouse gave him a golden laurel-wreath; Pau marked its sense of his worth by sending him a service of china.

Born at Agen, 1798; died 1864.

JASON, jai'-son, in Greek legend chief of the Argonauts, was son of Æson, king of Iolchos, in Thessaly, at whose death the throne was usurped by Pelias, on account of the tender youth of Jason, the lawful successor. In order to remove him from his presence, Pelias intrusted his education to Chiron, the centaur, and, in order to remove this claimant to the crown, reminded the young and ambitious Jason that Æetes, king of Colchis, had severely treated and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus (see PHRYXUS). He added that the expedition would be attended with much glory, and that, if Jason would undertake it, he would resign to him the crown when he returned victorious. Jason readily accepted the proposal, and the youngest and bravest Greeks assembled to share his dangers and his glory. They embarked on board a vessel called the Argo, whence they took the name of Argonauts, and, after many adventures, arrived at Colchis. Æetes promised to restore the golden fleece, which had been the cause of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided Jason would submit to his conditions. He was to tame bulls, and kill a monstrous dragon that watched over the golden fleece, &c. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with Jason, and as she was acquainted with the arts of enchantment, she promised to deliver her lover from every danger if he would swear to her eternal fidelity. He agreed to her proposal, and received from Medea certain herbs which would keep him safe. He then undertook the labours imposed on him, and in the presence of king Æetes and his people performed them. After this achievement, Jason immediately set sail for Europe with Medea. Jason's partiality for Glauce afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced; but her husband's infidelity was deeply revenged by Medea, who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. Jason lived afterwards a melancholy life. According to one legend reposing one day by the side of his ship Argo, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death.

JASPER, jas'-per, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 11,500, more than half coloured. The capital is Monticello.

JASPER, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 484 square miles. Pop. 14,500. Newton is the capital.

JASPER, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 675 square miles. Pop. 9,500. The capital is Rensselaer.

JASPER, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 26,000. Newton is the capital.

JASPER, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 12,000, nearly half coloured. The capital is Paulding.

JASPER, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 32,000. The capital is Carthage.

JASPER, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 918 square miles. Pop. 5,500. Jasper is the capital.

JASSY, or YASSY, yas'-sy, a town of the principality of Moldavia, of which it is the capital, 162 miles N.W. of Odessa. This town now shows only the remains of its ancient greatness. The ecclesiastical edifices are very numerous, and many of them of importance. There are an archiepiscopal palace and a convent in which the archbishops are buried. The environs are extremely agreeable and fertile; but the town is unhealthy, owing to the total neglect of cleanliness. It has various schools. Manf. Unimportant. The environs produce good wine; and a great deal of canvas is made in the town, and sent to Constantinople. The other articles of trade are flax, corn, hides, wool, wax, honey, and tallow. Pop. 90,000, of whom 40,000 are Jews. Jassy has been frequently taken by the Russians, but always restored at the conclusion of peace. In 1723 it was nearly entirely consumed by fire, and in 1772 dreadfully ravaged by the plague. In 1822 5,000 houses were burned by the Janissaries.

JASTROW, yas'-tro, a town of Prussia, province of West Prussia, 90 miles W. of Marienwerder, on the Wutzke. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church and a synagogue. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 4,500.

JASZ-APATHI, á-ass-ap'-á-te, a market-town of Hungary, 48 miles E. of Pesth. There is a handsome Roman Catholic church, and an important annual market is held. Pop. 8,000.

JASZBERENY, á-ass-be-ré-ne, a town of Hungary, on both sides of the Zagya, 38 miles N.E. of Pesth. It has a handsome Roman Catholic church, a Franciscan monastery, a Protestant church, a town-house, and a register-office. It stands in a fertile district, the produce of which forms the greater portion of its trade. It is said that, in an old fortress in the public square, Attila, king of the Huns, was buried, in 453. Pop. 21,000.

JATIVA, or XATIVA (San Felipe de), cha-té'-va, a Spanish town, standing on the slope of a hill, crowned by an old castle, 22 miles S. of Valencia, and in the province of the same name. The houses are, in general, substantial, and the streets clean and well paved. It has a collegiate church, a fine structure, in the form of a Greek cross, with a handsome dome, and containing many curious monuments, a town-house, many fountains, schools, and a palace of the counts of Moncada. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, hats, leather, soap, candles, and earthenware. Pop. 14,534.

JAUBERT, Pierre Amédée Emilien Probe, zho-bair', French orientalist, who in 1798 was appointed assistant-interpreter in the French expedition to Egypt. He was afterwards professor of the Turkish language in the Oriental school in Paris. He made several official journeys in the East, and in 1805 was sent on a mission with presents to the Shah of Persia. On his way he was intercepted by a Turkish pasha, who imprisoned him for nearly four months in a cistern. He succeeded, however, in accomplishing his mission, and on his return was rewarded by the emperor Napoleon, and appointed chargé d'affaires at Constantinople. In 1818 he again travelled in the East, and brought to France from Thibet a herd of goats, from whose hair the beautiful shawls are manufactured. In 1830 he was made a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and afterwards a peer, professor of the Persian language, and director of the Oriental school. He wrote an account of his travels, a grammar of the Turkish language, and some translations.

Born at Aix, 1779; died at Paris, 1847.

JAUCOURT, the Chevalier Louis de, zho-koor', member of the Royal Society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Stockholm. He furnished the French Encyclopædia with articles on medicine and natural philosophy. He also compiled a "Universal Dictionary of Medicine," in 6 vols., but the MS. was lost on board a ship, which foundered on her passage to Amsterdam.

Born at Paris, 1704; died at Copenhagen, 1779.

JAUER, you'-er, a fortified town of Prussia, in Silesia, on a river of the same name, 10 miles S.E. of Liegnitz. Manf. Linen, hosiery, ribbons, starch, and tobacco, and it has a trade in flax, yarn, and cattle. There is an important weekly corn market. Pop. 10,000.

JAUJA, cha'-oo-cha, a town of Peru, in the province of Junin, on the left bank of a river of the same name, 120 miles E. of Lima. Near it are some silver mines; and it carries on a considerable trade in agricultural produce and cattle. Pop. 15,000.

JAUJA, a river of Peru, rising in Lake Chinchaycocha, and, after a course of 400 miles, chiefly in a south-easterly direction, joining the Apurimac near lat. 12° S., and lon. 73° 35' W.

JAULNAH, jaul-na', a town of India, in the Nizam's dominions, 200 miles E. of Bombay. It is situated on a river of the same name. Manf. Silk. Pop. 10,000.

JAUREGUY, Jacques, cha'-oo-rai-goi, a fanatic, who, at the instigation of Spain, attempted to assassinate William prince of Orange. He struck the prince, but the blow was not mortal: he was taken and put to death.

Born 1562; died 1582.

JAUREGUY Y AGUILAR, a Spanish poet and painter, who resided for a long time at Rome, forming himself upon the best Italian models in both poetry and painting. On his return to his native land, he published some excellent translations of Tasso, and from the Latin. His pictures were distinguished for their beautiful colour, for their fine gradations of light and shade, and for the beautiful flesh-tints in them.

Born near Toledo, 1566; died at Madrid, 1641.

JAURU, cha'-oo-roo, a river of Brazil, rising in the Sierra of its name, which forms a branch of the Cordillera of Parecis. It runs through the province of Matto-Grosso, and, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the Paraguay, in lat. 16° 24' S. The chief affluents are the Aguahepi and Bahia.

JAVA, já'-va, an island of the Indian Archipelago, and the chief seat of the Dutch power in the East. On the S. and W. its shores are washed by the Southern Indian Ocean: on the N.W. lies the island of Sumatra, from which it is separated by the Straits of Sunda; on the N. is Borneo; on the N.E. the Celebes; and on the E. the islands of Bali and Madura, from the former of which it is separated by the Straits of Bali. It is 666 miles long, with a breadth varying between 56 and 136, being the largest of the Sunda group, with the exception of Sumatra and Borneo. The bays are Wynacoops, Welcome and Pepper, on the west coast, and on the south, Pachitan, Penanjong, Pangol, Sambreng, Segara-Wedi, Dampar, and Gradjagan. The principal harbours are those of Batavia and Surabaya on the north side, and Cali Pujang on the south. The more prominent capes are Java Head, at the entrance of the Strait of Sunda from the Indian Ocean; Cape St. Nicholas, where the strait opens into the Sea of Java; Panka on the W., Sendano on the E., and East and South capes at the southeast extremity of Java. The island is divided nearly in its whole length by a range of mountains running almost E. and W., and rising towards the centre to an elevation of about 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. In several hills of the great range of mountains, are the craters of volcanoes, eleven of which are still active. An extinct volcano near Batur, called Gueva Upas, or "the vale of poison," is held in the utmost horror by the natives. Every living thing that enters it drops down dead; and "in another," says Sir Charles Lyell, "the sulphureous exhalations have killed tigers, birds and innumerable insects."

Rivers.—The most considerable are the Solo, Kediri, Tjimanoek, and the Tjitaroem. There are a great many more, but they are generally mountain streams, and so rapid, and so shallow, as to be unnavigable.

Climate.—The year is divided into the dry and the rainy seasons; or into the east, which is called the good monsoon, and the west, or the bad monsoon. The sea-coast is hot and sultry; but in the more elevated regions it is remarkably healthy. At Batavia, from July to November, the thermometer generally stands, in the hottest part of the day, between 84° and 90°, which it rarely exceeds; and in the greatest degree of coolness in the morning, it is seldom lower than 76°. In some parts, particularly among the hills, and in many of the inland towns, it is often so cold as to make a fire desirable.

Zoology.—The domestic animals are buffaloes, and cattle of every description, including sheep, goats, and pigs. Game, however, does not abound so much as in other countries, though hares and rabbits are pretty common; and deer and antelopes are also plentiful. Horses are very numerous, and are of an active but small breed. Wild hogs and monkeys are found in all the jungles, and the forests abound with tigers, panthers and tiger-cats. Two species of civets supply a perfume of which the Javanese are very fond. The wild ox, hitherto untameable, abounds in the woods. The rhinoceros is sometimes met with. Snakes of various kinds, lizards of all kinds, from the variable chameleon to the iguana tribe, and the largest bats, some measuring five feet across the wings, are found. Scorpions and mosquitoes abound in the marshes. There are, besides, various other sorts of dangerous and disgusting insects. Of the great diversity among the feathered tribes we may remark the cassowary, the peacock, which forms the favourite food of the tiger; various kinds of thrushes, and a blackbird, found in the vicinity of the principal craters of volcanoes. White eagles have been seen here, and every kind of bird of prey is continually on the wing. The aquatic tribes are equally diversified, and the extensive fisheries along the coast are highly productive. At the mouths of the rivers, numbers of alligators, or caymans, are continually lurking for their prey; whilst, in the several bays, numerous sharks swim about the ships; and many animals, unknown in natural history, abound in the seas.

Pro.—The soil being of extraordinary richness, vegetation is both rapid and luxuriant. In the forests are found trees sufficiently lofty to be converted into the masts of large ships, whilst great quantities of teak supply the place of oak for building vessels, adapted to all purposes. Palms and cocoa-trees abound in great variety, and are distinguished by their luxuriant growth, sometimes reaching to the height of 150 feet. Fruits of all kinds are also abundant, many of them of exquisite delicacy and flavour. The various kinds of plants, and the great quantity of herbs, indicate the exuberance of the soil; whilst flowers exhale their perfumes at all seasons of the year. Garden plants, such as endives, cauliflowers, beans, cabbages, pompions, melons, patacas or water-melons, yams, and potatoes, are produced in great variety. Maize, or Indian corn, is a favourite article of food with the natives, who eat it roasted; but wheat and barley are not grown in abundance. The staple produce of the island is rice. Great quantities of sugar are also made. Pepper is produced in perfection; also indigo of a very superior quality. Cotton is cultivated in almost every part of the island, and the coffee plantations are also extremely luxuriant. The soil is likewise favourable to the growth of tobacco, indigo, cochineal, cinnamon, nutmegs, pimento, and tea.

Manf.—Cotton, leather, and saddlery; also iron, brass, and tin wares.

Commerce.—The principal articles of export are rice, sugar, coffee, indigo, tobacco, teak timber, and planks, spices, which are brought from the Moluccas, tin from Banca, cotton, yarn, salt, and edible birds-nests. The value of the exports is about £9,000,000 annually, and of the imports, £6,500,000. The chief trade is with the Netherlands.

Area.—51,336 square miles (including MADURA).

Pop.—21,000,000, of whom 27,000 are Europeans, 190,000 Chinese, and 23,000 Arabs and other foreign orientals. The bulk of the native inhabitants are agricultural labourers, the greater part of the soil being claimed as government property. The professed religion is Mahometanism.

Administrative Divisions.—There are 23 provinces or residencies, each governed by a resident, who must be a citizen of the Netherlands. The capital is BATAVIA.

Railways.—There are 160 miles open, and other lines are in course of construction.

Government.—This consists of a governor-general, assisted by a council of five members.

Lat. Between 5° 2′ and 8° 50′ S. Lon. between 105° 19′ and 114° 39′ E.

History.—The first European settlers were the Portuguese, in 1511, followed in 1596 by the Dutch, who for more than a century held unmolested possession of this large and fertile island. In 1811, however, an expedition was despatched from India, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, and, after some severe actions with the Dutch troops, the island was conquered by the British. It was surrendered to the Dutch again, however, at the peace of Paris in 1814. The whole of the island, since 1830, has fallen under the dominion of the Dutch, and is rapidly increasing in population and prosperity.

JAVA SEA, that portion of the Eastern Sea which lies between the island of Java to the south, Sumatra to the west, the islands of Banca, Billiton, and Borneo to the north, and the island of Celebes to the east. The width of the sea between Java and Borneo is 250 miles, and it is crossed by two approved routes to China, the one by the Strait of Macassar, and the other by Pitt's Passage. Lon. between 107° and 115° E.

JAVIER, SAN, chá-ve-air, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, 4 miles to the east of the Mediterranean, and 21 miles S.E. of Murcia. It is well built, has a church, and various schools. Manf. Oil and flour. Pop. 2,500.

JAVRON, zhav'-ron(g), a town of France, department Mayenne, on the left bank of the river Mayenne. The large slate quarry of Chatemoux is in the vicinity. Pop. 2,500.

JAWANA, DJAWANA, or JOANA, ja-wa'-na, a town in the island of Java, 30 miles S.E. of Japara. It is a residence of a governor, and has a fort. Its trade is considerable. Pop. 10,000.

JAWANA, a river, one of the largest on the north coast of Java, taking its rise in an inland lake, and falling into the Java Sea. It is navigable by prahus to its source.

JAWOROW, ya-vor'-o, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, 30 miles N.W. of Lemberg. It has a parish church, extensive suburbs, and mineral springs. Pop. 7,500.

JAXARTES, yax-ar'-tees, a river of Turkestan, now known as Sihun or Sir Daria, rises in the Thian Shan Mountains. It branches after passing Otrar, and forms two streams, the larger of which retaining its original names, forms the boundary line between the Russian territory and Turkestan, and continues its course until it falls into the Sea of Aral, 1150 miles from its source. The smaller branch flows westward, supplies some small lakes in its course, but for some time past has not had sufficient force to reach the Aral Sea.

JAXT, yaxt, a river of Wurtemberg, rising about 10 miles S.E. of Ellwangen, on the frontiers of Bavaria, and, after a course of 100 miles, joining the Neckar 7 miles N. of Heilbronn.

JAXT, or JAGST, a circle or province of Wurtemberg, forming the north-eastern part of the kingdom. The principal towns are CRAILSHEIM, ELLWANGEN, and GMUND. Area, 1,600 square miles. Pop. 407,613.

JAY, GUI MICHEL LE, zhai, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who printed a polyglot Bible at his own expense, and thereby impoverished himself. Subsequently entering into holy orders, he was made dean of Vezelai. His polyglot Bible is elegantly printed in 10 vols., and has the Syriac and Arabic versions, which are not in that of Ximenes.

Died 1675.

JAY, JOHN, the first chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, was educated for the law at Columbia College, New York, and entered upon his profession in 1768. He was president of congress 1778, and in the year following represented his country at the court of Spain. His services in negotiating the treaty of peace and otherwise were recognised by an offer from Washington of any office within his gift, when he chose that of chief justice. He subsequently resigned, became governor of New York, and afterwards (1794) was minister to England.

Born in New York, 1745; died 1829.

JAY, WILLIAM, jai, a celebrated American abolitionist, son of the preceding. He was designed for the profession of the law, but an affection of the eyes forced him to relinquish its study. He was one of the most active advocates of the abolition of slavery in the United States, and wrote several works in aid of the same cause. These were collected and published at Boston in a complete form, with the title, "Miscellaneous Writings on Slavery," in 1854. He was one of the founders of the American Biblical Society, and served as president of the Peace Society. In 1832 he edited his father's correspondence, and wrote a biography of him, publishing the work under the title of "The Life and Correspondence of John Jay."

Born 1779; died 1858.

JAY, WILLIAM, Nonconformist minister. He was the son of a stone-cutter, and, as a lad, worked with his father. His talents attracting attention, he was educated for the Congregational ministry, and began to preach when only 16 years old. He was for more than 60 years a minister at Bath, and one of the most popular preachers in the West of England. He wrote various religious works, which are much admired.

Born at Tisbury, Wiltshire, 1768; died at Bath, 1853.

JAYADEVA, jai-a-dé-va, a Hindoo poet, of whose life or pursuits nothing certain is known. Only one of his poems is extant, this being the "Gita Govinda; or, Poem in Honour of Govinda," one of the names of the Hindoo god Krishna. It is an amatory and voluptuous lyric, and Sir William Jones, Colebrooke, and other commentators, assert that it is only to be interpreted in an allegorical sense. Sir William Jones published a translation of the "Gita Govinda," in the 3rd vol. of the "Asiatic Researches."

JAZYGIA, yaz-ij'-e-a, a district of Hungary, surrounded by the counties of Pesth and Heves. It is watered by several rivers, and produces wine, grain, and tobacco. As the pastures are extensive, numerous herds of horses are reared. Area, about 350 square miles. Pop. 50,000.

JEAN D'ANGELY, ST., zha danzh'-le, a town of France, department Charente-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Boutonne, 35 miles S.E. of Rochelle. It is irregularly built, and has an abbey, several churches, a communal college, theatre, market-hall, and an hospital. It is also a seat of a court of first resort and commerce. Manf. Wine, brandy, and gunpowder; and it has a trade in timber and various kinds of seeds. Pop. 7,000.

JEAN DE BOURNAY, ST., boor'-nai, a town of France, department Isère, 14 miles E. of Vienne, on the Veronne, a small stream. Manf. Beetroot sugar and leather. Pop. 3,400.

JEAN DE LUZ, ST., de(r)-loos, a town of France, department Basses Pyrénées, 12 miles S.W. of Bayonne, on the right bank of the Nivelle, across which is a bridge leading to the suburb of Sibourre. A new port has been constructed, the old one having been blocked up by shifting sand. Pop. 2,800.

JEAN DU BRUEL, ST., broo'-el, a town of France, department Aveyron, at the foot of a branch of the Cavennes, 39 miles N.W. of Montpellier. Manf. Woollen stuffs, hosiery, and hats. There is a trade in timber, casks, fruit, corn, and cattle. Pop. 3,000.

JEAN DE MAURIENNE, ST., mo'-re-an, a town of France, department Savvie, on the Arc, 48 miles S.E. of Chambery. There is a fine cathedral, and mines of argentiferous lead, and mineral and thermal springs are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

JEAN DU GARD, ST., gar, a town of France, department Gard, on the left bank of the Gard n d'Anduze, 9 miles W. of Alais. Manf. Silk fabrics, stockings, and thread, paper, leather, and earthenware. Manganese is worked in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,900.

JEAN PIED DE PORT, ST., pé'-ai de(r) por, a town of France, department Basses Pyrénées, on the Nive, on the Spanish frontier, 26 miles S.E. of Bayonne. It has a citadel, commanding three passes which lead from France into Spain. It was formerly the capital of Navarre, and near it is the pass of Roncesvalles, where, in 778, the army of Charlemagne was defeated, and Roland, the distinguished paladin, mortally wounded. Pop. 1,800.

JEANNE D'ALBRET, zhane-dal-brai, Queen of Navarre, mother of Henry IV. of France. She married, in her twentieth year, Antony, Duke of Vendôme, who died of a wound fourteen years afterwards. She became a Protestant in 1562, and, although threatened with deposition by the Pope, established Calvinism at Bearne, and was an energetic supporter of the Huguenots. Born 1528; died 1572.

JEBA, or GEBA, jé-ba, a river of Guinea, W. Africa. Its source is unknown; but its mouth, 115 miles wide, is in lat. 11° 40′ N., lon. 15° 14′ W.

JEBAIL, GEBAIL, or JUBEIL, je-bail', a maritime town of Syria, 20 miles S.W. of Tripoli. It is enclosed by a wall and towers, apparently of the time of the Crusaders, contains a castle and many relics of antiquity, some of them extremely ancient. The place is now of little importance. Lat. 34° 12′ N. Lon. 35° 30′ E.

JECONIAH. (See JEHOIACHIN.)

JED, jed, a river of Scotland, in Roxburghshire, falling into the Teviot, about 2 miles below Jedburgh.

JEDBURGH, jed'-bur-reh, a town, and royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, of great antiquity, and the chief town of Roxburgh, on the left bank of the Jed, 40 miles S.E. of the county of Edinburgh. It is pleasantly situated among orchards, and consists of several principal streets, which cross each other at right angles, and terminate in a square or market-place. Jedburgh was one of the most noted border towns; and after the union of the two kingdoms, it became the centre of an extensive contraband trade, which being checked by the vigilance of the English excise, the population and industry of the town began rapidly to decline. The abbey, a large and magnificent fabric, in the form of a cross, was founded by David I. in the early part of the 12th century; and part of it has been fitted up for a parish church. There are, besides, several dissenting meeting houses, Presbyterian and Free churches, and an Episcopalian chapel. There are also county and town-halls, and a corn exchange. Part of the old castle is now used as a prison. Manf. Blankets, shawls and plaids, flannels and hosiery. Pop. 5,147.—A station on the North British railway.

JEDDO. (See YEDO.)

JEEJEEBHOY, SIR JAMSETJEE, Bart., je'-jeeb-hoi, an eminent Parsee merchant of Bombay. He was born of humble stock, and had to make his own way in the world. While quite a young man he made five mercantile voyages to China; in one of these, the ship in which he sailed formed one of the fleet which, under the command of Sir Nathaniel Dance, beat off a French squadron under Admiral Linois. In another voyage, the vessel on board which were himself and his fortune, was captured by the French, and he was carried to the Cape of Good Hope, whence, with the loss of all his property, and after enduring many privations, he found his way in a Danish vessel to Calcutta. Fortune smiled on him afterwards, however, and as his wealth increased, the tendency to share it with the needy, or to spend it for the benefit of the public, began to develop itself. In 1822 he released all the poor debtors confined by the Court of Requests from the Bombay gaol, by the simple process of paying their debts. From that time to the day of his death, the stream of his beneficence scarcely slacked in its flow. He dispensed in philanthropic services the vast sum of 300,000*l*. Parsee and Christian, Hindoo and Mussulman,—indeed, people of all classes and creeds, alike shared in his beneficence, the largest outlay being for the poor and for the public. For his great public services, no less than for his philanthropic efforts, he was created a baronet, the first native of the East upon whom the title was conferred.

Born at Bombay, 1783; died at Bombay, 1859.

JEFFERSON, jef'-fer-son, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 1,040 square miles. Pop. 23,272. The capital is Elyton.

JEFFERSON, THOMAS, third president of the United States, was the son of a Virginian planter. After receiving his education at the college of William and Mary, at Williamsburg, he studied the law, and, at the age of 24, began to practise. In the stirring events that preceded the American revolution, he took a foremost and distinguished part, though he was never engaged in any military operations. He was sent as a delegate to the Continental Congress, and drew up the celebrated Declaration of Independence. He was governor of Virginia between 1779-81; three years afterwards he was appointed minister to France, and remained at that post during five years. Shortly after his return to America, in 1789, he became secretary of state under the presidency of General Washington. He was one of the founders (in opposition to Washington) of the Federal, or States right party (now the Democrats). He contested the presidency with John Adams (a prominent leader of the Anti-Federal, or Republican party), by whom he was defeated, and he then became vice-president of the United States. In 1801 he was chosen president, and, after being elected a second time, he retired, in 1809, to his estate near Monticello, in Virginia. Mr. Jefferson was author of a book called "Notes on Virginia."

Born at Shadwell, Virginia, 1743; died in Virginia, 1826.

JEFFERSON CITY, jef'-fer-son, a city of the United States, the capital of Missouri, 100 miles W. of St. Louis, on the right bank of the Missouri river. It is on an elevated site, and has a handsome stone state-house, a governor's residence, various churches, and a state penitentiary. Manf. Wooden and iron wares, and carriages. Pop. 5,500.

JEFFERSONVILLE, a town of Indiana, United States, occupying an elevated position at the head of the falls of the Ohio, which affords valuable water power. Manf. Agricultural implements, steam-engines, carriages, and hose and iron castings. Pop. 9,500.

JEFFERYS, GEORGE, jef'-freys, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, who was educated at Westminster school and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He afterwards studied the law, and was called to the bar, but never practised. His Miscellanies in prose and verse contain, among other pieces, the tragedies of "Edwin" and "Merope."

Born at Waldron, Northamptonshire, 1678; died 1755.

JEFFREY, FRANCIS, jef'-fre, by courtesy Lord Jeffrey, a distinguished Scotch judge, essayist, and one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Review." He was the son of Mr. George Jeffrey, a deputy clerk of the Court of Session, and, at eight years of age, was sent to the high school of Edinburgh. At 14 years of age he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where in the debating societies of the college he soon distinguished himself above his fellow-students by his fluent speech and severe criticisms on the efforts of his opponents. He was afterwards a pupil in the law classes of the Edinburgh university, and attended them till 1791, when he went to Queen's College, Oxford, to finish his studies. He left the English college in nine months. His father seems to have been, for some time, undecided whether to make a lawyer or merchant of his son. The former was eventually resolved on, and, in 1792, he was once more sent to the law classes of the Edinburgh university. In 1792 he became a member of the Speculative Society, and there formed the acquaintance of Scott, Brougham, Horner, and other young men who afterwards were distinguished. In 1794 he was called to the Scottish bar; but, being unknown, and, above all, a Whig, there was small chance of his obtaining briefs. About this time he began writing for the "Monthly Review" and other magazines. His income in 1801 was about 100*l.* per annum: he, however, entered into matrimonial bonds, and took an upper story in a house in Edinburgh, where, one evening, Sidney Smith suggested to Jeffrey, and the other guests, Horner and Brougham, the idea of starting a new journal to be called the "Edinburgh Review." The first number appeared in October, 1802, under the editorship of Sidney Smith; but, after the second number, Jeffrey was placed at its head. During the subsequent 26 years, Jeffrey continued to edit and contribute to this celebrated review. Throughout his editorship, he was the main support of the journal; and his contributions have been published in four volumes. In the interval he had won for himself a place almost at the head of the Scottish bar. In 1806 he visited London, and, while there, fought a famous duel with Moore at Chalk Farm. Though this meeting had arisen out of Jeffrey's treatment, in his Review, of some of Moore's early poems, both the criticism and the duel were afterwards forgotten, and the poet and essayist became the best of friends. In 1813 he went to America to marry Miss Charlotte Wilkes, an American lady, but the grand-niece of the celebrated English politician Wilkes. In 1821 he was chosen lord rector of the university of Glasgow, and eight years afterwards, dean of the Faculty of Advocates; upon which he resigned the editorship of the "Edinburgh Review." He was returned to parliament for the Perth, Forfar, and Dundee burghs, in 1830; but, losing his seat the next year, he was, through the influence of Earl Fitzwilliam, chosen as the representative of the borough of Malton. He sat for this borough, and for his native city, till 1834, when he was made a Scotch judge, with the courtesy title of lord. He sat upon the Scottish bench until a short time before his death. The biography of Jeffrey, with his correspondence, was published by Lord Cockburn in 1852.

Born at Edinburgh, 1773; died at Craigcrook, 1850.

JEFFREYS, or JEFFERIES, GEORGE LORD, jef'-freys, an English judge, notorious for his cruelty and injustice. He was educated at Westminster school, after which he removed to the Inner Temple, where he studied the law with great application. By attaching himself to the duke of York, he obtained the appointment of Welsh judge, the honour of knighthood, and the chief-justiceship of Chester. In 1683 he was appointed chief-justice of the King's Bench, and, in 1685, lord chancellor. He gave way on the bench to ferocious outbreaks of temper and brutal attacks upon prisoners and witnesses obnoxious to the government. His very name is now a term of reproach, as indicating an unjust and scurrilous magistrate. His cruelties on the western circuit towards the deluded followers of the duke of Monmouth were excessive; yet they gave great satisfaction to James II., who, with heartless mirth, called this "Jeffrey's campaign." He supported all the arbitrary acts of the court, and rendered himself so obnoxious to the people, that, when James abdicated the throne, he attempted to leave the kingdom in the disguise of a sailor, but was recognised while drinking in a cellar in Wapping. Perceiving himself discovered, he feigned a cough, and turned to the wall with his pot of beer in his hand; but information of his presence being communicated to the mob, they rushed in, and carried him before the lord mayor, who sent him to the lords of council, by whom he was committed to the Tower, where he remained for the rest of his life.

Born at Acton, Denbighshire, about 1640; died in the Tower, 1689.

JEFREMOV, yef'-re-mov, a town of European Russia, 75 miles S.E. of Tula. It is no more than a collection of thatched houses, and the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

JEGA, jé-ga, a town of Western Africa, on a stream supposed to be an affluent of the Niger, 70 miles S.W. of Sokoto. There is a trade in a coarse kind of coloured silk, and a weekly market is well frequented.

JEGORIEVSK, yé-gor'-e-evsk, a town of Russia, and the capital of a circle 66 miles N.W. of Riazan, on the Guslinka. Pop. 5,700.

JEHANABAD, je-han-a-bad', a town of British India, province of Bahar, 33 miles S.W. of Patna. Manf. Cotton fabrics, which are of great repute. Pop. 5,000.

JEHOAHAZ, the Elder, je-o'-a-haz, succeeded to the throne of Israel on the death of his father Jehu, B.C. 857. Like him, he fell into idolatry. He afterwards repented.

Died, 839 B.C.

JE-HO, or ZEHOL, je-ho', a town of the Chinese empire, on the frontier of Chinese Tartary, 110 miles N.E. of Pekin. It is surrounded by walls, and being in the centre of the great hunting grounds to which the emperor annually resorts, is an occasional royal residence. There are a fine palace and several temples, and the walls are upwards of 5 miles in circuit. One of the temples is very magnificent, and contains 500 gilded statues.

JEHOAHAZ, the Younger, king of Judah' was son of Josiah, and usurped the throne to the prejudice of his elder brother Eliakim, afterwards named Jehoiakim, at the age of 23. He was afterwards taken prisoner by Pharaoh-Necho, and sent in fetters to Egypt, after having reigned only three months.

Died 609 B.C.

JEHOIACHIN, or JECONIAH, 18th king of Judah, succeeded his father Jehoiakim. He was carried captive to Babylon, and kept in confinement for 36 years by Nebuchadnezzar. He was treated with kindness by Evil-Merodach, successor of Nebuchadnezzar. The manner of his death is not known.

JEHOIAKIM, je-hoi'-a-kim, elder brother of Jehoahaz, succeeded him, 610 B.C., having paid a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold to Necho as tribute. Notwithstanding the warnings of the prophet Jeremiah, he relapsed into idolatry. Nebuchadnezzar invaded Jerusalem during his reign; but although he did not dethrone Jehoiakim, he took away the golden ornaments of the temple, and carried off to Babylon as hostages a number of persons, among whom was the future prophet Daniel. After a reign of eleven years, he is supposed to have died; and, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, to have been buried "with the burial of an ass,—drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem." He was succeeded by Jehoiakin or Jeconiah.

Died 599 B.C.

JEHORAM, or JORAM, je-ho'-ram, king of Judah, succeeded his father Jehoshaphat, 889 B.C., at the age of 32. He married Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, and was an idolater and tyrant. The Edomites revolted against him, and he was also attacked by the Philistines. He died of a painful and incurable disease.

Died 885 B.C.

JEHORAM, or JORAM, king of Israel, succeeded his brother Ahaziah 896 B.C. He defeated the Moabites; but the Assyrians, under Benhadad, besieged him so closely in Samaria, that the people were reduced to the last stage of famine. In this extremity he and his subjects were saved by a miracle, as foretold by the prophet Elisha. He subsequently fell into idolatry and cruelty, was wounded in fighting against Hazael, king of Syria, and slain by his own general, Jehu.

Died 884 B.C.

JEHOSHAPHAT, je-hosh'-a-fat, king of Judah, ascended the throne at the age of 35, in succession to his father Asa, 914 B.C. During the early part of his reign his people prospered, for he was a pious prince; but having entered into an alliance with Ahab, he suffered many disasters, which were at length averted by prayer and fasting; and henceforth his reign was peaceful and happy. After a reign of 25 years he died, leaving his crown to his son Jehoram.

Died 888 B.C.

JEHOSHAPHAT, THE VALLEY OF. (See JERUSALEM.)

JEHOUM, je-room, a town of Persia, province of Fars, 85 miles S.E. of Shiraz. It is strongly fortified, and is a great mart for tobacco. A large quantity of raisins is exported to India. Pop. 1,500.

JEHU, jé-hu, tenth king of Israel, had been commander in the army of Jehoram, his king, whom he shot with an arrow, and put to death seventy of Ahab's children, and the priests of Baal in the temple of their idol. Afterwards relapsing into idolatry, he was punished by the delivery of his kingdom to Hazael, king of Syria.

Died 857 B.C.

JEISK, or EISK, geesk, a town of Russia, on the eastern shore of the Sea of Azov, 60 miles S.W. of the town of that name. It was founded as a trading port by Imperial ukase in 1848, and has rapidly risen into importance. Pop. 28,000.

JEKIL-IRMAK, or YESHIL-IRMAK, yesh'-il ir'-mak, a river of Asiatic Turkey, rising in lat. 39° 50' N., lon. 37° 40' E., and, after a course of 200 miles, having received many affluents, falling into the Black Sea on the E. side of the Bay of Samsoon. It is the ancient Iris.

JEKYL, SIR JOSEPH, je-kil, an English lawyer and patriot, who distinguished himself in the reign of William III. by his attachment to the Whigs, and was one of the managers on the trial of Dr. Sacheverel. At the accession of George I. he was knighted, made Master of the Rolls, and a privy councillor. He successfully maintained the independence of his office against Lord-Chancellor King, in a pamphlet entitled "The Judicial Authority of Master of the Rolls stated and vindicated."

Born in Northamptonshire; died 1738.

JELABUGA, jé-la-bu-ga, a town of Russia, on the right bank of the Kama, about 200 miles from Viatka. It has several churches, and near it are the ruins of a Shaman temple, where there was long a celebrated oracle. Manf. Woollens, linens, and cottons, and articles in gold and silver. Pop. 5,400.

JELALABAD, jel-a-la-bad', a town of Afghanistan, the capital of a province of the same name, 75 miles N.E. of Cabool. It is the centre of a considerable commerce, but is wretchedly built and extremely filthy. The town is memorable for the successful resistance made in 1841-2 by Sir Robert Sale, with a handful of British troops, to an Afghan army. In 1842 its fortifications were destroyed by the British when they evacuated the country. Pop. 3,000.

JELALABAD, or DOOSHAH, a town of Afghanistan, capital of the province of Seistan, 240 miles S.W. of Kandahar. It is governed by a prince, who assumes the title of king of Seistan. Pop. 10,000.

JELETZ, jel-itz', a town of Russia, 110 miles E. of Orel. It has several churches, almshouses, and schools. Manf. Soap, leather, ironware, jewellery, and bells. It is famous for its wheat-flour. Pop. 30,000.

JELL, a town of Beloochistan, 70 miles S.W. of Kelab. It is surrounded by mud walls, and is the residence of the Sindar of the Magghasis. Pop. 2,000.

JELLACHICH VON BUZIM, Baron JOSEPH, yel'-la-chik, ban, or military commander-in-chief of Croatia, was the son of an Austrian general, by whom he was sent to the military academy of Vienna, on leaving which, he entered the Austrian army as sub-lieutenant of dragoons, in 1819. Six years afterwards he was a lieutenant, and occupied his leisure with the composition of a small volume of poems, which was printed for private circulation. In 1848 the court of Vienna secretly induced the Croatians, the Dalmatians, and the Servians to attack the Hungarians, whose constitutional form of government was distasteful both to the Austrian emperor and to the more despotically ruled Servians and Croats. These latter requested that Jellachich might be appointed their ban, and this being complied with by the Austrian emperor, an army of irregular, but well-armed troops, to the number of 40,000, was assembled. Jellachich, as ban, put himself at their head, and led them across the Drave, at Zegrad, in September, 1848. In less than a month he was met by the Hungarians and defeated; but, having arranged an armistice with his opponents, he made good his retreat to Raab. Shortly afterwards he went to reinforce, with 18,000 picked troops, Prince Windischgratz, who was then besieging Vienna, which was defended by the insurgents. Subsequently he commanded the Austrian centre at the battle of Swechat, in which the Hungarians were worsted. Throughout the remainder of the campaign he fought under General Haynau's orders.

Born at Peterwardein, Austrian Slavonia, 1801; died 1859.

JELNIA, jel'-ne-a, a town of Russia, at the confluence of the Desna and Grodschanka, 45 miles S.E. of Smolensk. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 29,000.

JELUM, je'-lum, an Indian district of the Punjab. Pop. 589,373; of capital of same name, 21,107.

JEMMAPES, zhem-map', a village of Belgium, at the confluence of the Haine and Trouille, 2 miles W. of Mons. Manf. Soap; and there are several breweries and tanneries, a saltrefinery, some forges and flour-mills. Coal is extensively worked in its neighbourhood. Pop. 5,000.—Here, in 1792, the French, under Dumouriez, gained a great victory over the Austrians. After the union of Belgium with France, a department was named from this place; but, in 1815, it was formed into the present province of Hainault.

JENA, yen'-na, a town of Germany, in the grand-duchy of Saxe-Weimar, on the left bank of the Saale, at the confluence of the Leutra, 12 miles E. of Weimar. It consists of the town proper, which is walled, and four suburbs. The river is crossed by a good stone bridge. The principal public building is the ducal castle. It has also a council-house, a riding-school, several churches and hospitals, and in the vicinity is the old castle of Kirchberg, now in ruins. It is principally noted, however, for its university, which was opened in 1558, and which, towards the beginning of the present century, had for its teachers Humboldt, Fichte, Griesbach, Schiller, and Schelling—all men of great celebrity. Pop. 10,337. The neighbourhood of this town was the scene of the great battle of the 14th October, 1806, in which, by one blow, Bonaparte overthrew the Prussian monarchy.

JENIDGE-KARASU, yai-niq-kri'-a-soo, a town of European Turkey, 36 miles N.W. of Gallipoli. The best tobacco in Turkey is grown in the vicinity. Pop. 2,500.

JENISCHIUS, PAUL, je-nis'-ke-us, a learned Dutch author, who was persecuted and banished for writing a book entitled "Theatrum Animarum."

Born at Antwerp, 1558; died at Stuttgart, 1647.

JENKIN, ROBERT, jen'-kin, a learned English divine, educated at the king's school at Canterbury. In 1674 he was admitted of St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow in 1680. In 1711 he became master of his college, and Lady Margaret professor of divinity. Dr. Jenkin wrote some theological works, the best known of which is entitled, "The Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion."

Born in the Isle of Thanet, 1656; died 1727.

JENKIN, WILLIAM, a nonconformist divine, was the son of a puritan minister, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1641 he was chosen minister of Christ Church, near Newgate, London, of which he was deprived for nonconformity a year afterwards. He was sent to the Tower for being concerned in Love's plot, but was released on petitioning Cromwell. In 1684 he was committed to Newgate on the Conventicle Act, and died there four months afterwards. He wrote a great many theological works, and "An Exposition on the Epistle of Jude."

Born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1612; died in London, 1685.

JENKINS, HENRY, jen'-kins, an Englishman, remarkable for longevity, having lived to the age of 169 years. He gave evidence at the assizes to a circumstance within his recollection which occurred one hundred and forty years before, and retained his faculties to the last. In his last years he subsisted by begging.

Born in Yorkshire, 1501; died 1670.

JENKINSON, ANTHONY, jen'-kin-son, an English traveller in the 16th century, who, between the years 1546-70 travelled in Russia, and was one of the first Englishmen who penetrated into the interior of Asia, where he lived for some time with the Uzbeck Tartars. On his return, he was sent to represent Elizabeth, queen of England, at the court of the czar of Russia. His travels are included in Purchas's collection; but the truth of many of his statements has been questioned.

Died 1584.

JENKYNS, DAVID, an English judge, who commenced his university education by being admitted a commoner of Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1597. After taking his bacheler's degree he removed to Gray's Inn; and became eminent as a barrister. Charles I. appointed him a Welsh judge. In 1645 he was taken prisoner at Hereford for his activity in the royal cause, and sent to the Tower. Being brought to the bar of the House of Commons, he denied their authority, and refused to kneel; for which he was fined 1,000*l.*, and remanded to prison. In 1650 an act was passed for his trial; but Harry Martin, it is said, prevented the measure by a droll speech. Jenkyns, who expected to be hanged, declared that he would die with the Bible under one arm and Magna Charta under the other. In 1656 he obtained his liberty.

Born at Hensol, Glamorganshire, 1586; died at Cowbridge, 1667.

JENNE, or JINNE, jen, a town of the Soudan, Western Africa, on an island formed by the Niger, 285 miles S.W. of Timbuctoo. It is a place of considerable commercial importance, and in the shops may be seen printed muslins, scarlet cloth, hardware goods, and other articles of British manufacture. Pop. 9,000, all Mahometans, who allow no infidels to enter the town.

JENNER, EDWARD, M.D., jen'-ner, a celebrated English physician, the discoverer and propagator of vaccination. He was the son of a vicar in Gloucestershire, and after receiving his school education in Cirencester, was apprenticed to a surgeon at Sudbury. At the expiration of his apprenticeship he went to London, and became a student of medicine at St. George's Hospital, living for two years as pupil with the celebrated John Hunter. In 1773 he returned to Gloucestershire, and established himself as a surgeon in the village of Berkeley. In 1792, desiring to practise as physician, he obtained a degree of M.D. from the university of St. Andrew's. Many years before, while he was a surgeon's apprentice at Sudbury, Jenner was one day much struck at being told by a milkmaid that she could not take the small-pox. He made inquiries, and discovered that this was a common belief in the district. When he went to London, he mentioned the circumstance to Hunter and many other distinguished medical men, but they all regarded it as a popular error. Jenner, however, never forgot the subject, and when he set up as a surgeon in Berkeley, made several experiments. About the year 1780 he conceived the idea of propagating the cow-pox from the cow, in the first instance, and then from one person to another, and, consequently, secure to every individual so treated, immunity from small-pox. For sixteen years he followed up this grand conception, and endeavoured to enlist the sympathy and aid of the eminent practitioners of the healing art in its favour; but they only replied by ridiculing the idea as an absurdity. Jenner persevered, however, and, in 1796, had the good fortune to make an experiment which could not be gainsaid; he vaccinated a boy, eight years old, with the matter taken from a milkmaid's hand. The child recovered of the infection in a satisfactory manner, and was immediately afterwards inoculated for small-pox, without the slightest effect. Many similar experiments were subsequently made, all ending successfully; and, in 1798, Jenner put forth his first work on the discovery, "An Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ (Cow-pox)." Although the author successfully demonstrated the soundness of his views, they met with great opposition from medical men at the outset. In about a year, however, some seventy leading physicians and surgeons signed a declaration stating their entire concurrence with him. An attempt was now made to rob Jenner of the merit of his discovery; but it proved signally abortive, and henceforth fame and fortune were within reach of the retired country surgeon; but Jenner refused every offer; and as a desire to benefit his fellow-creatures, and not an ambition of worldly honours, had been his endeavour, he would not quit his native village, where he practised as a physician. The grand discovery rapidly spread over England, France, and the other continental nations, and throughout the world. The House of Commons, by way of recompensing the long and disinterested labours of Jenner, voted him, in 1802, 10,000*l.*, and 20,000*l.* in 1807. He wrote several works and papers on his discovery, on general medicine, and on natural history.

Born at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, 1749; died 1823.

JENSON, or JANSONIUS, NICHOLAS, shen'-saung, a celebrated French printer and letter-founder in the 15th century. He was the first who fixed the form and proportion of the Roman character; and his editions of books, printed between the years 1470 and 1481, are highly valued on account of the beauty of the typography.

Born 1428; died 1481.

JENYNS, SOAME, jen'-ins, an English writer, was educated at a private school, whence he was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1728, he published a poem on the Art of Dancing. He was elected member of parliament in 1741, and sat in the house till 1780. In 1755 he was appointed one of the lords of trade, which place he held till that board was abolished. His works are: "Poems;" "A Free Enquiry into the Origin of Evil;" "A View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion."

Born in London, 1704; died 1787.

JEPHSON, ROBERT, jef'-son, dramatic writer. He was an officer in the army, and many years master of the horse to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He was also for some time a member of the Irish House of Commons. His first dramatic piece, "Braganza," was read with success at Drury-lane, and printed in 1775. "The Law of Lombardy," a tragedy, was performed nine nights at Drury-lane, in 1779. "The Count Narbonne" was well received. He wrote also "The Campaign; or Love in the East Indies," an opera; "Julia: or, the Italian Lover," a tragedy; "Two Strings to your Bow," a farce; "The Conspiracy;" and "Roman Portraits," a poem in heroic verse, with historical remarks and illustrations.

Born in Ireland, 1736; died in Dublin, 1803.

JEPHTHAH, jef'-tha, one of the judges of Israel, who made a remarkable vow before he marched against the Ammonites, that if he proved victorious, he would offer to the Lord the first living thing which should come to meet him on his return. This happened to be his only daughter, whom he is said to have sacrificed to fulfil his rash vow. The history of Jephthah is contained in the book of Judges.

JEQUELCHACAN, yai-kel'-ka-kan, a town of Yucatan, North America, 30 miles N.E. of Campeachy. It is large and well-built, with a handsome church. An important market is held. Pop. 5,000.

JERAHI, je-ra'-he, a river of Persia, rising in the Bakhtiyari mountain, and flowing in a direction generally south-westerly to the Persian Gulf, which it reaches after a course of 200 miles. The lower part of the river is named the Lusbah.

JERBA, or GERBA, jer'-ba, an island in the Mediterranean, 22 miles long and 14 broad, lying on the south side of the Gulf of Cabes. It belongs to Tunis, and is separated from the mainland by a narrow channel. Manf. Shawls, linens, and woollens; and a great deal of live stock is reared. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 33° 41′ N. Lon. 11° 0′ E.

JERDAN, WILLIAM, jer'-dan, a modern English writer. He was the son of a small landowner, and his family designed him for the law; but, at his own request, he was allowed to go to London, where, in 1801, he entered a merchant's counting-house. He quitted this employment the next year, and went to Edinburgh to attend the law classes of that university; but abandoned this study in less than a year, returning once more to London, where he became embarrassed by debts, was released by his uncle, a naval officer, and taken on board his ship at Portsmouth as surgeon's clerk. While serving in this capacity, some verses of his were inserted in a Portsmouth paper; upon which he borrowed a sum of money and went to the metropolis, resolved to push his fortunes as a literary man. In 1805 he obtained an engagement on a newly-started paper,—the "Aurora;" and, some years afterwards, joined the staff of the "Sun," of which he eventually became editor. He was one of those who seized Bellingham, the murderer of Mr. Spencer Perceval, in the lobby of the House of Commons, in 1812. In 1817 he was engaged by Mr. Colburn to edit the "Literary Gazette," of which paper he was subsequently the proprietor, but ceased to have any connection with it in the year 1850. Soon afterwards, a subscription of nearly £700 was raised for him, and Lord Aberdeen granted him a pension of 100 guineas a year. Mr. Jerdan published his autobiography in 1853.

Born at Kelso, Roxburghshire, 1782.

JEREMIAH, jer-e-mi'-a, the second of the four great prophets, was the son of Hilkiah, a priest. Having predicted the miseries which should befall his country for the sins of the rulers, priests, and false prophets, he was thrown into prison. When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, Jeremiah was permitted to remain in Judæa; but Johanan, and other fugitive Jews, determining to go into Egypt, contrary to the prophet's advice, compelled him to accompany them. Some say he was slain there by his countrymen; but others assert that he died at Babylon. The style of Jeremiah is elegiac and pathetic, especially the "Lamentations."

Born at Anathoth, about 670 B.C.; died about 586 B.C.

JEREMIE, SIR JOHN, jer'-e-mie, a distinguished colonial judge and anti-slavery advocate. After receiving his education at Blundell's grammar-school at Tiverton, he returned to Guernsey, his native place, and began to study the law, which he afterwards continued at Dijon, in France. In 1815 he attracted the notice of the government, by his evidence before the royal commissioners sent to Guernsey to investigate the administration of justice in that island. In 1824 he was nominated chief justice of St. Lucia, West Indies, and, from what he observed in that office, became an energetic advocate for the abolition of slavery, and published his views in four essays on Colonial Slavery. In 1832 he was made advocate-general of the Mauritius; but his abolitionist views being known to the planters, his appointment was the signal for almost open insurrection, the colonial Assembly petitioning the governor not to allow him to land upon the island. The entire naval and military force was required to protect him when he did so, after two days' delay. So general was the discontent during his short term of office, that the governor was compelled to order his return to England. On his arrival in London, he declared his willingness to return and resume his appointment, and the government acceding, he went to the Mauritius once more, and remained, notwithstanding every opposition, till 1835. That year he was appointed puisne justice of the supreme court of Ceylon, an office he resigned to assume the governorship of Sierra Leone in 1840, in both of which countries he never ceased to labour for the amelioration of the condition of liberated negroes. He published several works against slavery.

Born at Guernsey, 1795; died at Sierra Leone, 1841.

JERICA, hai-re'-ka, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, on a hill above the left bank of the Palencia. It is an ancient place, and consists of an old and new town, the former surrounded by a wall, flanked with towers. There is a fine church, with a façade of black marble. Manf. Linen, soap, paper, and copper ware. Pop. 3,000.

JERICHO, jer'-i-ko, an ancient city of Judæa, formerly a flourishing place, and at a remote period very strongly fortified, but now a poor dirty village, perpetually exposed to be plundered by the Arabs, 18 miles N.E. of Jerusalem. It was destroyed and rebuilt by the Romans, and during the wars of the Crusades was again destroyed. It is represented by the village of Riha, which consists of nothing more than a few miserable huts. The vicinity was in Scriptural times famous for palm trees, but now there are none. Pop. 200.

JERICHOW, yer'-i-cho, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 30 miles N.E. of Madgeburg. It is the capital of a circle, and has several distilleries and mills, with a trade in cattle. Pop. 1,600.

JEROBOAM I., jer-o-bo'-am, king of Israel, was appointed by Solomon governor of Ephraim and Manasseh; but, when a prophet predicted that he would reign over ten tribes, Solomon ordered him to be arrested; on which he fled to Egypt, where he remained till the people revolted against Rehoboam, 975 B.C. Ten tribes separated from the house of David, and, forming the kingdom of Israel, chose Jeroboam for their king, who abandoned himself to idolatry. After reigning 22 years, he left his throne to Nadab, his son.

Died 943 B.C.

JEROBOAM II. was the son of Joash, king of Israel. He ascended the throne 825 B.C., and regained the countries which had been taken by the Syrians. But he was guilty of idolatry, and the prophets Hosea and Amos predicted the destruction of his family. The Assyrians defeated him at Jezreel, and carried many of his people into captivity.

Died 776 B.C.

JEROME, St., jer'-ome, the name generally given to Eusebius Hieronymus Sophronius, the son of Christian parents residing in Dalmatia. He studied the classic languages and rhetoric at Rome, where he was baptized. After some time spent in Gaul and Aquileia, he retired, in 374, to the desert of Chalcis, where he passed four years in study and meditation. In 379 he was ordained a priest at Antioch, and afterwards resided for several years at Rome. He went to Palestine in 384, and fixed his residence at Bethlehem, where a Roman lady, Paula, established four convents, in one of which, with a brief interruption, he passed the remainder of his days. He produced a Latin version of the Bible, controversial treatises, and commentaries. He is considered one of the most learned and eloquent of the fathers of the church.

Born 346; died 420.

JEROME OF PRAGUE, so called from the place of his birth, was the disciple of John Huss (see Huss), and a man of considerable learning. He studied at Prague, and afterwards at Paris, Cologne, Oxford, and Heidelberg, taking a degree in 1399. He advised King Ladislaus, of Poland, in the establishment of the university of Cracow, and was generally esteemed to be one of the most learned men of the age. He ardently exposed the doctrines of Huss, and exhibited reckless violence in denouncing the profligacy and hypocrisy of the priests. He imprisoned monks, and it is said, ordered one to be drowned in the Moldau. The council of Constance cited him to appear before it with his master; but, finding that Huss was thrown into prison, he retired to Uberlingen, where he applied for a safe-conduct, which was refused. On his journey to his own country, he was arrested, and sent to Constance in chains. After being cruelly tortured, he was consigned to the flames, which he endured with great fortitude.

Born at Prague, 1378; died 1416.

JEROME DE SANTA FÉ, a Spanish Jew, named, before his conversion to Christianity, Joshua Lorchi. He became physician to Peter de Luna, afterwards Pope Benedict XIII., in whose presence and that of many cardinals and prelates, he disputed with some learned rabbins at Tortosa, in 1414. The result of that conference, and of a treatise on the errors of the Talmud by him, is said to have been so deeply felt, that about 5,000 Jews were converted.

Lived in the 15th century.

JERROLD, Douglas, jer'-rold, a modern English novelist, dramatist, and essayist. He was son of the manager of the Sheerness theatre, and while still a boy his father obtained for him an appointment as midshipman in a ship of war. He served till the termination of the war, when, coming ashore, he was sent to London, and apprenticed to a printer. For several years, while working as a compositor, he devoted his leisure hours to the task of intellectual improvement. He acquired several languages, and the habit of expressing his thoughts in writing. Before he was twenty-one years of age, he had written his play of "Black-eyed Susan," one of the most popular of modern dramas. This first success induced Jerrold to produce a succession of original, witty, and thoroughly English plays. The best of these dramas are,—"The Rent-day," "Nell Gwynne," "The Housekeeper," and "The Prisoner of War." "Time works Wonders," and "The Bubbles of the Day," are two of his most popular comedies. As a novelist, he gave to the public—"Clovernook," "St. Giles's and St. James's," "The Man made of Money," and "The Story of a Feather." He was intimately connected with "Punch," having regularly written for it from its second number till within a year or two of his death; and nothing that ever appeared therein was more popular than the famous "Caudle Lectures" of Jerrold. In the same periodical also appeared "Punch's Letters to his Son." He started a newspaper, which was not very successful, and afterwards became the editor of a weekly newspaper, a position he retained until his death. As a conversational wit he had few equals, but there was often a spice of bitter satire in his jokes, as in his writings, which inflicted pain rather than caused pleasure.

Born in London, 1803; died 1857.

JERSEY, jer'-se, one of the Channel Islands, belonging to Great Britain, and the largest and most southerly of the group, situate about 16 miles from the coast of France, and 17 miles S.W. of Guernsey. It is 12 miles long, with a breadth of 7 at its widest part. There are numerous bays, the principal being those of St. Catharine, St. Brelade, St. Helier, St. Ouen, Granville, and Boulay. That of St. Ouen is not very safe, being open to influx of the Atlantic Ocean. The coast is surrounded by a natural barrier of rocks, which nearly encircles the whole island. The interior is generally elevated, and well-wooded, especially in the valleys. The island having been occupied as a great military depôt, various fortresses have been erected on it; viz., Elizabeth Castle, Mount Orgueil, Fort Henry, La Rocco, and several others. The coast is also defended by a chain of martello towers, and by numerous redoubts and batteries. The chief town is St. Helier.

Pro.—The soil is fertile, and sufficiently adapted for all the common crops, and also for the pasture of cattle, which is pursued to some extent. The singular mildness of the climate, however, has decided the inhabitants to attend chiefly to the produce of the orchard, and to trust, in a great measure, to their trade for a supply of grain. Wheat, barley, and potatoes are cultivated; and cows, of the Alderney breed, are reared and exported in large numbers. The fruits are of the highest flavour, and great quantities of cider, the common beverage, are made annually. Besides apples, the principal fruit, and pears, of which the chaumontelle is particularly in repute, private gardens produce peaches and apricots of great size and beauty, melons in profusion, and strawberries of superior flavour.

Area.—45 square miles.

Pop.—52,445. The native inhabitants, about 41,000, though subject to England, still speak a patois of the French language. They make their own laws, enjoy many privileges, and are free from the taxes with which the mother country is loaded. They live almost entirely by the produce of the soil, or by what they receive in exchange for it, and are almost wholly engaged in agriculture and commerce. There are generally about 13,000 British visitors and residents in Jersey, and 2,000 French.

Government.—The government consists of a court of judicature, and an ecclesiastical body, acting separately, and at the same time uniting with 12 constables and a military governor to form the Assembly of the States, the legislative body of the island, without whose approbation no law made in England is binding. The lieutenant-governor is appointed by, and in a manner represents, the crown: convokes the Assembly, and has a negative voice, which, however, is merely nominal, except where the interest of the crown is concerned. The court of judicature consists of a bailiff and a president, chosen by the crown; 12 jurats, chosen by the householders; and various officers; the clerical court, of a dean and 12 rectors, appointed by the queen in council.

Lat. 49° 13′ 54″ N. Lon. 2° 2′ 18″ W.

History.—Jersey, like the other Channel Islands, was taken possession of by the Northman Rollo previous to the invasion of Normandy. After the Norman conquest they became an appanage of the English crown, and have remained so ever since. Various attempts have been made by the French to possess themselves of this island, but without success. The most remarkable was in 1781, when they were repulsed by the brave Major Pierson, who was unfortunately killed in the action.

JERSEY, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 352 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Jerseyville.

JERSEY CITY, a town of the United States, in New Jersey, on the west bank of the Hudson river, opposite New York, with which it is connected by a steamboat ferry. It is regularly built, has about 20 churches (one of which was carefully removed from New York, and rebuilt in that city), a lyceum, a female academy, and various schools. At Jersey City are the warehouses in connexion with the Cunard and other ocean steamers, and the terminus of the New York and Philadelphia and several other important lines of railway. The Morris canal, connecting the Delaware and the Hudson, terminates here. Manf. Locomotives, machinery, crucibles, glass, pottery, starch, and rope. Pop. 120,722.

JERSEY, NEW, one of the United States of America, bounded on the N. by New York; on the S. by Delaware Bay; on the E. by the state of New York and the Atlantic Ocean; and the W. by Pennsylvania and Delaware. From north to south it is 163 miles long, with a breadth towards the north of 70, and towards the south of 75. On leaving the Pennsylvania frontier, the whole country is flat, as are also those southern parts which extend 100 miles along the sea-coast, and which are both sandy and barren. Two ranges of the Appalachian chain cross the north-western part of the state. The western branch is known as the Kittatenny ridge, and the east as the South Mountain. On the shores of the Hudson are ranges of cliffs from 200 to 500 feet high, and more than two miles wide. Among the mountains, and in the interior parts, the soil is fertile, but in other places it is almost barren, being composed of a loose sand and small rounded pebbles; and it is, in general, very inferior to the state of New York or Pennsylvania. It is, however, well cultivated.

Rivers.—The principal are the Hackensack, the Raritan, the Passaick, the Maurice, and the Muscanekunk, a branch of the Delaware.

Pro.—The hilly and mountainous parts produce wheat, rye, Indian corn, buckwheat, oats, barley, flax, and fruits of all kinds common to the climate. The orchards in many parts of the state equal any in the United States; and their cider is said to be the best in the world.

Minerals.—Iron abounds, and copper ore is found in different parts. Antimony is said to have been discovered in 1808. There are also ochres of different sorts, which are employed as paints; lead ore, black lead, native copper, loadstone, soapstone, magnesia, coal, gypsum, slate, and freestone.

Area.—8,320 square miles.

Pop.—1,131,116.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The State is divided into 21 counties. The principal towns are TRENTON, the capital; NEWARK, NEW BRUNSWICK, PATERSON, and BURLINGTON.

History.—New Jersey was settled by the Dutch from New York, about 1614. It was admitted into the Union in 1787.

JERUSALEM, je-ru'sa-lem, capital of the ancient Judæa, and the most famous city in sacred history, is situated in Syria (a portion of the Turkish empire in Asia, popularly known as Palestine, or the Holy Land), in the pashalic of Damascus, on a plateau more than 2,500 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, from which it is distant 29 miles east. The plateau consists of a series of ridges of limestone, intersected by narrow and precipitous ravines, and Jerusalem is situated on a projecting portion sloping towards the west and enclosed on three sides by ravines somewhat in the form of a horse-shoe. On the western side is the valley of Gihon, and on the south and south-east, Hinnom, meeting the valley of Jehoshaphat on the eastern side. Through the valley of Jehoshaphat, the Jerusalem side of which is lofty and precipitous, flows the brook Kedron (flowing only in the rainy season), and on the eastern side rises the Mount of Olives, overlooking the city. Another valley, the Tyropœon, divides the city into two nearly equal proportions, and a transverse valley, running nearly east and west, anciently formed four distinct hills on which the city is built—Zion, on the south-west; Acra, on the north-west; Moriah, on the south-east, and Bezetha, on the north-east. The valleys have now been nearly filled up by accumulations of ruins, and but little inequality of the surface is observable. The city is surrounded by an embattled wall, about 2½ miles in circumference, built by Sultan Soliman in the 16th century. When Jerusalem was at the height of its glory as the capital of the Jewish kingdom, its limits were greatly extended to the north and west of the four hills. Nearly in the centre of the eastern wall, on the edge of the valley of Jehoshaphat, is Stephen's gate, or "gate of the tribes," leading to the brook Kedron, and across it to the Mount of Olives; about the centre of the northern wall is the Gate of Damascus, or "gate of the pillar;" on the western side is Bethlehem, or Jaffa Gate; and on the southern side, near the south-western angle of the wall, Zion Gate. There are three other entrances or gates. Near Bethlehem Gate is a citadel very strongly fortified, known as David's Tower, or the Tower of Hippicus. On the eastern side, occupying the summit of Mount Moriah, is a rectangular enclosure, equal in extent to about one-eighth of the entire city, known as Haram (El Haram esh Sherif, "the noble sanctuary.") It is surrounded on all sides by a lofty wall, a considerable portion of which is that of the city. In the enclosure is the splendid mosque of Omar, an octagonal structure, with four porticoes and a lofty dome, occupying an elevated position near the centre of the area, and surrounded by a beautiful lawn, planted with cypress and other trees. Previous to 1857, no Christian was permitted to enter the mosque, but it is now open to all comers, on payment of a small fee. The mosque occupies a portion of the site of the great temple built by Solomon, some of the massive foundations of which are supposed to exist. Near it is the Seraiyah, or official residence of the Turkish pashas, on the site of the Tower of Antonia, where Pilate held his court, and whence Jesus was led to execution. Within the Haram enclosure, in the southern part, is the mosque El Aksa, a magnificent structure, probably at one time a Christian church. On the opposite side of the city, on the brow of Mount Acra, is the church of the Holy Sepulchre, a large structure in the Byzantine style, built by the empress Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, in the early part of the 4th century, and believed to enclose the very grave in which the Saviour lay, and to mark the scenes of his crucifixion and resurrection. The supposed "holy sepulchre" is under a ceiling, superbly decorated with gold, silver, and beautiful marble, and of oblong form, 15 feet wide by 10 feet long; is immediately under the dome of the church, and is surrounded by a circular hall with various oratories. In the church are chapels for Greek, Latin, and Armenian christians, the church being maintained by the Turkish authorities as a neutral place for the benefit of Christians of different denominations. Previous to this arrangement there were frequent unseemly and even sanguinary disputes, which ultimately led to the interference of Russia and partly originated the great war of 1854. The priests also show the stone on which, it is alleged, the Lord's body was embalmed, and a splendidly adorned structure on an elevated site supposed to mark the exact spot where the cross was erected. The roof of the church of the Holy Sepulchre was destroyed by fire in 1808; the cupola was restored and surmounted by a gilt cross by the Czar of Russia in 1868. The Greek and Coptic convents are near the church. The Latin convent, farther to the west, is a large and massive structure, with courts and garden, and here European visitors generally take up their abode. The Armenian convent, which can afford accommodation for 1,000 pilgrims, is situated near the angle formed by the junction of the west and south walls on Mount Zion. Near the spot, on Mount Zion, is the palace of Herod. The modern city is divided into quarters, separated by gates. The Turkish inhabitants occupy the north-east, the Christians the elevated ground on the north-west (where are the English church and cemetery), the Armenians the south-west, and the Jews the south-east. The streets are narrow, dirty, and unlighted. The Turkish quarter is the cleanest, with better roads and houses and ornamental gardens, and the principal Frank merchants and the English and Austrian consuls reside there. In the Jewish quarter which is the most squalid part of the whole town, a large synagogue for Polish Jews has recently been erected, in the Saracenic style. The Protestant bishop's house is near the south, or Zion gate. The city is supplied with water from Solomon's Pool (some remains of the splendid aqueduct constructed by King Solomon remain), and from huge cisterns. The street leading from the eastern or Stephen's Gate is named the Via Dolorosa, or "way of sorrow" (Turkish, "Harát el Albam"), and is believed to have been the road traversed by Jesus on his way from the hall of judgment to Calvary. A road crossing the city in the centre, from the citadel on the west to Mount Moriah on the east, bears the names of David and Temple streets, and a road dividing the city longitudinally is named in the north part, Damascus street, and in the southern, Zion street. Other streets are named Sepulchre and Patriarch. A Russian cathedral and other buildings are on an adjacent height to the north-west of the valley of Gihon. Outside the wall, in the valley of Hinnom, is a row of neat almshouses, built by Sir Moses Montefiore, for poor Jews.

Places Mentioned in Scripture.—The Pool of Bethesda is outside the north-eastern angle of the Haram enclosure, near St. Stephen's Gate—it is now known as Birket Israil; the Pool of Siloam is on the slope of Ophel, the hill overlooking the eastern side of the Tyropœon valley. The pools of Gihon are in the Gihon valley, the Turkish cemetery (a desolate place) being near the upper pool. Immediately to the south of Mount Zion is a lofty mosque, supposed to mark the site of the tomb of David. On the Mount of Olives, nearly opposite Stephen's Gate, is the garden of Gethsemane, and a little farther south, the pillar of Absalom and the tombs of Jehoshaphat, St. James, and Zacharias, and to the south-east "the tombs of the prophets." The Aceldama, or "field of blood," is on the Hill of Evil Counsel, at the south-eastern angle of the valley of Hinnom. The "wailing-place" of the Jews, the nearest point at which they are permitted by the Turkish authorities to approach the site of the Temple and mourn over the fallen fortunes of their city, is outside the south-western angle of the enclosure of the Haram, where the masonry of the wall is of great antiquity. A little to the north of Gethsemane are the church and tomb of the Virgin, but in this, as in some other instances, the authenticity of the site is doubtful, resting only on the tradition of the monks. BETHLEHEM, the birthplace of the Saviour, is about six miles to the south of the city; and BETHANY is a village on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives.

Pop.—16,000, of whom about 5,000 are Mahomedans, 3,500 Latin and Greek Christians, 200 Protestants, and 7,000 Jews. About 3,000 pilgrims visit the city annually.

History.—Jerusalem is supposed by some Biblical scholars to be identical with the Salem of Melchisedek; but the first authentic fact is that it belonged to the Jebusites, who, after its conquest by the Israelites, still retained a castle or fortified eminence, from which they were not expelled till the reign of David. That monarch made it the capital of his kingdom. Solomon, on succeeding to the throne, not only protected, but enlarged it, surrounded it with stronger walls, and adorned the interior with that temple the splendour of which was so much admired in the ancient world. It was taken in 599 B.C., by Nebuchadnezzar, who put an end to the kingdom, carried King Jehoiachim captive to Babylon, and established Zedekiah as his viceroy. That prince, however, making an attempt to re-establish the independence of his country, Jerusalem was again taken, and was then razed to the ground, the temple demolished, and all the inhabitants carried into captivity. After the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, the Jews were permitted to return to their country, and to rebuild their temple, and Jerusalem soon resumed its former splendour. After the conquest of Persia by Alexander, and after his empire had fallen to pieces, it was surprised and plundered by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Subsequently, it was exposed to a long series of attacks from the kings of Syria, who were, however, after many obstinate conflicts, bravely repelled by the Maccabees. Afterwards, the Romans conquered Judæa, but did not interfere with the religious rites, or even the municipal government of the Jews, when Jesus Christ appeared and suffered at Jerusalem. During the reign of Nero, the Jews rebelled against the tyranny of the procounsuls, and the city was finally reduced, after a long siege, by Titus. It was burnt, and the inhabitants sold into slavery. In the reign of Adrian it was razed to the ground, and on its ruins a Roman town was erected, called Ælia Capitolina. This name remained till, by the conversion of Constantine, Christianity became the ruling religion of the Roman empire. Jerusalem then resumed its original name, and was held as an object of pious veneration. As the empire became more generally Christian, Jerusalem continued to increase in veneration. In 1076 it fell into the hands of the Saracens and Turks, who committed such outrages on the Christian pilgrims visiting the city, that the country was invaded by the crusaders, and Jerusalem taken in 1099, by the army under Godfrey of Bouillon, who, in reward for his valour, was created king of Jerusalem. That city, with the surrounding territory, was ruled, during upwards of 60 years, by five Latin kings, when it yielded to the arms of Saladin. After changing successively its Moslem masters, it was annexed, in 1517, to the Turkish empire, of which it has ever since formed a part. It is now under the control of a Turkish pasha. In 1841 a Protestant bishopric was established, the presentation to which is made alternately by England and Prussia.

JERVAS, CHARLES, jer'-vas, an English portrait painter, who studied for a short time under Sir Godfrey Kneller. By the generosity of a friend he was enabled to continue his studies at Paris and Rome. On his return, he obtained considerable employment, more, perhaps, from the friendship of Pope and other celebrated men than from his own merit.

Born in Ireland, 1675; died 1739.

JERVIS, JOHN, earl of St. Vincent. (See ST. VINCENT.)

JESI, or IESI, e-a'-se, a town of Italy, on the Ensino, 14 miles S.W. of Ancona. It is a bishop's see, and has a cathedral, five churches, and several convents. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics. Pop. 19,231.

JESSEN, yes'-sen, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 53 miles N.E. of Mersburg, on the Black Elster. Manf. Linen. There is a fishery. Pop. 2,500.

JESSNITZ, yes'-nitz, a town of the duchy of Anholt-Dessau, Germany, on the right bank of the Mulde, 10 miles S.E. of Dessau. The old town is entered by two gates, and there are two suburbs. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth. Pop. 3,400.

JESSO. (See YESSO.)

JESSORE, jes'-sor, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, situate about the centre of the delta of the Ganges. It is fertile in the S., though mostly composed of salt marshes or islands, producing abundance of rice. The other parts are covered with jungle, and are, in many places, still in an unredeemed state of nature. Pro. Rice, indigo, salt, pepper, tobacco, sugar, and rum. Area, 5,528 square miles. Pop. 1,577,249.

JESSORE, a town of British India, capital of the above district, 77 miles N.E. of Calcutta. There is a large school in which instruction is given in English, Persian, and Bengalese. Pop. 8,200. Lat. 23° 10′ N. Lon. 89° 10′ E.

JESSULMERE, or JAYSULMEER, jes-sul'-meer', the most western state of Rajpootana, India, protected by the British. The country is poor and sterile. Area, 12,252 square miles. Pop. 108,143.

JESSULMERE, a fortified city, capital of the above state. There are several Brahminical and Jaina temples. Pop. 35,000. Lat. 26° 56′ N. Lon. 70° 58′ E.

JESTYN AP GWRGANT, jes'-tin, prince of Glamorgan, who was rejected by his countrymen as their sovereign, on the death of his father, in 1030, in consequence of his violent temper, his uncle Howel being chosen in his stead; but, on the death of the latter, in 1043, he succeeded him. Having made war on Rhys ap Tudor, a neighbouring prince, he sent Einion, his ally, to invite the English to his assistance, who defeated Rhys; but Jestyn refusing to give his daughter to Einion, as he had promised, he applied to the English, who turned their arms against Jestyn, and obliged him to quit his dominions, which they divided among themselves.

Lived in the 11th century.

JESUA, LEVITA, chai-soo'-a, a Spanish rabbi, who wrote a curious book called "Halichot Olam; or, the Ways of Eternity."

Lived in the 15th century.

JESUS, je'-sus, in Hebrew Jehoshua, "Saviour," which sometimes appears in the contracted form, Joshua, or Jeshua. This name has been borne by nine different persons mentioned in the Holy Scriptures, where they are distinguished from each other by the names of their father being affixed.

JESUS CHRIST, je'-sus kriste, the founder of the Christian religion, the Saviour of the world, and Son of God. The title Christ signifies "the Anointed."

JESUS, ISLE OF, an island of Canada, formed by the junction of the Prairie and St. John rivers, two branches of the Ottawa, 8 miles N.W. of Montreal. It is 23 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Fertile and well cultivated, producing grain and fruit. It has also some excellent pasture-lands.

JETHRO, jeth'-ro, surnamed Raguel, king and priest of the Midianites, who received Moses into his family when he fled from Egypt, and gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage. When Moses had delivered the Israelites from their bondage, Jethro met him, and delivered him his wife and children. (See MOSES.)

JEVER, yai'-ver, a town of Germany, in the grand-duchy of Oldenburg, 32 miles N.W. of Oldenburg. It is surrounded by walls, and has a castle, a Roman Catholic, and a Protestant church. Manf. Tobacco and leather. There is a trade in cattle. Pop. 4,000.

JEWALA-MUKI, je-wa'-la-moo'-ke, a town in the Punjab, 10 miles N.W. of Nadaun. The name signifies "mouth of flame," and is derived from a jet of natural gas kept constantly burning in a temple of Siva, which attracts many pilgrims. Pop. 3,000.

JEWEL, JOHN, joo'-el, English bishop. In the reign of Edward VI. he avowed the Protestant religion, and became an admired preacher; but, in the succeeding reign, his doctrines brought him into imminent danger. Finding that Bishop Bonner was devising means to apprehend him, he went abroad, and resided with Peter Martyr at Strasburg, and afterwards at Zurich. On the death of Mary, he returned home, and was appointed one of the sixteen Protestant divines to dispute with as many Romanists before Queen Elizabeth. In 1559 he was preferred to the bishopric of Salisbury, and, in 1565, received the degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford. His conduct as a bishop was exemplary, and he paid great attention to the work of reformation in his diocese. His application to study was so intense as to lay the foundation of an illness, which ultimately proved fatal. His learning and abilities were celebrated over Europe, by his admirable "Apology for the Church of England," which was attacked by his countryman and schoolfellow, Thomas Harding, and defended by the author. His works were collected into one volume folio, and deemed of so much importance as to be placed in churches for the edification of the people.

Born at Berryn Arbor, Devonshire, 1522; died at Monkton Farleigh, 1571.

JEWS, juze, a celebrated people, known also by the names of Hebrews and Israelites. The word Hebrew, derived from Heber, an ancestor of Abraham, is the most ancient. After the time of Jacob, it was replaced by the word Israelite, from Israel, a surname of Jacob. The term Jew, derived from Judæus, dates from the captivity in Babylon. The Jewish people assign their origin to Abraham, whom they designate the father of their race. After Abraham, Isaac, his son, became their chief; then Jacob, or Israel, the son of Isaac. After his death the people were divided into 12 tribes, or families. Saul was the first king of Israel, chosen 1080 B.C. In 975 B.C. ten of the tribes revolted and formed the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam. The remaining two tribes retained the national capital and temple, forming the kingdom of Judah under Rehoboam, son of Solomon. After 19 kings had reigned, the kingdom of Israel was invaded by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, and the mass of the people were carried away captives. In 586 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar stormed Jerusalem, and the great mass of the population were taken to Babylon as prisoners, where they remained for seventy years. Of the ten tribes of Israel carried away by Shalmaneser, no authentic trace remains. The fate of the "lost tribes of Israel" constitutes one of the great problems of history. The Scripture history of the Jews ends in the 5th century B.C. It is probably continued in the apocryphal book of Maccabees. In the 1st century B.C., the Roman legions obtained possession of Jerusalem, and HEROD was appointed a tributary king. After the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, the Jewish people were scattered over the world, and have never been reunited.

JEYPOOR, or JYEPOOR, ji-poor', a state of Rajpootana, British India, under British protection. Area, 15,251 square miles. Pop. 2,534,357.

JEYPOOR, capital of the above state. It is said to be among the best-built towns of Hindostan, and contains a splendid palace, and temples of larger dimensions than any in the upper part of that country, and built in the purest style of Indian architecture. There are an observatory and an English and oriental school. Pop. 142,578. Lat. 26° 56′ N. Lon. 75° 55′ E.

JEZEBEL, jez'-e-bel, a Jewish queen, noted for her impious life. She was daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon, and wife of Ahab, king of Israel. She turned her husband from the worship of the true God, established temples to the idol Baal, and caused a large number of prophets and holy persons to be put to death. Jehu, on gaining the throne, flung her from the windows of her own palace, which killed her, the dogs devouring her, as had been foretold.

Lived in 9th century B.C.

JEZID I., je'-zid, the fifth caliph, or successor of Mahomet, and the second of the race of Ommiades, began his reign in 680. The Arabs, in the second year of his reign, elected Hussein, son of Ali, to the caliphate; but Jezid caused him to be assassinated. He also persecuted the whole house of Ali, and put a number of persons to death. Jezid, though a cruel tyrant, had a taste for poetry, and wrote some amatory verses of merit.

Died 683.

JEZIERZANY, yai'-zeer-za-ne, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, 12 miles S.E. of Czorlkow. There is an old castle. Pop. 2,500.

JEZUPOL, yai'-zoo-pol, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, 4 miles N. of Stanislau. There is a Dominican monastery. There are no traces of the old castle, which sustained frequent sieges by the Tartars. Pop. 2,700.

JHALAWAN, ja-la-wan', a province of Beloochistan. It is mountainous, and generally unfertile. It is thinly peopled, and the inhabitants are mostly engaged in pastoral pursuits. Area, 20,000 square miles. Pop. 30,000. Lat. between 26° and 29° N. Lon. between 65° and 67° 30′ E.

JHALRA PATUN, jal'-ra-pa-toon, a town of Kolah, India, 90 miles E. of Neemuch. It is well built and handsome, with large temples. Considerable trade is carried on.

JHANSI, jan'-se, one of the North-western provinces of British India. Area, 5,109 square miles. Pop. 1,000,457.

JHANSI, a fortified town of Bundelcund, British India, capital of the above province, 120 miles S.E. of Agra. It carries on a considerable trade. In the great mutiny of 1857, the Europeans were massacred by the native garrison. Pop. of town, 26,772; of district of same name, 333,227.

JHEEND, jeend, a town of India, capital of a small native state of the same name, 70 miles N.E. of Delhi. It is a large place, with a palace and good bazaar.

JHELUM. (See JELUM.)

JHUJUR, a native state of India. The surface is generally at an elevation of about 800 feet above the sea level, and is drained into the Jumna. Area, 1,230 square miles. Pop. 111,000. Lat. between 27° 55′ and 28° 55′ N. Lon. between 75° 55′ and 76° 58′ E. The capital is of the same name.

JIDDA, JEDDA, or DJIDDAH, jid'-da, a considerable commercial haven of Arabia, on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, in the province of Hedjaz, 60 miles W. of Mecca, of which it is the port. It is situate in a barren sandy district, destitute of water. The streets are very narrow; the entrance to the road is full of shoals, and it is dangerous to attempt going in without a pilot. The landing-place is in front of the vizier's palace, which stands close to the sea; the custom-house, likewise, faces the sea, and is a lofty handsome building. It is the most important trading place in Arabia, and the imports are very large. Pop. estimated at about 15,000; but, with the suburbs, about 40,000. The inhabitants are fierce and fanatical, and, in 1858, massacred a large number of the Christian population. Lat. 21° 28′ 18″ N. Lon. 39° 13′ E.

JIGAGOUNGGAR ji-ga-goong'-gar, or "fortress of the white town," a very large town of Tibet, on the right bank of the Yarou-Dzanbo. Pop. supposed to be about 80,000. Lat. 28° 59′ N. Lon. 91° 28′ E.

JIJELI, or DJIGELLI, je-je'-le, a fortified, maritime town of Algeria, 50 miles N.W. of Constantine. There is regular steam-boat communication with Algiers. Pop. 2,000.

JIJONA, he-ho'-na, a city of Spain, province of Alicante, 15 miles N. of the town of that name. It is situated on a hill, surmounted by the remains of a Moorish castle. Pop. 4,800, chiefly engaged in agricultural and pastoral pursuits.

JIKADZE, or SHIGATZE, zhe-gad'-ze, a town of Tibet, near the right bank of the Yarou-Dzanbo, 160 miles S.W. of Lassa. Pop. 100,000.

JIMENA, or XIMENA (DE-LA-FRONTERA), he-mai'-na fron-tai'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Cadiz, and 46 miles E. of the city of that name. It has two parish churches, several chapels, a prison, cemetery, and various schools. Manf. Linen, hats, soap, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 6,000.

JITOMIR, or ZYTOMIR, zit-o-mir', a town of Russia, and the capital of the government of Volhynia, on the Toterev, an affluent of the Dnieper. It is the see of both a Greek and a Roman Catholic bishop. Manf. Woollen, cloth, iron, and glass. There is a trade in leather, tallow, wax, and honey, and two annual fairs are held. Pop. 54,827.

JIZDRA, jiz'-dra, a town of Russia, and the capital of a circle, 80 miles from Kaluga. Pop. 2,000.

JOA, jo'-a, a large town of the Punjab, India, 110 miles N.W. of Lahore.

JOAB, jo'-ab, the general of David, king of Israel, who distinguished himself equally by his valour and his cruelties. He treacherously slew Abner the general, and stabbed Absalom the son of David. That monarch, in consideration of his services, did not punish him; but Solomon put him to death for taking part with Adonijah.

Died B.C. 1014.

JOACHIM, jo'-a-kim, a celebrated Italian monk, surnamed the Prophet. He went barefoot on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and, on his return, entered into the order of Cistercians. He became abbot of Fiore, in Calabria, founded several monasteries, which he governed with discretion. He wrote many predictions, which were printed in a book entitled "The Everlasting Gospel." His followers pretended that miracles were wrought at his tomb, and applied to the pope to canonize him; but this was rejected, on account of some supposed errors in his works.

Born at Celico, near Cosenza, 1130; died 1202.

JOACHIM, GEORGE, a mathematician, otherwise named Rheticus. He obtained the mathematical chair at Wittenberg, where he zealously espoused and defended the astronomical system of Copernicus. He was the author of several astronomical works.

Born 1514; died 1576.

JOACHIM, king of Naples. (See MURAT.)

JOACHIMSTHAL, yo-a-kim'-stal, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, among the Erzgebirge mountains, near the frontier of Saxony, 70 miles N.W. of Prague. There are valuable silver and lead, iron and tin mines in the vicinity. Pop. 5,700.

JOAN OF ARC, or JEANNE D'ARC, the Maid of Orleans, joan, a celebrated French heroine, whose parents were simple peasants in the village of Domremy, department of Vosges, France. At the age of 13 she was the subject of strong religious impressions, believing that she received special spiritual communications, and two years afterwards she imagined that St. Michael, the tutelary angel of France, had commanded her to raise the siege of Orleans, then closely pressed by the English, under the duke of Bedford. Her pretended visions made a great noise, and she was introduced to Charles VII., whom she is said to have discovered amidst his courtiers, though he was dressed like them. She promised to relieve Orleans, and to procure the coronation of Charles at Rheims. Her offers were accepted, though the parliament treated her as an impostor. Clad in armour, she headed the troops, who were animated by her professions and example. The siege of Orleans was raised, after which she marched to Rheims, and assisted at the coronation of the king, who ennobled her family, to which he gave the name of Du Sys, with large grants of land. Joan, after heading a sortie, was taken prisoner at the siege of Compiegne, by the English, who, to their disgrace, tried and condemned her for sorcery, and sentenced her to be burned, which sentence was carried out at Rouen in 1431. So much is related in popular histories; but recent researches have tended to throw considerable doubt upon the narrative, and documents found in the archives of Metz and Orleans furnish strong evidence that the story of the execution is a fiction, and that she was married about six years after the date of her supposed death to Robert des Armoise, a French knight, and she subsequently received a gift from the Council of Orleans as a recognition of her services. The story of Joan of Arc's life has furnished a theme to many writers. A large work, called the "History of Joan of Arc," in four volumes, was published in Paris in 1817. Schiller composed a tragedy, Casimir Delavigne a touching elegy, Southey a fine poem on her life and death; Voltaire, with bad taste, wrote a burlesque and immoral poem, "La Pucelle," on the heroine.

Born at Domremy, 1410.

JOAN, "the fair maid of Kent," daughter of Edmund, earl of Kent, brother of Edward II., wife of Edward the Black Prince.

Died 1385.

JOAN, POPE, a woman who is supposed, on very slight authority, to have filled the Papal chair in the 9th century. There are several versions of the story. In one it is said that about the middle of the 9th century, a woman named Joan, born at Mentz (but of English parentage), and who had long worn men's clothing, obtained so great a reputation as a doctor, as to be elected to the papal chair on the death of Leo. IV. It is further stated, that having become pregnant, she was taken in labour, as she was going in procession, between the Colosseum and the church of St. Clement, and died in the street. The whole of this story, however, is now abandoned as fabulous by Catholics as well as Protestants. David Blondel, in particular, published, in 1649, an able refutation of it, in a work called "Familiar explanation of the Question, Was a Woman seated on the Papal throne, between Leo IV. and Benedict III.?"

JOANNA I., queen of Naples, was the daughter of King Robert of Naples. At the age of 16 she assumed the government, being at the time married to her cousin Andreas, of Hungary. She was a very handsome and accomplished young woman; but she evinced little sympathy with her husband's taste and temper. She allowed a number of conspirators, who were all nobles of the court, to murder Andreas, in 1343. Soon after this event she married her relative, prince Louis of Tarentum; whereupon Louis of Hungary, brother of Andreas, marched with an army to avenge his brother's death. Joan's troops were worsted, and the queen fled to Avignon, where she appeared before Pope Clement VI., and protested her innocence of her husband's murder. The pope and his cardinals acquitted her; and Joan, out of gratitude, presented the pontiff with the see and county of Avignon. A pestilence breaking out soon after at Naples, Louis and his Hungarians fled; upon which Joan returned to her capital, where she and her husband were crowned in 1351. Up to the death of her second husband, which took place in 1362, Joan reigned in peace over her subjects. In the same year she married the prince of Majorca, who died in 1376; after this she married her fourth husband, Otho, duke of Brunswick. Having no issue by any of these matrimonial unions, the queen gave her niece Margaret in marriage to Charles, duke of Durazzo, whom she further nominated to be her successor. A schism, between Clement VII. and Urban VI., breaking out soon after, Joan embraced the cause of the former; whereupon Urban excommunicated her, and proclaimed Charles Durazzo king. Charles, ungrateful to his benefactress, marched against, defeated, and took her prisoner. After vainly endeavouring to induce Joan to abdicate in his favour, he shut her up in the castle of Muro. Joan, notwithstanding, would not accede; but named Louis of Anjou, brother of Charles V., king of France, as her successor on the throne of Naples. Shortly afterwards, Charles caused her to be smothered in her prison.

Born 1327; died 1382.

JOANNA II., queen of Naples, was daughter of Charles Durazzo, and sister of Ladislaus, whom she succeeded in 1414, being, at the time, 44 years of age, and notorious for her scandalous life, which became still more open and disgraceful after her gaining the crown. She married James, count de la Marche, who, however, was soon compelled to retire from the court, proceeding, it is stated, to France, where he took a religious habit and died. A succession of paramours next divided the throne with this weak and wicked queen; murders, court intrigues, and barefaced profligacy reigning supreme at the court. At her death, her kingdom was left in a most miserable condition.

Born 1370; died 1435.

JOANNA, JOHANNA, or ANJOUAN. (See COMORO ISLES.)

JOANNINA. (See JANINA.)

JOAO-DA-PESQUEIRA, jo'-a-o-da-pas'-ka-e-ra, a town of Portugal, province of Beira, near the left bank of the Douro, where the navigation is interrupted by a cataract, 53 miles E. of Oporto. Pop. 2,700.

JOAO-D'EL-REI (SAO), dal-rai', a town of Brazil, province of Minas-Geraes, on both sides of the united stream of the Tijuco and Barreiro, which is crossed by two fine bridges, and lined by stone wharfs. The streets are regularly laid out, and the town is generally well built. There are several handsome and highly decorated churches, a large hospital, a college, and other good buildings. A large trade is carried on in coffee, cotton, and hides. In the neighbourhood gold, iron, and other metals are abundant. Pop. 4,000.

JOAO-DO-PRINCIPE, or JOAO-MARCOS, SAO, do-preen-se-pai, a town of Brazil, province of Rio Janeiro. There is a considerable trade in coffee. Pop. 4,000.

JOASH, or JEHOASH, jo'-ash, king of Judah, succeeded his father Ahaziah, having escaped by means of his aunt Jehosheba, the fury of his grandmother Athaliah, who slew all the other princes of her family. At the age of seven, Jehoiada, the high priest, caused him to be proclaimed king, Athaliah being put to death. During the life of the high priest, the king governed well; but afterwards fell into idolatry, and put to the torture Zachariah, son of his benefactor. Hazael, king of Syria, invaded Judah and defeated Joash, who shortly afterwards was slain by his own domestics.

Born 771 B.C.; died 738 B.C.

JOASH, or JEHOASH, the son of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, succeeded his father, 841 B.C. He apostatized to idolatry, but paid great respect to the prophet Elisha during his last illness. He defeated the Syrians in three battles, and recovered several cities from them. He also defeated and made prisoner Amaziah, king of Judah, and took the city of Jerusalem.

Died 825 B.C.

JOB, jobe, a patriarch, was said to have been born in the "land of Uz," between Idumea and Arabia. His history makes the subject of a beautiful book in the sacred canon, and is doubtless the most ancient poem in the world. He is therein distinguished for his unshaken integrity under the severest trials, after which he was restored to wealth and honour. It is impossible to fix, with any degree of accuracy, the date of the book.

JOBAT, LOUIS, zho'-ba, a French Jesuit, remarkable for his knowledge of ancient coins and medals, upon which subject he wrote an elaborate treatise, printed in 1739.

Born 1647; died 1719.

JOBIÉ, jo-be', an island of the Indian Archipelago, situate at the entrance of the Great Bay, on the N. side of the island of Papua. It is 90 miles long, with a breadth varying between 12 and 28, mountainous, and covered with wood. The coast is so high and steep, and so destitute of openings, that there is not a single creek or cove sufficiently large to receive a ship. Lat. (west point), 1° 34' S. Lon. 135° 21' E.

JOCASTA, jo-kas'-ta, in classic legend, wife of Laius, king of Thebes, and mother of Œdipus, whom she afterwards married, not knowing him to be her son. After bearing him four children, and discovering that she had been guilty of incest, she hung herself in despair.

JOCJOCARTA. (See DJOKJOKARTA.)

JODAR, cho'-dar, a town of Spain, in the province of Jaen, 24 miles from the town of Jaen. It has an old castle, now in ruins. Manf. Soap, esparto fabrics, and earthenware. Pop. 4,000.

JO DAVIESS, jo-da-vees', a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 27,528. The capital is Galena.

JODE, PIETER DE, shode, a celebrated engraver of Antwerp. He was instructed in his art by Golzius, after which he studied in France and Italy. His engraving of Cousins' "Last Judgment" occupied twelve sheets, altogether about 16 feet square.

Born 1570; died at Antwerp, 1634.

JODE, PIETER DE, junior, was taught his art by the above, his father. He excelled him in some respects, and many of his prints, after portraits by Vandyck and Rubens, are regarded as very valuable by connoisseurs.

Born at Antwerp, 1606.

JODELLE, ETIENNE, zho'-del, lord of Lymodin, a French poet. He was the first who wrote tragedies on the Greek model in the French language; but one of them was so long, that it occupied ten mornings in its representation. He also wrote sonnets, elegies, odes, and tragedies.

Born at Paris, 1532; died 1573.

JODOIGNE, zho'-doin, a village of Belgium, province of South Brabant, near the confluence of St. Jean, 24 miles S.E. of Brussels. Manf. Soap, salt, oil; and there are several breweries and distilleries. It also has a trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 4,000.

JOECHER, CHRISTIAN THEOPHILUS, zhe(r)'-ker, an erudite German lexicographer. He first studied medicine, but subsequently applied himself to theology and the art of oratory, and delivered courses of lectures on rhetoric between 1715 and 1720. He afterwards filled the chair of philosophy and of history at the university of Leipsic, and became, in 1742, librarian of the same institution. His principal work is the "Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon" (Universal Dictionary of Learned Men), which contained upwards of 60,000 names, and was published in 4 vols. at Leipsic, in 1750. This dictionary has since been re-edited and enlarged on several occasions.

Born at Leipsic, 1694; died 1758.

JOEL, jo'-el, the second of the twelve minor prophets. His prophecy, written in a vehement style, regards chiefly the desolation of Judea by the Chaldeans.

Lived in the 9th century B.C.

JOFFREDY, GEOFFROI, or JOUFFROY, JEAN DE, Cardinal, zhoof'-froi, a dignitary of the Romish church. At an early age he entered upon religious vocation, and rapidly rose to the highest posts in his church. On the accession of Louis XI. to the throne of France, in 1461, he was bishop of Arras; but, desiring to obtain a cardinal's hat, Pope Pius II., who was anxious to procure the abolition of the "Pragmatic Sanction," promised him the cardinalship if he could induce Louis to repeal that act. He accomplished this task, and obtained the bishopric of Alby, and was created cardinal in recompense for so doing. He also filled many high political posts under Louis XI.

Born at Franche-Comté, 1412; died 1473.

JOHANN-GEORGEN-STADT, a town of Saxony, in the circle Zwickau, 60 miles S.W. of Dresden, situate in the centre of a district rich in metallic ores. Manf. Lace, needles, tobacco, and vitriol. Pop. 4,000.—This place takes its name from the elector Johann George I., who built it as an asylum for the Protestants, who, in 1654, were expelled from Bohemia by Ferdinand III.

JOHANNISBERG, yo-han'-nis-bairg, a village of Nassau, on an eminence above the right bank of the Rhine, 12 miles S.W. of Mainz. There is a castle belonging to Prince Metternich. It is famed for producing the best Rhenish wine, called Johannisberg. Pop. 900.

JOHANNISBURG, yo-han'-nis-boorg, a town of Prussia, province East Prussia, 68 miles S.W. of Gumbinnen. It stands near Lake Rosch, or Warschau, and is the seat of a law court and several public offices. Pop. 2,800.

JOHANNOT, TONY, a French artist and designer of book-engravings. He also painted many superior pictures. His designs upon wood were marked by great skill, refinement, and fancy, and were all in correct drawing.

Born at Offenbach, 1803; died 1852.

JOHN, THE BAPTIST, son of Zacharias, Jewish priest, and Elisabeth, the cousin of the Virgin Mary. He was the forerunner of Christ, "The voice crying in the wilderness," administering "the baptism of repentance." He was imprisoned, and ultimately beheaded by order of Herod.

Died 31.

JOHN, apostle and evangelist, son of Zebedee, a fisherman. After Pentecost, he preached the gospel in Jerusalem and Samaria, and afterwards at Ephesus. He was driven by persecution to take refuge on the island of Patmos, where he experienced the visions of the Apocalypse. He subsequently returned to Ephesus, where he lived to a great age, and is supposed to have been the only one of the apostles who died a natural death. He is distinguished in the New Testament as "the disciple whom Jesus loved."

Died, probably, 95.

JOHN, the name of several kings and princes of Europe:

ENGLAND.

JOHN, surnamed Sansterre, or Lackland, was the fifth and youngest son of Henry II. He succeeded his brother Richard I. on the throne in 1199, and deprived his nephew Arthur (son of his elder brother Geoffrey) of the throne, to which he was heir, and confined him in prison at Rouen, where he was murdered. The French Court of Peers demanded justice of Philip Augustus of France, against the murderer, who was condemned to lose all his lands in that country. The pope also excommunicated him, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. He for some time resisted the papal authority, but in 1213 made his submission. The English barons invited over Louis, the son of Philip, and crowned him at London, in 1216; but he did not continue long in England. John signed the great charter, confirming the national liberties, commonly called Magna Charta, in 1215; his signature being extorted from him by the barons.

Born at Oxford, 1166; died at Newark, 1216.

FRANCE.

JOHN I., king of France and Navarre, was the posthumous son of Louis X. At his birth he was proclaimed king, but died when only a few days old, upon which the crown devolved upon his uncle, Philippe V.

Died 1316.

JOHN II., surnamed the Good, succeeded his father, Philip of Valois, in 1350. He obtained a victory over the English in 1355; but, the year following, he was defeated and taken prisoner at Poitiers, by Edward the Black Prince, who sent him to London, where he remained till the peace of Bretigny, in 1360. His ransom was three million crowns of gold and eight provinces; but, before the sum could be raised, John died suddenly in the Savoy in London, aged 45. He was a prince of great courage and virtue.

Born 1309; died 1364.

PORTUGAL.

JOHN I., king of Portugal, was the natural son of Peter, and, in 1383, ascended the throne, to the prejudice of Beatrice, daughter of Ferdinand I., his brother. John I., king of Castile, the husband of that princess, disputed the crown, but was defeated at the battle of Aljubarota, in 1385. He then turned his arms against the Moors of Africa, and took Ceuta and other places.

Born 1357; died 1433.

JOHN II., succeeded his father, Alphonsus V., in 1481. He discovered several plots that were formed against him at the beginning of his reign, and put the principal conspirators to death. He gained some places in Africa, and distinguished himself in the battle of Toro, against the Castilians, in 1476. His acts procured him the titles of the Great and the Severe. He encouraged navigation; and it was during his reign that Bartholomew Diaz sailed round the Cape of Good Hope; he also despatched settlements to India.

Born 1455; died 1495.

JOHN III. succeeded his father Emanuel on the throne of Portugal in 1521. He greatly encouraged navigation, commerce, and the arts. His navigators discovered Japan; and he sent Francis Xavier to India as a missionary. During his reign a terrible earthquake occurred at Lisbon, by which 30,000 persons perished.

Born 1502; died 1557.

JOHN IV., called the Fortunate. The Spaniards had rendered themselves masters of Portugal in 1580, and kept possession of it till 1640, when the Portuguese revolted, and placed the crown on the head of the Duke of Braganza, John IV., who held it till his death.

Born 1604; died 1656.

JOHN V., successor of Peter II., was crowned king of Portugal in 1706. He entered into an alliance with Charles of Austria, who laid claim to the crown of Spain, and fought against Louis XIV.

Born 1689; died 1750.

JOHN VI., second son of Peter III., was appointed regent when his mother, Maria I., lost her reason, in 1799. In 1817 he was driven by the French from Portugal; whereupon he took up his residence in Brazil, with the title of emperor. On the death of his mother, in 1816, he was proclaimed king, but did not return to Portugal till 1821.

Born 1769; died 1826.

CASTILE, ARAGON, AND NAVARRE.

JOHN I., king of Castile and Leon, succeeded his father, Henry II., in 1379, at the age of 21 years. He made war in Portugal, for the purpose of placing his son on the throne of that country, but was unsuccessful. He was surnamed "Father of his country," for his generous and just rule of his kingdom.

Born 1358; died 1390.

JOHN II., king of Castile and Leon, was son of Henry III., and was proclaimed king when less than two years of age, his uncle Ferdinand being appointed regent. He made war successfully against the kingdoms of Aragon and Navarre, and the Moors of Grenada. He greatly assisted in the restoration of Spanish literature, and was father of the celebrated Isabella and of Henrique IV.

Born 1405; died 1454.

JOHN I., king of Aragon, succeeded his father, Peter IV., in 1387. Throughout his reign he was continually at hostilities with his subjects, whom he governed with great injustice and severity.

Died 1395.

JOHN II., king of Aragon and Navarre, was son of Ferdinand the Just, and ascended the throne of Navarre on marrying Blanche, daughter of Charles the Noble, in 1425, and that of Aragon in 1458, after the death of Alphonsus, his brother. He was for a long time at war with his son Don Carlos, to whom Blanche, his mother, had left the crown of Navarre at her death, in 1441.

Died 1479.

JOHN I., king of Navarre. (See JOHN I., king of France.)

JOHN II., king of Navarre. (See JOHN II., king of Aragon.)

JOHN III., king of Navarre, married, in 1484, Catherine of Navarre, the heiress to the crown, and through this marriage he obtained the crown of that kingdom in 1494; but being a prince without any energy, lost all his possessions with the exception of Bearn. He died in France, leaving a son, Henry II., titular king of Navarre, whose daughter, Jeanne d'Albret, was mother of Henry IV. of France.

Died 1516.

BOHEMIA.

JOHN, king of Bohemia, the son of the emperor Henry VII., was elected to the throne in 1310, at the age of 15. He was a warlike prince, and, after defeating the Lithuanians, assumed the title of king of Poland. He lost an eye in that expedition, and a Jew doctor, who pretended to restore him to sight, deprived him of the other. His military spirit, however, continued unabated, and he accompanied Philip of France to the battle of Cressy, where he was guided between two brave knights, each holding his bridle. He fell in that action, and was buried at Luxembourg. He was succeeded in his kingdom of Bohemia by one of his sons, who became emperor under the title of Charles IV.

Died 1346.

POLAND.

JOHN I., king of Poland, was the second son of Casimir IV., whom he succeeded in 1492. He was the friend of letters and of peace, and during his reign there were few military events of importance. He was succeeded by his son Alexander, grand-duke of Lithuania.

Born 1459; died 1501.

JOHN II., or JOHN CASIMIR, succeeded his brother Ladislas, in 1648. He abdicated in 1668, and returned to France, where he became a monk.

Born 1609; died 1672.

JOHN III., JOHN SOBIESKI, king of Poland, was youngest son of James Sobieski, governor of Cracow, and educated at Paris. In 1665 he was made grand marshal and general of the Polish armies, after which he was appointed master of the royal horse, and prelate of Cracovia. He took several cities from the rebellious Cossacks of the Ukraine, and distinguished himself in many gallant actions. In 1673 he gained the memorable battle of Choczim, upon the Niester, in which the Turks lost 28,000 men. The year following he was elected king of Poland, on the death of Michael, and likewise compelled the Turks to sue for peace. In 1683 he forced them to raise the siege of Vienna, which otherwise would inevitably have been taken.

Born 1620; died at Warsaw, 1696.

SWEDEN.

JOHN I., king of Sweden, was son of Swerker, and successor of Eric X. He organized, with small success, an expedition into Esthonia, for the propagation of Christianity in that country. He was the last of the royal race of Swerker.

Died 1223.

JOHN II., king of Sweden and Denmark, succeeded to the crown, 1483.

Died 1513.

JOHN III., king of Sweden, was son of Gustavus Wasa. He dethroned his brother, Eric XIV., in 1568, on account of his tyranny and cruelties. He terminated the war against Denmark that had been commenced under the previous reign, and endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to banish Lutheranism from his dominions, between the years 1570 and 1580. He afterwards made war against Joan Vasilivitch, and gained over him many advantages, but signed a peace in 1583. He named Sigismund, his son, king of Poland, in 1587.

Born 1537; died 1592.

JOHN I., king of Denmark and Sweden, succeeded, on the throne of Denmark, Christian I., his father, in 1481, dividing the duchy of Holstein with Frederick, his brother. He became king of Sweden in 1483; but the Swedes revolted against him in 1501.

Born 1455; died 1513.

BULGARIA.

JOHN I., or JOANICE, king of Bulgaria, usurped the throne to the prejudice of his brother's son. The emperor Baudouin having refused the alliance of John, he marched against, defeated, and took him prisoner at Adrianople. Baudouin was shut up at Ternora, where he shortly afterwards died. He subsequently turned his arms against Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, and king of Thessalonica; but was compelled to beat a retreat. He again resorted to arms on the death of Boniface, in 1207, and had almost reached Thessalonica, when he was assassinated by one of his generals.

Died 1207.

DUKES OF BRITTANY.

JOHN I., duke of Brittany, reigned between the years 1237 and 1286.

Born 1217; died 1286.

JOHN II. was successor of the above, and ruled from 1286 to 1305.

Born 1239; died 1305.

JOHN III., called "The Good," reigned from 1312 till 1341. Being without issue, he nominated, to the prejudice of his own brother, John de Montfort, Charles de Blois, to whom he gave his niece in marriage; an act which led to many sanguinary conflicts.

Born 1286; died 1341.

JOHN IV., more commonly known as John de Montfort, was brother of the preceding. He had already secured from his rival, Charles de Blois, the greates. p-t of Brittany, when the Court of Peers of France adju ged the duchy to his rival, Charles in 1341. John surrendered to the duke of Normandy, whom Philippe de Valois had sent against him at the head of an army. He was confined for four years at the Louvre. At the end of that time he contrived to make his escape, and rejoined Joan of Flanders, his wife, who had continued the war with heroic courage. He, however, died a few months afterwards, leaving Brittany under the rule of Charles.

Died 1345.

JOHN V., surnamed "The Valiant," termed John IV. by those who exclude John de Montfort from the dukes of Brittany. He was son of the preceding, and brought up at the court of Edward III. of England, whose daughter he married. He attacked Charles de Blois, who had dispossessed his father of the duchy of Brittany, and defeated him at Auray, in 1364; whereupon Charles acknowledged him to be the rightful duke.

Born 1338; died 1399.

JOHN VI. was son of the above, and attained his majority in 1414, being then only 14 years of age. He assisted the English in their expeditions against the French king, and, in return, Charles VII. aided his rival, the duke de Penthièvre, who, in 1419, drew John into an ambuscade, and kept him prisoner for five years, when he was released by his barons. Inconstant and feeble, he allied in turns with Charles VII. and with Henry IV. of England, who, at that period, was master of almost the whole of France.

Born 1389; died 1442.

BURGUNDY.

JOHN, Duke of Burgundy and Count of Nevere, succeeded his father in 1404, at the age of 33. The houses of Burgundy and Orleans at that period disputed the government of France, during the insanity of Charles VI. In 1407 he caused the assassination of the Duke of Orleans, and, by that act, became absolute master in Paris; but it was also the commencement of the fearful internal struggle between the Burgundians and the Armagnacs. He was driven from Paris, but re-entered it in 1418, committed many horrible massacres, possessed himself of the king's person, usurped all authority, and favoured, by the troubles he excited, the conquests of the English in France. He was invited by the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII., to a conference on the Pont de Montereau, and there assassinated by a favourite of Charles, in revenge for the assassination of the duke of Orleans.

Born 1371; died 1419.

POPES.

JOHN I., ST., Pope, was a native of Tuscany, and ascended the papal chair on the death of Hormisdas, in 523. Theodoric king of the Goths, a violent Arian, threw him into prison at Ravenna, where he died.

Died 526.

JOHN II. (Mercurius) was a Roman, and succeeded Boniface II. in 533. He opposed the Eutychians and Nestorians.

Died 535.

JOHN III. (Catelinus), a Roman, succeeded Pelagius I. in 560.

Died 573.

JOHN IV., a native of Dalmatia, was elected to succeed Severinus in 640.

Died 642.

JOHN V. was a native of Syria, and ascended the papal throne, in succession to Benedict II., 685.

Died 686.

JOHN VI., a Greek, succeeded Sergius I. in 701. He held a council at Rome, to consider the charges by the English clergy against Wilfred, archbishop of York, who was acquitted.

Died 705.

JOHN VII. was also a Greek, and succeeded the above.

Died 708.

JOHN VIII., a Roman, was elected to the pontificate on the death of Adrian II., in 872. He crowned the emperor "Charles the Bald" in 875, and, three years after, went to France, where he held a council at Troyes. In his time Italy was ravaged by the Saracens, who obliged the pope to pay tribute. He corresponded with Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, who had driven Ignatius from his seat and usurped the dignity. John, imposed upon by the pretences of the intruder, acknowledged him patriarch; but, on discovering his error, he excommunicated him. This pope has been styled the Ninth by those who profess to believe in the existence of Pope Joan, whom they call John VIII. (See JOAN, POPE.)

Died 882.

JOHN IX. became pope in 898.

Died about 900.

JOHN X., archbishop of Ravenna, was elected to the papacy in 914. He was a turbulent prelate, and defeated the Saracens, who had desolated Italy a long time; but he was himself driven from Rome by Guy, duke of Tuscany, who was supported by the Roman people. He was afterwards put to death.

Died 928.

JOHN XI. was made pope at the age of 25, in 931, through the influence of his mother Marozia, wife of Guy, duke of Tuscany; but his brother Alberico afterwards threw both him and her into the castle of St. Angelo, where John died.

Died 936.

JOHN XII. (Octavianus), a Roman of noble birth, was elected pope in 956, and was the first who changed his name on that occasion. At that time Berenger tyrannized over Italy, and the pope implored the assistance of the emperor Otho I., who delivered the country. John crowned Otho at Rome, and promised him fidelity, which, however, was of short duration, for he united with the son of Berenger against his deliverer. Otho returned to Rome in 963, and called a council, in which the pope was accused of adultery, sacrilege, and other crimes, which being proved, he was deposed. On the departure of the emperor, John entered Rome, and exercised dreadful cruelties on his enemies. He was assassinated by a man whose bed he had violated.

Died 964.

JOHN XIII. was elected pope in 965, through the instrumentality of the emperor Otho, against the will of the Roman people. Peter, prefect of Rome, drove him thence in 966; but the emperor restored him, and Peter became an exile in his turn.

Died 972.

JOHN XIV., bishop of Pavia, and chancellor to the emperor Otho II., obtained the papal chair after Benedict VII., in 983; but three months after his election he was sent to the castle of St. Angelo by the usurper, Pope Boniface, and was poisoned.

Died 984.

JOHN XV. died a few days after his election.

Died 985.

JOHN XVI. succeeded the preceding.
Died 996.

JOHN XVII. (Philagathus) was a Calabrian; and nominated to the papal chair by Crescentius, the Roman consul, in 997. Otho III., however, went to Rome, and put to death Crescentius, and imprisoned John.

JOHN XVIII. (Secco) was elected pope in succession to Sylvester II., in 1003, but four months after his election died.
Died 1003.

JOHN XIX. (Fasio) succeeded the above.
Died about 1009.

JOHN XX. (Romano), son of Count Gregory of Tuscany, became pope after his brother Benedict, in 1024.
Died 1033.

JOHN XXI. was a Portuguese, and the son of a physician. He became pope in 1276, but died eight months after his election. Some works of his on philosophy, medicine, and divinity, are extant.
Died 1277.

JOHN XXII. (Jacques de Cohors), was elected pope at Lyons in 1316. In the combat for the imperial crown, he sided with Frederick of Austria, and excommunicated Louis of Bavaria, and afterwards Frederick of Sicily. In 1327 Louis of Bavaria went to Italy, was crowned at Milan, advanced to Rome, expelled the papal legate, and was crowned emperor in the church of St. Peter. He then formally deposed John (who was at Avignon, and never visited Rome), but this audacious act had little effect. When Louis returned to Germany, the papal legate resumed his authority. John accumulated a large amount in the papal treasury, and was the author of that portion of the canon law known as "The Extravagantes."
Died at Avignon, 1334.

JOHN XXIII. (Baldassare Cossa), a Neapolitan, studied at Bologna, and became chamberlain to Boniface IX., who made him cardinal. He was elected pope in 1410, after the death of Alexander V., during the great schism, and promised to renounce the pontificate if Gregory XII. and Peter de Luna would drop their pretensions. Not fulfilling his engagements, he was deposed by the council of Constance, in 1415, and imprisoned at Heidelberg, where he remained three years, and was then released at the request of Martin V.
Died 1419.

EMPERORS OF THE EAST.

JOHN I., surnamed Zimisces, emperor of Constantinople, was of an illustrious family. He stabbed the emperor Nicephorus Phocas, in 969, and obtained many victories over the Russians, Bulgarians, and Saracens. He was poisoned by Basil the Eunuch.
Born 925; died 976.

JOHN II. (Comnenus) succeeded Alexis Comnenus, his father, in 1118. He gained several battles over the Turks and Servians, and governed with great prudence and liberality. He died of a wound which he received from a poisoned arrow.
Born 1088; died 1143.

JOHN III. (Ducas) was crowned at Nicea, in 1222, at the time when the Latins were in possession of Constantinople. He was a prince of great virtue, gained many battles, defeated the Scythians, Tartars, and Bulgarians, and extended his empire on all sides.
Born 1193; died 1255.

JOHN IV. (Lascaris), son of Theodore the Young, whom he succeeded in 1259, at the age of six years; but, in the same year, the despot Michael Palæologus deprived him of his crown and his eyes, and imprisoned him for life.
Born 1253; died 1284.

JOHN V. (Palæologus) succeeded his father, Andronicus the Younger, in 1341, but his throne was for a long period usurped by John Cantacuzenus, whose daughter he married, after recovering his throne. His son Andronicus revolted against him, and the Genoese made themselves masters of the isle of Lesbos, and Amurath I. took the city of Adrianople.
Died 1391.

JOHN VI. (Cantacuzenus) was the minister and favourite of Andronicus Palæologus, who made him guardian of his children John and Emanuel, with whose mother, Jane of Savoy, he governed for some time with great wisdom and moderation. But, in 1345, he assumed the imperial title in Thrace, and, in 1347, took Constantinople, compelling John Palæologus, who had been crowned in 1341, and who had married his daughter, to retire to Salonica. The exiled monarch, however, with the help of the Genoese, defeated the fleet of the usurper, and obliged him to quit his throne and capital. He then retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he devoted himself to literary studies, and wrote a valuable history of the empire, and a defence of Christianity against the Mohammedans.
Born 1311.

JOHN VII. (Palæologus) succeeded his father Emanuel, in 1425. His reign was very unfortunate, and the Turks made such progress in his dominions, as to reduce him to the necessity of imploring the succour of the Latins. He consented to a union between the two churches, which was performed at the council of Ferrara, in 1439, at which John assisted in person.
Died 1448.

JOHN, secretary to the emperor Honorius, usurped the empire of the West on the death of his master, in 423, and overran Italy, Gaul, and Spain. Valentinian III., to whom the throne belonged, attacked him, at the head of a large army, and defeated him; he was afterwards taken by treason at Ravenna, where he was put to death.
Died 425.

JOHN, surnamed Philoponus, "the lover of study," a learned grammarian of Alexandria, in the 7th century. It is said he was appointed conservator of the celebrated Alexandrian library, and he retained the post till Omar ordered the destruction of the whole by fire. He wrote a treatise on the creation of the world, and edited several of Aristotle's works.
Died about 660.

JOHN OF AUSTRIA, DON, natural son of the emperor Charles V., was brought up without the knowledge of his birth till his father, on his death-bed, had revealed the secret to his son Philip II., king of Spain, who caused him to be brought to his court, and publicly acknowledged him as his brother. In 1570 he was sent into Grenada against the Moors, where he terminated the war with great glory. The year following, he was appointed by the Christian princes commander of the fleet against the Turks, and gained the celebrated battle of Lepanto, where the Turks lost 30,000 men and 200 vessels. In 1573 he took Tunis, and in 1576 was made governor of the Low Countries, then in a state of revolt. After taking Namur, Charlemont, and Marienburg, he was vigorously opposed by the archduke Matthias and the prince of Orange. He, however, gained a great battle at Gembloux, in 1578, and died the same year, as is supposed, of poison. Shortly before his death, he conceived the project of delivering and marrying Mary Queen of Scots. Casimir Delavigne, the celebrated French author, has written a beautiful play on the incidents of Don John's early career.

Born at Ratisbon, 1545; died 1578.

JOHN OF BOLOGNA, a French sculptor, who went in early youth to Rome, for the purpose of studying the great masters' works. Having presented to Michael Angelo a statue, finished with all the care of which he was capable, the latter destroyed it, saying that he should learn to carve before he finished. This caused John to work with redoubled ardour, and soon he became one of the best sculptors in Italy. He took up his residence at Bologna, and there executed a great number of statues, one of the most celebrated of which is the group, "Rape of the Sabines," exhibited at Florence. The bronze horse in the statue of Henry IV., on the Pont Neuf, at Paris, is also his work.

Born at Douai, 1524; died 1608.

JOHN OF BRUGES. (See EYCK, JOHN.)

JOHN OF GAUNT, or GHENT, duke of Lancaster, was the third son of Edward III., king of England. He took for his second wife, Constance, a natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, and, on the death of that monarch, he laid claim to the throne, in right of his wife, in opposition to Henry of Transtamare, but without success. He served with great glory in France, with his brother the Black Prince, and, on his death, had the management of affairs during the life of his father. On the accession of Richard II., he retired; but the envy of the courtiers, particularly the ecclesiastics, who hated him for protecting Wickliffe, followed him with false accusations of a design to usurp the throne, from which he satisfactorily cleared himself. In 1386 his only daughter was married to the heir-apparent of the king of Castile, and John renounced his claim to that crown, in consideration of a considerable sum and a pension. He took for his third wife, Catherine Swynford, sister to the wife of his friend Chaucer the poet. John of Gaunt was a man of great valour, prudence, and generosity. His son afterwards became king, by the title of Henry IV.

Born at Ghent, 1340; died 1399.

JOHN OF LEYDEN. (See BOCCOLD.)

JOHN OF NEPOMUK, ne-po'-muk, a saint and martyr of the Roman church. He was a canon of the cathedral and vicar-general of the diocese of Prague. He was appointed confessor to Sophia, queen of Wenceslaus IV. of Bohemia, and the king, being jealous, commanded him to reveal the nature of her confessions. He refused, and taking the opportunity of John, as vicar-general, having confirmed the election of an abbot in opposition to the king's wishes, he put him to torture on the rack, and then ordered his body to be thrown into the Moldau. It was afterwards recovered, and buried with great honour. He was afterwards canonized as a saint of the Roman Catholic Church.

Died 1393.

JOHN OF PARIS, a learned professor of theology in the 13th century. In the dispute between Pope Boniface VIII. and Philip the Fair, king of France, he took the part of the latter, and defended his cause with zeal and ability. He also started objections to the doctrine of transubstantiation, for which he was cited to Rome.

Died 1304.

JOHN OF SALISBURY, a learned English monk of the 12th century, who became bishop of Chartres, in France, about 1164. He studied at Oxford, but also visited Paris, where he attended the lectures of Abelard. He likewise went to Italy, and, at Rome, lived some time under the patronage of Pope Adrian IV. On his return to England, he became secretary to Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, whom he accompanied in his exile to France. After the tragical death of à Becket, he became bishop of Chartres. In learning he is said to have had no living superior, and wrote several valuable works on theology, politics, and philosophy.

Born at Salisbury, about 1119; died at Chartres, 1182.

JOHN OF SWABIA, known also (but incorrectly) as "John the Parricide," or the son of Rudolf II. of Austria. He conspired against his uncle, Albert I., and with others attacked and murdered him as he was riding alone, near the castle of Hapsburg. He then fled to Italy, where he led a wandering life, and died in obscurity.

Born 1289.

JOHN, ST., a village and fort in Canada, on the Richelieu river, 20 miles from Montreal.

JOHN, ST., a lake of Lower Canada, 120 miles from Quebec. It has a diameter of about 30 miles, and receives several rivers. It abounds with excellent fish.

JOHN, ST., a bay and island on the west coast of the island of Newfoundland.

JOHN, ST., a city and seaport of the dominion of Canada, and capital of the province of New Brunswick. It stands on a rocky peninsula at the mouth of the river St. John, and is regularly laid out and well built. The principal buildings are of brick, and consist of various places of worship, a marine hospital, barracks, government store-houses, a gaol, and different schools. The harbour is commodious and safe, and never obstructed by ice. It is defended by a battery on Partridge Island. On its W. side stands Carlton, a town included in the municipality. The fisheries are important. A considerable trade is carried on, and the principal exports are fish, timber, lime, and furs. Pop. 26,127. Lat. 45° 14′ N. Lon. 66° 3′ W. This town was founded by American loyalists, in the last century, and has frequently suffered severely by fire.

JOHN, ST., a river of British North America, rising in the United States, and flowing through Canada for about 200 miles in a north-easterly direction, enters New Brunswick, where it forms a cataract, and takes a south-easterly course, falling into the Bay of Fundy by an estuary five miles wide. The whole length of the course is about 400 miles. The principal affluents are the Matamaski, Tobique, Aroostook, Salmon, Washadamoak, and Kenebekasis.

JOHN, ST., a river of Florida, United States, rising in a marsh, and, after a northern and eastern course of 250 miles, falling into the Atlantic. It is navigable by small craft for 150 miles.

JOHN, ST., a lake in the province of Quebec, Canada, 120 miles N. of Quebec. It is about 20 miles in diameter, and abounds in excellent fish.

JOHN'S, ST., a town of British North America, the capital of the island of Newfoundland. It stands at the extremity of a peninsula, on the east coast, on a bay of the same name, and has a good harbour. Though irregularly built, it contains many good shops and stores. A new cathedral was built from the designs of the late Sir G. Scott, and there are several other Protestant churches and chapels. The Roman Catholic cathedral is an imposing edifice. The Colonial Buildings, or Parliament House, and the Government House are the finest buildings in the town. There are also in the town a custom-house, market-house, several literary and scientific institutions, and three cemeteries. The harbour is good, although narrow at the entrance. Cod-fish is the principal article of export; in exchange for which it imports goods and wares of every description. Besides the fisheries, sealing gives occupation to many of the inhabitants. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 47° 33′ N. Lon. 52° 43′ W.—This town has suffered severely at different times from fire:—In February, 1816, and November, 1817. On the 21st of the same month, another fire broke out, which consumed the greater part of the western half of the town, that had escaped the previous conflagration. It was again visited by fire on the 21st August, 1818, by which great loss was sustained; and also in 1846.

JOHN'S, ST., one of the Virgin Islands, West Indies. It is 12 miles long, by 4 broad. The bay affords good anchorage. Pop. 2,600. Lat. 18° 18′ N. Lon. 64° 49′ W.

JOHN'S, ST. (See ANTIGUA.)

JOHNSBURG, ST., the capital of Caledonia, county Vermont, United States, on the right bank of the Passumpsic, 37 miles N.E. of Montpellier. Manf. Iron and machinery. Pop. 3,500.

JOHNSON, ANDREW, 17th president of the United States. He was a poor lad, and served an apprenticeship to a tailor. Having received no education, he taught himself to read, and at the age of 20 was elected alderman of his native village, and two years afterwards mayor. In 1835 and again in 1839 he was elected to the North Carolina state legislature, and in 1841 to the state senate. In 1843 he was chosen for the Congress of the United States; in 1853 appointed governor of Tennessee, and in 1862 military governor of the same state. He was elected vice-president with President Lincoln, in 1864, and, on the assassination of the president in 1865, succeeded to the presidency. Although thoroughly constitutional and moderate in political principles, he was indiscreet in manner and in his speech, and was involved in several difficulties with Congress. In 1868 he was impeached by the senate, but acquitted. His term of office expired in 1869, and he retired into comparative obscurity.

Born at Raleigh, North Carolina, 1808; died 1875.

JOHNSON, THOMAS, jon'-son, a learned Englishman, who for some time was engaged at Eton, and afterwards set up a school at Brentwood. He produced editions of Sophocles and other ancient authors.

Born about 1675; died about 1750.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a learned English critic, lexicographer, and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a bookseller at Lichfield. When a little child, he was taken by his mother to be "touched" by Queen Anne, as he was suffering from scrofula, or "king's evil, in conformity with the ancient superstition that the monarch possessed a miraculous power of healing. He retained throughout life a recollection of the queen as "a stately lady dressed in black." His education was commenced at the free school of Lichfield, and in 1728 he was admitted of Pembroke College, Oxford; but, being too poor to remain at the university, he, in 1731, quitted it without a degree. He soon afterwards lost his father, who left him in such poor circumstances that he sought the post of usher of a school at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, where, however, he did not continue long. He next resided with a printer at Birmingham, where he translated Lobo's account of Abyssinia. In 1735 he married Mrs. Porter, a widow lady of that town, who was possessed of the sum of £800; and with this capital he the same year opened a school at Edial, near Lichfield; but he obtained only three scholars, one of whom was David Garrick. About this time he began his tragedy of "Irene." In 1737 he set out for the metropolis, accompanied by Garrick. On fixing his residence in London he became a literary hack to Cave, the publisher of the "Gentleman's Magazine," for which work he wrote during several years, his principal employment being an account of the parliamentary debates, which were really imaginary, as no reporters were then allowed in the house, and he was compelled to substitute fictitious but easily recognisable names for those of the speakers. At this period he contracted an intimacy with Richard Savage, and in his company endured some hard trials of poverty. In 1748 he originated the famous Literary Club, which first met in Ivy-lane, Paternoster-row, and afterwards in Soho. In 1749 appeared his "Vanity of Human Wishes," an imitation of Juvenal's tenth Satire. Two years previously he had printed proposals for an edition of Shakspeare, and the plan of his English Dictionary, addressed to Lord Chesterfield. The price agreed upon between himself and the booksellers for the last work was £1,575. In 1749 Garrick produced his friend's tragedy, "Irene," upon the stage of Drury Lane Theatre, but it was unsuccessful. In 1750 he commenced his "Rambler," a periodical paper, which was continued till 1752. In this work only five papers were the production of other writers. About the period of his relinquishing the "Rambler," he lost his wife, a circumstance which greatly affected him, as appears from his "Meditations," and the sermon which he wrote on her death. In 1754 he visited Oxford. The next year appeared his Dictionary, which, instead of three, occupied eight years. Lord Chesterfield endeavoured to assist it by writing two papers in its favour in the "World;" but, as he had hitherto neglected the author, Johnson treated him with contempt. The publication of his great work did not relieve him from his embarrassments, for the price of his labour had been consumed in the progress of its compilation, and in the year following he was arrested for five guineas, from which he was released by Richardson, the printer. In 1758 he began the "Idler," which was published in a weekly newspaper. On the death of his mother, in 1759, he wrote the romance of "Rasselas," to defray the expenses of her funeral, and to pay her debts. In 1762 George III. granted him a pension of £300 per annum. In 1763, Boswell, his future biographer, was introduced to him, a circumstance to which we owe the most minute account of a man's conversation and character that has ever been written. In 1773 he went on a tour with Mr. Boswell to the western islands of Scotland, of which journey he shortly afterwards published an account, which occasioned a difference between him and Macpherson, relative to the poems of Ossian. In 1775 the university of Oxford sent him the degree of LL.D., which diploma, ten years before, had been conferred on him by the university of Dublin. In 1779 he began his "Lives of the English Poets," which was the last of his literary labours. After a long illness, during part of which he had fearful apprehensions of death, his mind became calm, composed, and resigned, and he died full of that faith which he had so vigorously defended and inculcated by his writings. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, and a statue, with an appropriate inscription, has been erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral. In his later years he exercised a great influence on the literature of his time, but his pompous, antethetical, and inflexible style was soon superseded in public estimation by the vigour and elegance of more natural writers. In his person he was large, robust, and unwieldy; in his dress he was singular and slovenly; in conversation positive, and impatient of contradiction. But with all his singularities he had an excellent heart, full of tenderness and compassion, and his actions were the result of principle. He was a stout advocate for truth, and a zealous champion for the Christian religion as professed in the Church of England. In politics he was a tory, and at one period of his life a friend to the house of Stuart. He had a noble independence of mind, and would never stoop to any man, however exalted, or disguise his sentiments to flatter another.

Born at Lichfield, 1709; died in London, 1784.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, an English divine, who was educated at St. Paul's School, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1670 he obtained the living of Corringham, in Essex, but resided in London, where he made himself conspicuous in opposing the succession of the duke of York, afterwards James II., and the measures of the court. Having written a book against the doctrine of passive obedience, under the title of "Julian the Apostate," in which the duke was attacked, he was condemned to pay a fine of five hundred marks. When the army was encamped on Hounslow Heath, he published a remonstrance to the soldiers in behalf of the Protestant religion, for which he was sentenced to stand twice in the pillory, to pay a heavy fine, to be degraded from his function, and whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. This sentence was rigorously inflicted, but at the Revolution the parliament declared the proceedings illegal. He was also rewarded with a pension, and was offered the deanery of Durham, which he considered as inadequate to his merits.

Born in Warwickshire, 1649; died 1703.

JOHNSON, JOHN, a learned divine, was educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Corpus Christi College. Archbishop Sancroft gave him two livings in Kent, and Archbishop Tenison presented him to that of Margate. He had also the vicarage of Cranbrook. He was twice chosen proctor in convocation for the diocese of Canterbury. On the accession of George I. he refused to take the oaths, but afterwards submitted. He wrote—"The Clergyman's Vade Mecum;" "A Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, &c.;" "The unbloody Sacrifice and Altar unveiled and supported;" "A Paraphrase on the Psalms in the Liturgy."

Born near Rochester, 1662; died 1725.

JOHNSON, THOMAS, an English botanist. He became an apothecary in London, and, according to Wood, was the best herbalist of his age. He wrote the first local catalogue of plants published in England. But his great work was an improved edition of Gerard's "Herbal." In the civil wars he entered the royalist army, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.D. At the siege of Basing House he received a wound of which he died. Besides the above, he wrote a treatise on the hot springs of Bath, and other pieces.

Born at Selby, Yorkshire; died 1644.

JOHNSON, SIR WILLIAM, British general and colonial officer. In 1738 he established himself on a tract of land on the Mohawk river, North America, and made himself so popular with the Indians of the Mohawk tribe that they adopted him as sachem, or chief. In 1746 he was appointed commissary of New York for Indian affairs, and was very active in the war against the French. In 1748 he was placed in command of all the New York colonial troops for the defence of the frontier, and greatly distinguished himself. He defeated Dieskau at Fort George, and was thanked by Parliament for his conduct, voted £5,000, and created a baronet. In 1759 he captured Fort Niagara from the French, and was present at the surrender of Canada to the British in 1760. He received a grant from the king of 100,000 acres of land, north of the Mohawk. He founded a village, and gave great attention to agriculture, introducing fine breeds of cattle and horses. In 1740 he had married a German lady, who died young, leaving three children; but he had many mistresses, whites and Indian, and no fewer than 100 illegitimate children. His death was caused by over exertion at an Indian council.

Born at Warrentown, county Down, Ireland, 1715; died 1768.

JOHNSON, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 11,565. The capital is Clarksville.

JOHNSON, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 5,000. Wrightsville is the capital.

JOHNSON, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 486 square miles. Pop. 13,500. The capital is Vienna.

JOHNSON, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 19,000. The capital is Franklin.

JOHNSON, a county of Nebraska Territory, United States. Area, 375 square miles. Pop. 7,500. The capital is Tecumseh.

JOHNSON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 8,000. The capital is Taylorsville.

JOHNSON, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 594 square miles. Pop. 17,911. The capital is Cleburn.

JOHNSTON, ALEXANDER KEITH, jon'-ston, an eminent modern geographer. His first studies were directed towards fitting him for the pursuit of medicine; but a strong predilection for design caused him to become apprentice to an engraver. From early youth he was an attentive student of geography, and, in 1843, he produced his first great geographical work, "The National Atlas." In 1848 appeared his "Physical Atlas," a splendid work. He was soon afterwards made honorary member of the Geographical Societies of Paris and Berlin. He was likewise elected fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. The "Dictionary of Geography" was his next work. In addition to the above great works, he produced an "Atlas of the Historical Geography of Europe;" a smaller "Physical Atlas;" a number of educational works on classical, general, and physical geography; an "Astronomical Atlas," assisted by Mr. Hind; and with Sir R. Murchison and Professor Nicol, a "Geographical Map of Europe."

Born at Kirkhill, in Midlothian, 1804; died 1871.

JOHNSTON, ARTHUR, an eminent physician, educated at the university of Aberdeen, but took his doctor's degree at Padua, in 1610. In 1637 he published a translation of David's Psalms into Latin verse, dedicated to Archbishop Laud, who procured him the appointment of physician to Charles I.

Born near Aberdeen, 1587; died at Oxford, 1641.

JOHNSTON, GEORGE, a modern English naturalist. He commenced his medical education as the apprentice of Dr. Abercrombie; subsequently he practised as surgeon at Berwick-upon-Tweed. While at Edinburgh he was an attentive student of natural history, and continued afterwards to follow up the pursuit. In 1838 he published his "History of British Zoophytes," and four years afterwards his "History of British Sponges" appeared. He contributed many valuable articles, chiefly on the lower forms of animal life, to the Transactions of various provincial scientific societies, to the "Magazine of Zoology and Botany," and to the "Annals of Natural History." In 1850 he produced one of his best works,—the "Introduction to Conchology, or Elements of the Natural History of Molluscous Animals," and soon afterwards he put forth an interesting work, "On the Botany of the Eastern Borders." The latter portion of his life was visited with some severe trials, under which his mind gave way.

Born 1798; died 1855.

JOHNSTON, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 660 square miles. Pop. 23,461. about one-third coloured. The capital is Smithfield.

JOHNSTON, or CORNWALLIS ISLANDS, a small group in the North Pacific Ocean, forming a lagoon, surrounded by a reef, 10 miles long and 5 miles broad. Lat. 16° 53′ N. Lon. 169° 31′ W.

JOHNSTON STRAIT, a narrow channel of British North America, separating Vancouver's Island from the mainland. On its N.W. side it has Queen Charlotte's Sound, and on its S.E. the Gulf of Georgia.

JOHNSTONE, JAMES T. W., an eminent modern chemist. Under circumstances by no means favourable, he succeeded in obtaining an education that enabled him to gain his livelihood by giving private instruction to pupils of the university of Glasgow. Removing to Durham in 1825, he opened a school there. Five years later he was enabled to retire from teaching, and give himself up entirely to chemistry, in pursuit of which intention he went to Sweden, where he became the pupil of the great chemist Berzelius. In 1833, upon the establishment of the Durham University, he was invited to assume the readership of chemistry and mineralogy in the new seat of learning. Shortly afterwards he went to Edinburgh, and was appointed chemist of the Agricultural Society of Scotland, but eventually resided exclusively at Durham, where he commenced a series of works on chemistry as applied to agriculture, which have become famous throughout the world. Having travelled in the New World, he published "Notes on North America," in which much valuable information is given as to the agriculture of that country. The "Chemistry of Common Life" was one of his latest works. He also wrote scientific articles for the "Edinburgh Review," and contributed to the Transactions of many learned societies. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and member of many other learned bodies.

Born at Paisley, 1796; died at Durham, 1853.

JOHNSTONE, GEORGE, a naval commander, was the son of a Scotch baronet, and devoted himself to the sea service. After passing through the subordinate stations, he was, in 1760, made master and commander, and, in 1762, a post captain. He was subsequently appointed governor of West Florida, and, on his return to England, he took an active part in the affairs of the East-India Company, particularly in opposition to Lord Clive. In 1771 he wrote "Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies." He sat in parliament first for Cockermouth and afterwards for Appleby, and had a duel with Lord George Germaine, through some reflections which fell from him in the house respecting his lordship. He was one of the commissioners sent to treat with the Americans.

Died 1787.

JOHNSTONE, a town in Renfrewshire, Scotland, on the Black Cart, 3 miles W. of Paisley. There are an elegant octagonal church, and three Presbyterian churches. Manf. Cotton, flax, and iron. Pop. 6,882.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

JOHNSTOWN, jons'-toun, a district of Toronto province, dominion of Canada, bounded on the S.E. by the St. Lawrence, and on the other sides by the Bathurst, East, and Midland districts. It is traversed by the Rideau river and canal, has several lakes, and contains large tracts of good land. Pop. about 50,000, mostly composed of Scotch and Irish.

JOHNSTOWN, a town of New York, United States, 40 miles N.W. of Albany. There are a court-house and 10 churches. Manf. Gloves and mittens. Pop. 12,500.

JOHNSTOWN, a town of Pennsylvania, United States, 150 miles W. of Harrisburg. Pop. 4,200.

JOHORE, jo-hor'-e, a district of Malacca. Very little is known of the interior, but the coast line, about 58 miles in extent, presents sandy bays and rocky headlands, and is lined by two chains of islands, running for 40 miles nearly parallel to the coast. The principal stream is the Johore.

JOHORE, a town of Malacca, capital of the above district, 35 miles N.E. of Singapore. It forms the southern extremity of the Malayan peninsula, and was founded in 1511 by Sultan Mahmoud Shah of Malacca, and was formerly a place of considerable importance, but it has now dwindled down to a few miserable huts. Lat. 30° N., Lon. 104° E.

JOIGNY, zhwoin'-ye, a walled town of France, in the department Yonne, and standing on the Yonne, here crossed by a handsome bridge, 15 miles N.W. of Auxerre. The streets are steep, winding, and narrow. There are the remains of a magnificent castle, with a fine cathedral, an ornamented building of the 15th century. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, vinegar, brandy, and other liquors. The trade in red wine and wool is considerable, and there are five annual fairs. Pop. 5,400.

JOINVILLE, zhwoin'-veel, a town of France, department Haute-Marne, and standing on the river Marne, 25 miles N. of Chaumont. It is an ancient place, but is now of little importance. Manf. Chiefly woollen goods. There are iron-mines and blast-furnaces in the vicinity. Pop. 3,800.

JOINVILLE, JEAN, Sieur de, a French historian. He held high office under Thibaut, king of Navarre, and was afterwards counsellor and friend to Louis IX., king of France, whom he accompanied in his first crusade of 1248, sharing his captivity after the battle of Mansourah, in which Louis and his army were taken prisoners. On the king's returning to France, Joinville received a pension, and was constantly retained near his person. His "History of St. Louis IX., King of France," is a valuable and interesting work.

Born 1224; died 1319.

JOINVILLE, FRANÇOIS-FERDINAND-PHILIPPE-LOUIS-MARIE D'ORLEANS, Prince de, third son of the late king of the French, Louis Philippe. When he had completed his education, he was appointed to the French navy, and made several voyages on the coast of France and Italy, after which he underwent a public examination at the naval school of Brest. In 1836 he became lieutenant, and in 1837 joined his brother, the duke de Nemours, at Constantine, soon after the taking of that city. During the war with Mexico, in 1838, he courageously engaged the batteries of St. Jean d'Ulloa with his corvette the Créole; and, shortly afterwards, at the head of his sailors, stormed the gate of Vera Cruz, and took prisoner General Arista; for which he received the cross of the Legion of Honour, and was appointed post-captain. In 1840 he brought to France from St. Helena the remains of Napoleon I. In 1843 he married at Rio Janeiro, the Princess Francesca of Braganza, sister of Dom Pedro II., and was the same year promoted to rear-admiral. In 1845 he commanded the fleet that bombarded Tangiers and captured Mogador, upon which he became vice-admiral. During the events of 1848, he was at sea before Algiers. Surrendering his command to the republicans, he joined his exiled family at Claremont, and has ever since lived in retirement. He has published in the "Revue des Deux Mondes," several sketches on the French navy.

Born at Neuilly, 1818.

JOLIBA, jol'-i-ba, a river of W. Africa. (See NIGER.)

JOLIET, jo'-li-et, the capital of Bell county, Illinois, United States. It is situated on both sides of the Des Plaines river, 35 miles S.W. of Chicago, and is an important railroad centre. The city hall and state penitentiary are fine buildings. Manf. Agricultural implements. Pop. 11,657.

JOLIETTE, zho-li-et, a western county of Quebec province, dominion of Canada, to the N.W. of he St. Lawrence. Area, 2,669 square miles. Pop. 22,000, nearly all of French descent.

JOLIETTE, capital of the above county, on L'Assomption river, 42 miles N.E. of Montreal. It is a busy centre of industry. There are many mills, an iron foundry, and a tannery. Pop. 3,100.

JOLSVA, ALNOVIA, or ELTSCH, jols'-va, a town of Hungary, in the valley of the Eltsch, 14 miles S.W. of Rosenau. It has a fine castle, and in its neighbourhood are iron-mines and quarries of fine white marble. Pop. 3,000.

JOLY, CLAUDE, zho'-le, a French political writer. He was at first a lawyer; but was afterwards made precentor of the cathedral at Paris. He wrote a book entitled "Maxims for the Education of a Prince," which, speaking too boldly of the rights of the people, was burnt by the hangman, in 1655.

Born at Paris, 1607; died at the same place, 1700.

JOLY, GUY, nephew of the preceding, was, for some time, the secretary and confidential friend of Cardinal de Retz; but, quarrelling with him, he attached himself to the court party. He wrote some "Historical Memoirs" about 1665, which were intended to give the opposite view of the questions referred to in the memoirs of Cardinal de Retz.

JOLY, MARK ANTONY, a French comic author, who became, in 1753, the French censor-royal. He wrote, among other plays, the "School of Lovers," and "The Jealous Wife."

Born at Paris, 1672; died 1753.

JOMELLI, NICOLO, yo'-mel-le, an Italian musical composer. He produced his first opera at Naples, when 23 years old, which brought so much fame, that he was soon afterwards summoned to Rome, where he became the especial favourite of the cardinal duke of York. He afterwards visited Venice and Vienna; at the latter place being engaged as teacher of music to the empress Maria Theresa. He wrote upwards of forty operas, which are now seldom heard; but his "Mass for the Dead" is considered among the best works of its kind, being often played in Roman Catholic churches.

Born near Naples, 1714; died 1774.

JOMINI, HENRI, Baron, zho-me'-ne, a French military historian and general. He was educated for commercial pursuits, and, for several years, was employed in a merchant's office. In 1795 he obtained a command in the Swiss militia, and rose so rapidly in it, that he was a lieutenant-colonel at 20; but on the French invasion of Switzerland, he lost his rank, whereupon he set out for Paris in search of employment. He had already established himself as a stockbroker in Paris, when he became acquainted with General Ney, who, discovering his great qualifications for military study, obtained for him an appointment which allowed him leisure to pursue it. When only 25 he wrote the early portion of his "Traité des Grandes Opérations Militaires," upon which Ney obtained a post for him in the army, and, soon afterwards, he was aide-de-camp to Ney, whom he accompanied through his campaigns during the few ensuing years, distinguishing himself by his bravery and skill. At the battle of Jena in particular he rendered good service to Ney, for which he was made a baron. In 1808 he marched with Ney into Spain; but fell under the displeasure of that general in the following ing year, and was superseded. Intending to enter the Russian army, he now applied to be discharged; but Napoleon refused, and made him a brigadier instead. Soon afterwards he was appointed to write the history of the grand army then about to invade Russia, and, throughout the campaign, exhibited such great talent, that Ney, after the battle of Bautzen, requested the emperor to make him general of division; but Napoleon found some cause for displeasure in his conduct, and again superseded him. Mortified at this treatment, Jomini resolved to enter the Russian service, and soon afterwards was made lieutenant-general therein, but he never took an active part against Napoleon. Meanwhile, he was tried by court-martial, and, in his absence, condemned to death by the French. In 1815 he went to Paris, where he strove, by every possible means, to prevent the execution of his old benefactor Marshal Ney. Upon the fall of Napoleon he went to reside in Russia, and occupied himself with the composition of military works, which have since become great text-books of the science of war. The czar of Russia allowed Jomini to settle in Brussels in 1855. His chief works are, "History of the Wars of Frederick II.," "Principles of Strategy," "Political and Military Life of Napoleon," "Treatise on the Art of War," and "The Military Atlas."

Born at Payerne, in the canton of Vaud, 1779.

JONADAB, jon'-a-dab, the son of Rechab, was the founder of a sect to which he gave the name of Rechabites. It practised the greatest austority; refused the use of wine; the accumulation of wealth being likewise forbidden.

Lived in the 9th century.

JONAH, jō'-na, the fifth of the minor prophets. His history is related in the book of "Jonah," in the Old Testament. The "tomb of the prophet Jonah" is shown near Mosul.

Lived about the 9th century, B.C.

JONAS, ANAGRIMAS, jō'-nas, a native of Iceland, and a writer of some philosophical and historical works. He was a coadjutor to Gundebrand, bishop of Holum, who was a disciple of Tycho Brahe. Jonas refused that see after the death of his friend.

Born 1545; died 1640.

JONAS, JUSTUS, a learned Protestant, who became principal of the college at Wittemburg, assisted Melancthon at Marpurg, and zealously defended the doctrines of Luther.

Born in Thuringia, 1493; died 1555.

JONATHAN, jon'-a-thun, the son of Saul and the intimate friend of David, whom he saved from his father's fury at the hazard of his own life. He fell with Saul, in fighting against the Philistines.

Died 1056 B.C.

JONATHAN, son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabæus, a famous Jewish general. He compelled Bacchides, the Syrian commander, to sue for peace; defeated Demetrius Soter and his general Apollonius. At length he fell by treachery into the hands of Tryphon, who, after receiving a large sum as a ransom for him, put him to death.

Died 144 B.C.

JONES, HENRY, a dramatic writer, was originally a bricklayer. Some of his poetical attempts attracting the notice of Lord Chesterfield, then lord-lieutenant, he took him under his patronage, and brought him to London, where he published his poems by subscription, and produced his tragedy of the "Earl of Essex," which gained him wealth and reputation.

Born in Ireland, about 1720; died 1770.

JONES, INIGO, jones, a famous English architect. Very little is known of his youth, till he attracted, by his skill in drawing, the notice of William, earl of Pembroke, who sent him to Italy, where he acquired a great knowledge of architecture. James I. appointed him surveyor-general of the works, and, in the succeeding reign, he had charge of the rebuilding of St. Paul's cathedral. He was also made manager of the masques and interludes at court, which brought upon him the satire of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him in his comedy of "Bartholomew Fair," under the name of Lantern Leatherhead. In 1612 he again visited Italy, and on his return was appointed surveyor of the royal buildings. He suffered considerably for his loyalty in the time of the great rebellion. In 1655 he wrote "A Discourse on Stonehenge," in which he absurdly attempted to prove that it had been the Roman temple of Cœlus. He designed the palace of Whitehall and the banqueting-house, the church and piazza of Covent Garden, and other buildings.

Born in London, 1572; died 1653.

JONES, OWEN, a modern English architect, distinguished for his skill as an ornamental decorator. After studying under Mr. Vulliamy, an architect of some celebrity as an ornamental designer, he travelled for four years in Egypt, Turkey, and Spain, where, in conjunction with M. Jules Goury, a French artist, he made numerous designs from the Alhambra. On his return to London, he, after considerable pains and expense, succeeded in producing an elaborate work, in lithography and colours, on the Alhambra. This great work was published in parts, and concluded in 1842, from which time Mr. Owen Jones was considered an authority on the subject of chromatic decoration. A work on "Mosaic Pavements" was next published by him. Upon the organisation of the official staff of the Great Exhibition of 1851, he was appointed one of the superintendents of the works, being charged with the internal decoration of the structure. The plan he pursued was a novel one, and though generally admitted to be successful, was, nevertheless, opposed in principle by other architects and decorators. In advocating his own views, Mr. Jones gave lectures on decoration at the London Institution, the Society of Arts, and other places, and published a number of works on the subject. When the new Crystal Palace company was formed, he was appointed with Mr. Digby Wyatt, to select, on the continent, the valuable collection of casts and works of art. The Egyptian, Greek, Roman, and Alhambra courts were completed under his superintendence. His latest publication was the great work called "The Grammar of Ornament." The St. James's Hall, completed in 1858, was built after his designs.

Born in Wales, 1809; died 1873.

JONES, JOHN PAUL (known and famous as Paul Jones, his real name being John Paul), a naval adventurer, who had been a common sailor in some vessels engaged in the slave trade. He settled in America in 1773, and subsequently obtained the command of an American ship under Commodore Hopkins, and distinguished himself in several engagements, for which he received his commission as captain of the marine. In 1775, being well acquainted with the Scotch coast and the northern part of England, he conceived the design of effecting a descent. He accordingly landed at Whitehaven, and, having dismantled a fort, set fire to some shipping in the harbour. Thence he sailed for the opposite coast of Scotland, where he landed on the estate of the earl of Selkirk, and plundered his lordship's house of all the plate. He next took the Drake sloop of war, with which he returned to Brest. He afterwards sailed round Ireland to the North Sea, with three ships,—the Richard, Pallas, and Vengeance. Having committed great mischief on that coast, he fell in with the Baltic fleet, convoyed by the Serapis frigate and the Countess of Scarborough armed ship, both which, after a severe action, he captured off Flamborough Head. For these services the king of France conferred on him the order of Merit, and gave him a gold-hilted sword. After the war he attempted unsuccessfully to establish a fur trade between the north-west coast of America and China. He afterwards was for a short time in the Russian service, commanded a fleet in the Black Sea, and took an active part in the war with Turkey. His funeral in Paris was attended by a deputation of the Legislative Assembly. Cooper, the American novelist, made Jones the hero of his famous novel, "The Pilot," and Allan Cunningham also selected him as the hero of a novel.

Born at Kirkcudbright, Scotland, 1747; died at Paris, 1792.

JONES, WILLIAM, an English mathematician. He settled in London as a schoolmaster, and, having instructed Lord Macclesfield's son in mathematics, that nobleman made him his secretary, and appointed him deputy teller of the Exchequer. He was very intimate with Sir Isaac Newton, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote "A Compendium of the Art of Navigation," "A New Introduction to Mathematics," some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and an analysis of several of Sir Isaac Newton's papers.

Born in the Isle of Anglesea, 1680; died 1749.

JONES, SIR WILLIAM, an Indian judge, linguist, and learned Oriental writer, was son of the preceding. Losing his father in his infancy, his care devolved on his mother, a woman of great virtue and understanding, from whom he learned the rudiments of knowledge, and was then removed to Harrow school, where he made great progress in his studies. In 1764 he was entered of University College, Oxford, where to his classical pursuits he added the study of the Persian and Arabic languages, also the Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese. At the age of 19 he became tutor to Lord Althorp, and, during his residence at Wimbledon, in that noble family, he greatly enlarged his acquirements in Oriental literature. In 1769 he made a tour in France, and about the same time undertook, at the request of the king of Denmark, to translate the history of Nadir Shah from Persian into French. In 1770 he entered on the study of the law at the Temple, but continued his application to Oriental learning and general literature. In 1774 he published his "Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry," dedicated to the university of Oxford. In 1783 he obtained the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, a post which had been the object of his anxious wishes. The honour of knighthood was on this occasion conferred on him, and he soon after married a daughter of the bishop of St. Asaph. In April of that year he embarked for India, leaving his native country, to which he was never to return. On the voyage his active mind projected the establishment of a society in Bengal for the purpose of illustrating Oriental antiquities and literature. This scheme he saw carried into effect, and under his auspices, and by his direction, the society acquired a high reputation. The volumes of its Transactions are inestimable, and are enriched by several valuable productions from his pen. As a judge he was indefatigable and impartial. He studied the native laws of the country, and became so versed in the Sanscrit and the codes of the Brahmins, as to gain the admiration of the most learned men in that country. He made many translations, including "The Ordinances of Menu," and at the time of his death was employed in preparing a digest of the Hindoo and Mahometan laws. A monument was erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral by the East India Company.

Born in London, 1746; died at Calcutta, 1794.

JONES, THOMAS RYMER, an eminent English anatomist and writer on medicine. He was educated for the profession of surgery in London and Paris, and passed the College of Surgeons in 1833; but an affliction of deafness manifesting itself, he resolved to abandon the practical for the theoretical departments of medical science. He began his career by contributing to the Proceedings of the Zoological Society some papers on comparative anatomy. In 1838 he produced "A General Outline of the Animal Kingdom," which was the first complete treatise on the subject in the English language. Subsequently he was appointed Fullerian professor of physiology in the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and examiner in comparative anatomy and physiology in the London University. His "Natural History of Animals" was commenced in 1845: he has also lectured, and contributed articles to scientific publications, on natural history, with considerable success. In 1844 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society.

Born 1810.

JONSON, BENJAMIN, jon'-son, commonly known as Ben Jonson, an English poet and dramatist. His father was a clergyman, and died about a month before the birth of the poet, who received his education at Westminster school; but his mother marrying again, his father-in-law, who was a bricklayer, compelled him to work at his business. On this, he enlisted for a soldier, and went to the Netherlands, where he distinguished himself by his courage. After his return, he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, but did not remain there long, owing to his extreme poverty. He then turned his attention to the stage, and became a player and dramatic writer, with indifferent success. During this part of his career he was so unfortunate as to kill a man in a duel. His first printed play was the comedy of "Every Man in his Humour;" after which he produced a new piece annually for several years, among them his famous "Alchemist," "Volpone," "The Silent Woman," and "Cataline." He engaged with Chapman and Marston in writing a comedy called "Eastward Hoe," which, being deemed a satire on the Scotch nation, had nearly brought its authors to the pillory. At the accession of James I., Jonson superintended a spectacle for his entertainment in his passage from the Tower to Westminster Abbey, and he continued to have the management of all the masques and public shows during that and the succeeding reign. In 1619 he was made poet laureate; the salary of which, during his term of office, was raised from a hundred marks to as many pounds, with a butt of Canary wine. In 1617 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. Notwithstanding his pension and the profits of his plays, he was generally poor, and was frequently relieved by the king's bounty. He was buried in Westminster Abbey: on his gravestone is the following inscription:—"O rare Ben Jonson!" His works exhibit great learning, wit, and humour, of a forcible and frequently coarse kind, and a remarkable dramatic power. Some of his lyrics are very elegant. Mr. Gifford's edition of his works is the best, on account of the rich store of elucidatory notes which it contains.

Born at Westminster, 1574; died 1637.

JONZAC, zhon'-za, a town of France, department Charente-Inférieure, on the Seugne, 60 miles S.E. of Rochelle. There is an old castle at the eastern extremity of the town. Manf. Druggets, camlets, and other coarse woollen stuffs. There is a good trade in brandy. Pop. 3,800.

JOOBUL, joo'-bul', one of the hill states of India, between the Jumna and the Sutlej. Area, 150 square miles. Pop. 15,000.—The capital is of the same name. Lat. 31° 10′ N. Lon. 77° 35′ E.

JOODPOOR, JODHPORE, or MARWA, the largest of the protected Rajpoot States of India. The soil is in some parts arid, but in others capable of cultivation, which is assisted by a good system of irrigation, and grain, tobacco, and opium (especially the latter) are raised. The principal streams are the Loony and its affluents. The camels of the country are famous, and in great demand. Area, 35,672 square miles. Pop. 1,750,000. The chief towns are JOODPOOR, the capital; Pallee, Nagore, and Meerta.

JOODPOOR, capital of the above state, on an affluent of the Loony, defended by walls and strong forts. The palace of the raja is a large and strongly fortified building, in a commanding position. There are some large and finely constructed tanks. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 26° 18′ N. Lon. 73° 12′ E.

JOONAGHUR, or JUNAGURH, joo-na-gur', a city of India, in the province of Gujerat, 235 miles N.W. of Bombay. It is encompassed by low walls surrounded by jungle. Its citadel, an admirable defensive work, but now partially in ruins, occupies an elevation on the E. side of the modern city. The streets of the town are narrow and dirty, and the only buildings worthy of notice are the mosques. Pop. 400,000. Lat. 21° 31′ N. Lon. 70° 31′ E.

JOONER, or JUNAR, joo-nar', a town of British India, 90 miles N.E. of Bombay, at the foot of a hill, surrounded by a strong fort. A great number of Buddhist caves are in the hills near the town. Pop. 10,000.

JOPPA. (See JAFFA.)

JORAK, or TCHORAK, cho'-rak, a river of Asiatic Turkey, rising in the pashalic of Erzeroum, near the sources of the Euphrates. It flows generally in a north-easterly direction, and, after a course of 180 miles, falls into the Black Sea, near Cape Batumi.

JORAM. (See JEHORAM.)

JORDAENS, JAKOB, yor'-dans, a celebrated Flemish painter, was the disciple of Adam van Oort and of Rubens. He painted with extraordinary freedom and expedition. Many of his pictures are in the churches of Antwerp and other cities of the Netherlands. There is a "Holy Family" by him in the National Gallery.

Born at Antwerp, 1594; died at the same place, 1678.

JORDAN, a celebrated river of Syria, running through the pashalic of Damascus, and forming the E. boundary of Palestine. It rises in the mountain called Jebbel Sheik, the ancient Hermon, and passing by Cæsarea Philippi, called now Paneas, forms a small lake called El Huleh (the waters of Merom), after which it enters the northern side of the Lake of Tiberias, through which it passes, and pursues a southerly course until it falls into the Dead Sea. Its entire length is about 150 miles. It is frequently mentioned as being the scene of many remarkable events connected with Scripture history.

JORDAN, CAMILLE, zhor'-da, a brave Frenchman, who was one of the leaders in the rising of Lyons during the reign of terror. He was exiled, but subsequently returned to France, where he wrote several valuable works on religious and political questions.

Born at Lyons, 1771; died 1821.

JORDAN, DOROTHEA, an actress, famous for her grace and spirit, and for her connection with the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., with whom she lived for many years, and by whom she had ten children, who took the name of Fitzclarence. In 1811 the connection ceased, and Mrs. Jordan received an allowance. In her later years she suffered much from neglect. Her maiden name was Bland. After her death William IV. erected a monument, by Chantrey, to her memory at St. Cloud.

Born in Ireland, 1762; died at St. Cloud, 1816.

Born at Berlin, 1700; died at the same place, 1746.

JORDANO, LUCA, yor-da'-no, Italian painter, who studied the manner of Pietro da Cortona, but chiefly wrought in the style of Paul Veronese. The king of Spain employed him to decorate the Escurial, and in several other great works, by which he acquired considerable wealth.

Born at Naples, 1632; died at the same place, 1705

JORDANOW, jor-dan-off, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, 21 miles S.E. of Wadowice. Manf. Linen goods, for which it is the centre for the trade in Galicia.

JORGENSEN, JORGEN, yor'-gen-sone, a Dane, who, for six weeks, usurped the protectorship of Iceland. He was the son of a watchmaker, and is said to have served as midshipman in the English navy during his earliest years. In 1809 he sailed in an English ship to Iceland, and forthwith proceeded, by proclamation and various extraordinary measures, to assume the position of protector. A few weeks afterwards a British man-of-war visited the island, and Jorgensen was seized and carried prisoner to England. After a life full of adventure, he was at length confined in Newgate for robbing his lodgings, and, in 1825, was sent to New South Wales, dying, it is supposed, on the voyage.

Born at Copenhagen, 1779.

JORNANDES, or JORNANES, jor-nan'-dees, a Goth, who embraced Christianity, and became bishop of Ravenna about 552. He wrote the "History of the Goths," a work of considerable importance, though not entirely trustworthy.

Lived in the 6th century.

JORTIN, JOHN, jor'-tin, an eminent English divine, who, while under-graduate of Jesus College, Cambridge, translated for Pope some of Eustathius's notes on Homer. In 1772 he published Latin poems, in 4to, under the title of "Lusus Poetici," which went through three editions. In 1730 he published four sermons on the truth of the Christian religion, and, the year following, "Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern." In 1734 appeared his "Remarks on Spenser's Poems, and on Milton." In 1751 he produced the first volume of his "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History," which he continued to 5 vols. His "Life of Erasmus" was published in 1758.

Born in London, 1698; died at the same place, 1770.

JORULLO, XORULLO, or JORUYO, cho-rool'-lo, a volcano of Mexico, 150 miles N.W. from Mexico. It is situate on the plain of El Mal Pais (from which it rises to a farther height of 1,300 feet), which is nearly 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 19° 10' N. Lon. 101° 20' W.

JOSÉ, SAN, jo'-sat, a town and Jesuit military station of Bolivia. It is well-built, contains a large and handsome college, and a fine church. It is the entrepôt for the supply of the Jesuit stations, and was formerly of much greater importance than now it is. Manf. Cotton fabrics. There is a trade in tamarinds, wax, and salt. Pop. 2,000; formerly much larger, but the small-pox has made frightful ravages. Lat. 17° 40' S. Lon. 64° 40' W.

JOSÉ, SAN, a town of Brazil, province of Santa Catharina, on a creek in the bay of Catharina, 4 miles W. of Desterro. A trade is carried on in sugar, rum, and fish. Pop. 5,000; some of the inhabitants are engaged in the whale fishery.

JOSÉ, SAN, an island, about 25 miles long and 7 broad, in the Gulf of California.

JOSEPH, jo'-sef, the favourite son of Jacob, by Rachel, who was sold by his brethren into slavery, and afterwards governed Egypt with great wisdom till his death, at the age of 110 years. Moses carried his bones out of Egypt, and laid them with Jacob's, in the land of Canaan. The history is given in the book of Genesis, in the Old Testament.

Born 1902 B.C.; died 1792 B.C.

JOSEPH, the husband of Mary, mother of our Saviour, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of David. He was a poor carpenter of Nazareth.

JOSEPH I., emperor of Germany, of the house of Austria, was the son of the emperor Leopold I. He was crowned king of Hungary, 1689; king of Rome, 1690; and ascended the imperial throne on the death of his father, in 1705. He engaged in his interests Savoy, England, and Holland, against France, in support of the claim of the archduke Charles to the crown of Spain. In the war which ensued, the allies, under Eugène and Marlborough, were successful, gaining the battles of Ramilies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. He made himself master of Italy, and levied contributions on Mantua, Parma, Modena, Lucca, Genoa, and other places. His armies also defeated the revolted Hungarians, headed by Prince Bagotzki, who was forced to take refuge in Turkey. In the midst of these successes Joseph was taken off by the small-pox. He was a liberal and thoughtful ruler.

Born at Vienna, 1678; died 1711.

JOSEPH II., emperor of Germany, was the son of Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary and archduchess of Austria, and Francis of Lorraine. He was crowned king of the Romans in 1764, and the year following became emperor. He early displayed great talents and activity, by remodelling the army and reforming all the departments of government. He also travelled through his dominions, and visited Prussia, Italy, France, and Russia. Among other excellent regulations which he adopted, was the setting apart one day every week to receive petitions and to hear complaints. In 1780, on the death of his mother, he succeeded to the crown of Hungary and Bohemia. The year following he issued a decree in favour of the liberty of the press, which was followed by others equally liberal, particularly one of religious toleration; he also abolished the system of vassalage. This measure was followed by an imperial edict, disclaiming all secular subjection to the court of Rome, the suppression of many monasteries, and the regulation of others. On this occasion Pope Pius VI. made a journey to Vienna, to induce the emperor to alter his designs; but, though pompously received, he was completely unsuccessful. In 1786 the emperor followed up his attack on the papal authority by an assembly of the ecclesiastical princes at Ratisbon, in which it was resolved to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the pope. In 1786 a declaration of war was proclaimed against the Turks, and the same year the emperor in person reduced Schabatz; but this was followed by a defeat. Soon afterwards a bloody battle was fought between the Imperialists and the Turks, on the heights of Rohadin, in which neither could claim the victory. Joseph next made an attempt to possess himself of Belgrade, but without success. Marshal Laudon, however, assumed the command of the army, took Dubitza and Novi, and, in 1789, reduced Belgrade. Soon after, a peace was concluded, chiefly occasioned by the discontented spirit in Germany, at such a waste of men and treasure. He was succeeded by his brother, Peter Leopold, grand-duke of Tuscany.

Born 1741; died 1790.

JOSEPH, BEN GORION, a Jewish historian. He wrote, in Hebrew, a history of the Jews, which bears evident marks of being an abridgment of Josephus's larger work. It was published in a Latin version by Gagnier, at Oxford, in 1706, and in Hebrew and Latin, at Gotha, in 1707.

Lived in the 9th century.

JOSEPH-EMANUEL, king of Portugal, was son and successor of Charles V., and ascended the throne in 1750. The great earthquake at Lisbon, in 1755, and the expulsion of the Jesuits from the kingdom in 1759, were the principal events of this reign, during which Joseph was assisted by his clever minister the marquis de Pombal. Learning was encouraged, commerce and industry received a fresh impulse, and the power of the inquisition was diminished.

Born 1715; died 1777.

JOSEPH, FATHER, an apostate monk of Hungary, who headed a numerous banditti, whom he called the people of God, assuming to himself the name of Joshua. He entered the Austrian dominions, where he committed dreadful outrages, burning churches, putting priests to death, and defiling nuns, under pretence of zeal for true religion. The motley crew were at last dispersed, on the sudden death of their leader.

Died 1678.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA, a rich inhabitant of Jerusalem, who went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus, which he laid in his own sepulchre. He afterwards joined the disciples, and died at Jerusalem.

JOSEPH, FRANÇOIS, a famous Capuchin, commonly called Father Joseph, who was employed by Cardinal Richelieu in most of his political intrigues. Louis XIII. procured him a cardinal's hat, but he died of an apoplexy before he received it.

Born 1577; died 1638.

JOSEPH, ST., an island of Upper Canada, in the channel between lakes Huron and Superior. It is 20 miles long and 15 broad.

JOSEPH, ST., LAKE, in British N. America, receiving Catlake river, and discharging its waters by the Albany into St. James's Bay. It is 45 miles long and 10 broad.

JOSEPH, ST., a river of the United States, which, after a western course of 140 miles, enters Lake Michigan. It is navigable as far as Lockport, a distance of 130 miles.

JOSEPH, ST., a town of Trinidad, West India, on a river of the same name, 5 miles E. of Port of Spain. It consists chiefly of mud houses. Pop. 3,000.

JOSEPH, ST., a peninsula on the east coast of Patagonia, South America, 69 miles long and 24 broad. On the north-west side is a large bay of the same name, and on the south-west the Gulf of Nuevo.

JOSEPH, ST., capital of the county of Buchanan, Missouri, United States. It has seven churches, a convent, a court-house, and other great buildings, and is the terminus of the pony-express to the Rocky Mountains, and of trains of waggons going to California and Oregon. A considerable trade is carried on. The town was founded in 1843. Pop. 32,431.

JOSEPH'S BAY, ST., a bay of the United States, on the coast of West Florida, of the figure of a horse-shoe. It is formed by the Gulf of Mexico, and lies immediately to the N.W. of Cape St. Blas.

JOSÉPHINE, MARIE ROSE, jo'-se-feen, empress of France. She was the daughter of Count Tacher de la Pagerie, captain of the port of San Pierre, in the island of Martinique. When about 15 years of age she went to France, and was married, at the age of 15 years, to the Viscount de Beauharnais, by whom she had two children,—Eugène and Hortense de Beauharnais. After her husband had fallen by the guillotine, she was herself imprisoned, but was released through the intervention of Tallien. She was subsequently introduced to General Bonaparte, who, struck by her beauty and grace, became her husband in 1796. She shared the high destinies of her husband, ascended the throne with him, and received the title of empress, in which dignity she gained universal attachment; but, being childless, Napoleon divorced her. Josephine retired to Malmaison in 1809, where she died soon after the fall of the emperor.

Born in the island of Martinique, 1763; died 1814.

JOSEPHSTADT, jo-sef-stat', a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the Elbe. It is strongly fortified, and occupied by a garrison. Pop. 2,600.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, jo-sé-fus, a Jewish historian. He came of distinguished ancestors, was the son of Matthew, a Jewish priest, and received a liberal education among the Pharisees, after which he went to Rome, where he cultivated his talents to great advantage. On returning to his own country, he was appointed governor of Galilee, commanded the troops employed to defend Jotapata against Vespasian and Titus, and maintained the place bravely during seven weeks. Vespasian took him into his favour, and he was held in great esteem by Titus, whom he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem, at the taking of which, Titus told him to ask for anything he wished. He requested that the sacred books might be given to him, and that the lives of his brother and fifty of his friends might be spared. When Vespasian became emperor, he gave Josephus a palace, with a pension, the freedom of the city, and a grant of lands in Judæa. Titus added to these favours, and Josephus, out of gratitude, assumed the name of Flavius. During his residence at Rome he wrote his "History of the Wars of the Jews," first in Syriac, and afterwards in Greek. Its style approaches nearest to that of Livy. He also wrote the "Antiquities of the Jews," two books in defence of the Jews against Apion, and his own life.

Born at Jerusalem, A.D. 37; died at Rome, about the year 93.

JOSHUA, josh'-u-a (another form of the name Jesus), the son of Nun, of the tribe of Benjamin. He succeeded Moses as the leader of the Israelites, whom he conducted into Canaan, and signalised himself by his valour and his prudence. He died in the 110th year of his age. The authorship of the book bearing his name is ascribed by some to him, also the concluding part of Deuteronomy.

JOSIAH, jo-si'-a, king of Judah, succeeded his father Amon, 641 B.C., at the age of eight years. He destroyed the idols and restored the worship of God, established virtuous magistrates for the administration of justice, and repaired the temple. He also caused the law of Moses to be sought for and preserved. He was wounded in a battle fought at Megiddo, against Necho, king of Egypt.

Died 610 B.C.

JOSIKA, MIKLOS, Baron, e-o-se'-ka, a distinguished Hungarian novelist, who, after serving in the Austrian army, and taking part in the campaign of 1814-15, retired, in 1818, to his estate in Transylvania, where he thenceforth occupied himself with literature. He has written "Abafi," a national and historical tale; "The Last Bateri," "The Bohemians in Hungary," "Zringi the Poet," and "Stephen Josika." He has also translated into Hungarian the English novel "A Marriage in High Life." After the revolution in Hungary, he resided at Brussels.

Born at Torda, Transylvania, 1796; died 1865.

JOSSE-ZEN-NOODE, shoss, a town and parish of Belgium, about 1 mile E. of Brussels, of which it is a suburb. Pop. 8,500.

JOSSELIN zhoss'-la, a town of France, department Morbihan, on the Oust, 24 miles N.E. of Vannes. There is a very fine castle, built in the 14th century, on the site of a castle destroyed in 1162 by Henry II. of England. There is an important grain market. Pop. 2,600.

JOST, ISAAK MARKUS, yost, Jewish author and journalist, was born at Barnburg, in Germany. His principal works are a "History of the Israelites," "Universal History of the Jewish People," and a German translation of the "Mishna." From 1839 to 1841 he edited the "Israelitische Annalen."

Born 1793; died 1862.

JOUARRE, zhoo-ar', a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, 12 miles E. of Meaux, on a height near the Little Morin. There are a fine church with an ancient crypt, and the remains of an abbey. Pop. 2,600.

JOUBERT, BARTHÉLEMY CATHERINE, a French republican general, who was educated for the law, but quitted it for the army, and in 1789 commenced his military course as a grenadier, whence he rose by degrees to be general. He was second in command to Bonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and signalised himself at Millesimo, Ceva, Montebaldo, Rivoli, and in the Tyrol. He was opposed to General Suwarrow, but was slain at the battle of Novi, at a time when the Directory was about to offer him the supreme power.

Born 1769; died 1799.

JOUDOMA, yoo-do'-ma, a river of Siberia, rising in the mountains of Okhotsk, lat. 60° 30′ N., lon. 140° E., flowing generally in a south-westerly direction, and joining the Maia, on the right bank, after a course of 170 miles.

JOUFFROY, marquis de, zhoo'-froi, who disputed with Fulton and others the honour of having been the first to apply steam to the purposes of navigation, made his first attempt on the Doubs in 1776, and renewed it with more success on the Saône in 1783; but failed to carry it out, through want of means and support. He was equally unsuccessful at Paris in 1816; but the Academy of Sciences subsequently acknowledged his claim to the discovery, a distinction with which, whether merited or otherwise, he could not fail to be gratified.

Born in Franche-Comté, 1751; died 1832.

JOUFFROY, THÉODORE SIMON, French philosopher and politician, professor of philosophy in the College of France from 1832 to 1838. He translated the works of Reid, and some of the treatises of Dugald Stuart. His most important original work is "Mélanges Philosophiques," published in 1833. He was one of the founders of Le Globe newspaper, to which he contributed political articles, and was for some time a member of the Chamber of Deputies.

Born at Pontels, on the Jura, 1796; died 1842.

JOUG, yoog, a river of Russia, rising in the south of the government of Volgoda, and pursuing a circuitous course of about 220 miles to its junction with the Suchona. The chief affluents are the Pushima, Luza, Sharkenga, and Kitchmenga.

JOULE, JAMES PRESCOTT, natural philosopher, best known for his researches in connection with the quantitative determination of heat, and the transformation of various forms of energy, was the son of a brewer at Salford, and assisted in the business until 36 years of age. He received scientific instruction from Dr. Dalton, and when only 20 years old became known to the scientific world by his researches relating to the electro-magnetic engine. He then investigated the mechanical nature of the origin of heat, and afterwards, in conjunction with Sir William Thompson, commenced a series of important experiments on the thermal effects of fluids in motion, and afterwards on the effects of magnetism on the dimensions of iron and steel. He has invented many delicate instruments for scientific researches, is a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, an LL.D., and a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences, Paris, and is considered to have been the first to establish the remarkable theory of the conservation of energy.

Born at Salford, 1818.

JOUNA, or KRIGH PAK, joo'-na, a river of Alaska, United States, supposed to rise in lat. 65° N., and lon. 136° W.; and, after a lengthened course, enters Behring Straits by two channels. It is navigable for 300 miles from its mouth.

JOUNPUR, or JOUNPOOR, joon-poor', a district of British India, north-western provinces, where sugar is largely produced. Area, 1,555 square miles. Pop. 1,026,000.

JOUNPUR, capital of the above district, on both banks of the Goomtee, which is here crossed by an ancient bridge, commanded by a yet older fort. Pop. 25,500. Lat. 25° 44′ N. Lon. 82° 44′ E.

JOURBOURG, or GEORGENBOURG, yoor'-boorg, a town of Russia, government of Wilna, on the right bank of the Niemen, 110 miles N.W. of Wilna. The town has a harbour, is a custom-house station, and carries on a considerable trade.

JOURDAN, JEAN-BAPTISTE, zhoor'-da, marshal of France. He served in the war of American independence at the age of 16 years, and in 1791 was appointed to the command of a battalion of volunteers. He fought under Dumouriez in Belgium, and became a general of division, with the command of the army of the north, in 1793. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Hondschoote, and two days afterwards was named general-in-chief, but was deprived of his command by the Committee of Public Safety. Subsequently he was placed at the head of the army of the Moselle. He took Durant and Charleroi, and gained the celebrated battle of Fleurus, in 1794. Opposed by the archduke Charles, he crossed the Rhine a second time; but, being defeated, was superseded in 1799. Named a member of the council of Five Hundred, he proposed the law of conscription. A sincere republican, he opposed the usurpation of Bonaparte, and, after the 18th Brumaire, was excluded from the Legislative Corps. He was, however, nominated by Napoleon, marshal of France, in 1804; but he was never again employed in any important capacity. He accompanied Joseph Bonaparte to Spain, in command of the 7th military corps. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he offered his services, but that did not prevent his being made a count by Louis XVIII., in 1815. Four years afterwards he was made a peer of France. He took an active part in the revolution of 1830. Unlike other French marshals, he lived and died poor.

Born at Limoges, 1762; died in Paris, 1833.

JOURE, zhoore, a market-town of the Netherlands, province of Friesland, 6 miles N.W. of Heerenveen. Manf. Leather, tobacco, chicory, clockwork, and earthenware. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 2,500.

JOVELLANOS, DON GASPAR MELCHIOR DE, yo-vail-lun'-os, one of the most distinguished Spaniards of modern times, born at Gijon, in the Asturias, of an old and noble family, was endowed with splendid talents; and not only acquired, while at college, an extensive knowledge of jurisprudence, his more especial object, but also made great progress in archæology, languages, and the belles lettres. He became a member of the criminal branch of the audiencia in Seville; and advancing rapidly in his professional career, was appointed to the dignified station of member of the council of the military orders at Madrid. About the same time he was entrusted with some important affairs, and nominated councillor of state by Charles III. When, in 1794, Spain found herself loaded with debt, Jovellanos proposed, for the relief of the national difficulties, a tax on the property of the higher order of the clergy; for which he was exiled to the mountains of Asturias, though his project was afterwards carried into execution. In 1799 he was recalled, and made minister of justice for the interior; but before twelve months had passed, he was dismissed, and banished to the island of Majorca, where he was confined in the convent of the Carthusians. After the fall of Godoy, the prince of peace, in 1808, he recovered his liberty, and subsequently became a member of the supreme junta. He was, however, suspected of favouring the French; and at length, being denounced as a traitor for endeavouring to promote their plans for the subjugation of Spain, he was put to death during a popular insurrection. He wrote "Lyric Poems;" "Pelayo," a tragedy; "The Honourable Delinquent," a comedy; several works on subjects connected with political economy; and translated Milton's "Paradise Lost."

Born 1744; died 1812.

JOUVENCY, JOSEPH, zho'-van-se, a French Jesuit, who published an apology, in which he defended Chastel, the attempted assassin of Henry IV., and called him a martyr. He continued the History of the Jesuits, and wrote some other works.

Born at Paris, 1643; died at Rome, 1719.

JOUX, zhoo, a lake of Switzerland, Canton de Vaud, 18 miles N.W. of Lausanne, about 3,500 feet above the sea. It is overlooked by Mont Tendre, which, on its S.E. side, attains an elevation of 5,730 feet above the level of the sea. The Château-de-Joux is a fortress in the Jura mountains, 16 miles N.E. of the lake. It has been successively the prison of Mirabeau, Toussaint l'Ouverture, Calvinchi, governor of Rome, and General Dupont. It is on a rock overhanging the river Doubs, at a height of 600 feet.

JOVIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, jo-vi-ai'-nus, a Roman emperor. He was elected by the Roman soldiers, after the death of Julian, but refused the dignity, unless they turned Christians, to which they consented. He made a disadvantageous peace with Persia, shut up the heathen temples, and recalled the banished clergy. He died, after reigning seven months, owing to the suffocating vapour of burning charcoal in his room.

Born 331; died 364.

JOVINIAN, jo-vin'-i-an, a monk of Milan in the 4th century, who, after leading for many years a life of great austerity, gave way to the grossest debauchery, and maintained that it was lawful to indulge in sensual pleasures, with other tenets equally offensive to good morals; on which account the emperor Honorius ordered him and his followers to be scourged and banished. He wrote several books, which were refuted by Jerome.

Died in Dalmatia, 412.

JOVIUS, PAUL, jo'-vi-us, an eminent historian of the 16th century. He received a pension from Francis I., king of France, and Clement VII. gave him the bishopric of Nocera, which dignity he disgraced by his course of life. His great work is a History of his Own Time, in folio. He also wrote the "Lives of Illustrious Men." His brother Benedict wrote the "History of Switzerland."

Born at Como, 1483; died at Florence, 1559.

JOWRAH, jow-rah', a town of British India, presidency of Bengal, at an elevation of 1,440 feet above the sea level. Pop. 3,600. Lat. 23° 38′ N. Lon. 75° 11′ E.

JOYEUSE, ANNE, DUC DE, zhwoi-e(r)se, a French duke, favourite of Henry III., and admiral of France, who distinguished himself by many gallant exploits. He was killed in an expedition against the Huguenots.

Born in France, 1561; died 1587.

JOYEUSE, a town of France, department Ardèche, on the right bank of the Baume, at the foot of the Cevennes, 25 miles S.W. of Privas.

JOWETT, BENJAMIN, D.D., jow'-et, eminent scholar and divine, was educated at St. Paul's School, and was elected to a scholarship in Baliol College, Oxford, in 1835, and to a fellowship in 1838. In 1855 he was appointed to the regius professorship of Greek in the university of Oxford, on the recommendation of Lord Palmerston. Professor Jowett wrote a "Commentary on the Epistles of Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans," and subsequently contributed an "Essay on the Interpretation of Scripture" to the well-known volume entitled "Essays and Reviews," for which he was subjected to abortive legal proceedings. He was elected Master of Baliol College in September 1870.

Born at Camberwell, 1817.

JOWF, or DJOWF, jouf, a province of Arabia, in the sultanate of Jebel Shomer. It is a kind of oasis, or deep oval depression in the desert. The soil is very fertile, and the gardens are celebrated for their beauty. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 40,000, fine specimens of the Arabian race, and are making considerable advances in wealth and civilisation. Lat. 29° 30′ N. Lon. 39° 41′ E.

JOYNER, WILLIAM, joi'-ner, otherwise Lyde, became fellow of Magdalen College, but on turning Roman Catholic he went abroad. He returned at the Restoration, and retired to a village in Buckinghamshire, where he led a life of devotion. He wrote the "Roman Empress," a comedy, 1670; "Observations on the Life of Cardinal Pole," "Miscellaneous Poems, English and Latin."

Born at Oxford, 1622; died 1706.

JUAH, joo-ah, a county of Utah Territory, United States. Area, 1,100 square miles. Pop. 2,100. The capital is Nephi.

JUAN, JORGE, ju'-an, a knight of Malta, who accompanied Don Anthony de Ulloa and the French mathematicians to Peru, to ascertain the figure of the earth. He published Astronomical Observations on this voyage, prefixed to Ulloa's Historical Narrative. He also wrote a treatise on the construction and management of ships.

Born 1712; died at Madrid, 1774.

JUAN DEL RIO, SAN, a town of Mexico, in the department of Durango, to the south-west of the Lake of Parras. It has rich mines, and an extensive trade in a kind of brandy called vinomescal. Pop. 11,000.

JUAN DEL RIO, SAN, a town of Mexico, department Queretaro, 50 miles S.E. of the town of that name. Pop. 10,000.

JUAN, ST., a river of Nicaragua, flowing from the south end of Lake Nicaragua, and after a course of 120 miles entering the Carribbean Sea by several mouths. The whole course is navigable.

JUAN, SAN, a province of the Argentine Confederation, South America. Generally mountainous, occupying the space between the great cordillera of the Andes and the mountains of Cordova, but the soil, aided by artificial irrigation, is fertile, and produces corn and the grape in considerable quantities. In the south-east is the large Lake of Guanacache, and in the north gold mines. Area, 29,700 square miles. Pop. 91,000.

JUAN, SAN, capital of the above province, 120 miles N. of Mendoza. There is a considerable trade in figs, wine, and brandy. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 31° 4′ S. Lon. 68° 57′ E.

JUAN, SAN, DE NICARAGUA. (See GREY TOWN.)

JUAN, SAN, the chief of a group of islands situate in the Straits of Fuca (see FUCA), and lying between Vancouver's Island and the continent of N. America.

JUAN DE NOVA, a group in the Indian Ocean, to the north of Madagascar, consisting of two large and ten small islands. Lat. 10° 5′ to 10° 26′ S. Lon. 51° 2′ E.

JUAN - FERNANDEZ, or MAS-A-TIERRA, an island of the S. Pacific, about 400 miles from the coast of Chili, to which it belongs. The island is about 12 miles long, with an average breadth of four miles, and runs from east to west; its highest point, the Yunque, is about 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Yunque, or anvil (on account of its shape), rises abruptly like a wall, and is covered with dense foliage. In fact, the whole island is of a bold and rugged nature, with here and there in the valleys a grassy plat. The myrtle flourishes in all parts of the island, and is the principal wood; in addition to this the wild peach tree may be found in many places. There is also another plant similar to gigantic rhubarb, with a fruit or flower like chick-weed, and a stem like a bamboo. A large number of goats prowl about the island, and cattle seem to exist extremely well, so that fresh provisions may be obtained at a reasonable rate. The two principal anchorages are Cumberland and West Bays, the former accommodating a ship of any tonnage. On its shores are six conspicuous caves, formerly used by buccaneers as stores for their treasures. The only inhabitants are a small party of settlers, employed in taking seals and fish, and drying the latter for the Chilian market.

Lat.—33° 40′ S. Lon. 79° W.

History.—This island was discovered by Juan Fernandez, a Spaniard, in 1563, on a voyage from Valdivia to Lima, and for many years afterwards was used by the buccaneers frequenting the South Sea as a rendezvous. In the year 1709 Captain Rogers found on the island the celebrated Alexander Selkirk, who had been cast ashore from the ship Cinque Ports, and had then been on the island four years and four months. At some distance inland, about 1,800 feet above the sea-level, is a tablet with an inscription to his memory. The adventures of Selkirk, as is well known, suggested to Defoe the story of Robinson Crusoe; but it is quite erroneous to suppose that the author had any intention to lay the scene in Juan Fernandez. The island on which Crusoe is supposed to have lived is described as being at a short distance from the eastern coast of Guiana or Brazil, not in the South Pacific. The enforced seclusion of Selkirk also gave rise to a beautiful and well-known poem by Cowper. In 1741 Lord Anson visited the island with the remnants of his crews who had suffered severely from scurvy. In 1751 the Spaniards founded a colony, which was shortly after destroyed by an earthquake. The Chilian government made it a penal settlement in 1835, but the convicts overcame the troops, and it was given up as such.

JUAREZ, BENITO, hu-ar'-ez, president of the republic of Mexico, whose ancestors belonged to the Taheticos, one of the many Indian tribes of Mexico. He studied law, practised as an advocate, entered the Mexican Congress in 1846, and became the governor of Oaxaca from 1848 to 1852, when he was banished by Santa Anna. Joining in the insurrection which overthrew Santa Anna's government in 1855, he became first minister of justice, then secretary of state and president of the high court of justice, and finally president of the republic, in 1861. A protracted civil war ensued, but ultimately the French entered Mexico, caused Juarez to withdraw from the capital, and placed the Austrian archduke Maximilian on the throne, after proclaiming the empire. On the withdrawal of the French troops in 1866, Juarez, who had used every means to resist foreign invasion, renewed his attempts against the government of Maximilian, and having captured this unfortunate prince, by the aid of treachery, at Queretaro, in 1867, ordered him to be shot. On his return to power, he put to death hundreds of his opponents. He was re-elected to the presidency in 1871. He was a man of considerable ability, and honestly endeavoured to reform administrative abuses.

Born at Ixtlan, 1807; died 1872.

JUBA I., jū'-ba, king of Mauritania and Numidia. He took part with Pompey against Cæsar, for which he was driven from his throne. Upon this he killed himself in despair.

Died 42 B.C.

JUBA II., son of the preceding, was carried prisoner to Rome by Cæsar. He there became the favourite of Augustus, who gave him for a wife Cleopatra, daughter of Antony, and restored him to his throne. He wrote the "History of Arabia," "Antiquities of Syria," "History of Rome," and other works in Greek, fragments of which are extant.

Died about A.D. 19.

JUBBULPOOR, jub-bul-poor', a thriving town of India, presidency of Bengal, 155 miles N.E. of Nagpoor. There is a government school of industry. Manf. Carpets. Pop. 75,700.

JUCAR, hoo'-car, a river of Spain, crossing, in a south-easterly direction, the provinces of Cuenca and Valencia, and, after a course of 220 miles, entering the Mediterranean 4 miles south of Cape Cullera.

JUDÆA. (See PALESTINE.)

JUDA-HAKKADOSH, jū'-da hak'-ka-dosh, or the Saint, a famous rabbi in the time of the emperor Antoninus, to whom he was preceptor. He is said to have been the original compiler of the Mishna, or the Talmudical text.

Born 123; died 190.

JUDAH-CHIUG, jū'-da chi'-ug, a celebrated Jewish rabbi and grammarian. He was a native of Fez, and wrote many works, particularly an Arabic dictionary. He was called the prince of Jewish grammarians.

Lived in the 11th century.

JUDAH, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was the head of a tribe, to which his father gave the famous promise, that the sceptre should not depart from it till Messiah or Shiloh should come.

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF, was formed after the schism of Jeroboam, and was composed of two tribes. Its territory comprised scarcely the sixth portion of the kingdom of Judæa, but its population equalled that of the other ten tribes. The two kingdoms of Judah and Israel were perpetually in conflict with each other, and were at length subjugated by foreign powers. The kingdom of Judah, although smaller than its rival, endured longer. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who carried into captivity its last king. (See JEWS.)

JUDAS ISCARIOT, jū'-das is-kar'-i-ot, so called from the place of his birth—a city in the tribe of Ephraim. He was one of the disciples of our Lord, and purse-bearer. His avaricious disposition led him to betray his master to the Jews for thirty pieces of silver; but when he found that Jesus was condemned, he was seized with remorse, gave back the wages of his iniquity, and hanged himself.

JUDAS MACCABÆUS. (See MACCABEES, JUDAS.)

JUDE, ST., jude, an apostle of Jesus Christ, was called Lebbæus, Thaddæus, or the Zealous. He was the brother of St. James the Less, and preached the gospel in Mesopotamia, Arabia, Syria, Idumea, and Libya. He is said to have suffered martyrdom at Berytus. An epistle of his stands in the sacred canon as the last of the seven general epistles.

Died 80.

JUDENBERG, yoo'-den-bairg, a town of the Austrian empire, in the Tyrol, 40 miles N.W. of Gratz. It is surrounded by walls. There are an old ducal castle, two churches, and a convent, and in the neighbourhood is the modern palace of Lichtenstein. Manf. Gunpowder. Pop. 2,700.—Here, in 1797, an armistice with Napoleon I. was signed.

JUDITH, jū'-dith, a Jewish heroine, who, according to the apocryphal book which bears her name, lived in Bethuliah, when Holofernes, general of the king of Syria, laid siege to that city. Judith, in order to deliver her country, visited Holofernes, who, struck by her beauty, invited her to his tent. While he was asleep, she cut off his head, and made her escape with it to her countrymen, who, roused to enthusiasm, made a successful attack upon the enemy.

Lived in 7th century B.C.

JUGGERNAUT, or JAGGERNAUT, jug'-ger-nawt, from the Sanscrit Jugganat'ha, "Lord of the Universe;" also called Pooree, a town and celebrated temple of India, on the Bay of Bengal, 48 miles S. of Cuttack. The main street entirely consists of religious edifices, and at the south end stands the great temple of Juggernaut, the most celebrated shrine in India, to which pilgrims from every part of India flock in vast numbers throughout the year, but particularly at the great festival of the idol in March. Upwards of a million devotees are said to arrive annually. The temple, an immense structure of coarse red granite, was erected for the worship of Vishnu, the chief Hindoo god, in 1198, and was called Juggernaut, that being one of the names of the deity. For many miles round the temple, the whitening bones of the pilgrims are to be seen lying on the spot where the devotees have dropped and perished of want, disease, or fatigue. This circumstance has probably been the origin of a story, by no means well authenticated, which said that large numbers of the pilgrims sought death by flinging themselves beneath the wheels of Juggernaut's car. This car, upon which a rude carving of the idol is seated, is drawn forth annually from the temple by the devotees, and placed in a sacred grove near the building, where the pilgrims adore it. Lat. 19° 49′ N. Lon. 85° 54′ E. Pop. 30,000.

JUGURTHA, ju-gur'-tha, king of Numidia, the illegitimate son of Mastanabal, the brother of Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, and educated his nephew; but as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His designs were frustrated; Jugurtha proved brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons; but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha destroyed Hiempsal, stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome. The Romans listened to the complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators. Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha, and his firmness soon obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law, Bocchus, and was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger.

JUJUI, a province of the Argentine Confederation. Area. 30,000 square miles. Pop. 66,000.

JUJUI, hoo'-hoo-é, a city of the Argentine Confederation, 40 miles N.E. of Salta, on a river of the same name. Near it are several rich mines. Pop. 7,000.

JULALPUR, jul-al-poor', a town of British India, on the river Betwa, 100 miles S.W. of Lucknow. Pop. 10,000.

JULIA, ju'-li-a, a virgin martyr of Carthage. When that place was taken by Genseric, she was sold to a heathen merchant, and carried into Syria. Refusing to take part in some of the festivals instituted in honour of the female deities, she was put to death.

Died 440.

JULIA, the daughter of Cæsar and Cornelia, was one of the most virtuous of the Roman ladies. She married first Cornelius Cæpio, and afterwards Pompey.

Died about B.C. 53.

JULIA, the daughter of Augustus. Her beauty and accomplishments were very great, on which account she was her father's favourite, till her licentious conduct alienated his affections. She was successively the wife of Marcellus, Agrippa, and Tiberius. Augustus sent her into banishment, and when Tiberius came to the throne, he suffered her to perish of want. She had a daughter of the same name, who was as vicious as her mother.

Born 39 B.C.; died 14 A.D.

JULIA DOMNA, a native of Syria, and the wife of Severus, emperor of Rome, was a woman of great accomplishments, and well acquainted with philosophy and the sciences. On the death of Severus, her sons Caracalla and Geta succeeded to the imperial throne; the latter of whom was murdered by his brother in the arms of his mother, who was wounded in defending him. After the death of Caracalla, she is said to have starved herself to death on finding that Macrinus had assumed the imperial title.

Born 158; died 217.

JULIAN, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, ju'-li-an, emperor of Rome, surnamed "the Apostate," was the younger son of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. In the massacre of his family by the sons of Constantine, he and his brother Gallus narrowly escaped. The two princes were educated in the principles of Christianity, under Mardonius, a learned eunuch, but with different effects; for, though Gallus possessed real piety, the attachment of Julian to that religion was merely affected, having secretly a strong inclination to paganism. Being sent to Athens at the age of 24, he evinced this disposition by his application to astrology, magic, and other illusions. He attached himself particularly to a philosopher, named Maximus, who flattered his ambition by promising him the empire. He commanded with reputation in Gaul during the reign of Constantius, who, jealous of his success and popularity, recalled him. This gave so much offence to his soldiers, that they proclaimed him emperor, and, on the death of Constantius, in 361, he found himself in full possession of the imperial throne. He afterwards marched to the East, where his title was recognised as readily as it had been in the West. He then publicly renounced Christianity and opened the temples of the gods, in which he offered sacrifices: on this account he is called the Apostate. Soon after his accession, he resolved to chastise the Persians, who had frequently made inroads on the empire in the preceding reigns. When he crossed the Tigris, he burned his ships, that his soldiers might proceed with firmness and resolution. On his return, after marching through Assyria without opposition, his army encountered that of Sapor, king of Persia, and Julian was mortally wounded. Julian was virtuous and modest in his manners, and liberal in his disposition. He abolished the luxurious and indecent practices of the court of Constantinople, and was averse to public amusements. His "History of the Cæsars" is the most celebrated of his writings, though it is very partial.

Born at Constantinople, 331; died 363.

JULIANA, ju'-li-an'-a, an anchoret of Norwich, in the reign of Edward III., who assumed the prophetical character. She was the author of a singular book, entitled "Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love, showed to a Devout Servant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana, an Anchoret of Norwich, who lived in the days of King Edward III.," published by F. R. S. Cressy, 1610. She led a life of remarkable austerity, immuring herself between four walls during many years.

Lived in the 14th century.

JULICH, yoo'-leesh, a town of Prussia, 17 miles N.E. of Aix-la-Chapelle, at the confluence of the Eilbach and Rör, in the midst of a very fertile district. It is strongly fortified. Manf. Leather, soap, and vinegar. Pop. 5,300.

JULIEN, STANISLAS-AIGNAN, zhool'-cahn, a celebrated linguist and Chinese scholar, was born at Orleans. He studied Chinese under Rémusat in the College de France, and is said to have made such progress in the language in the space of twelve months as to execute a Latin translation of the works of the Chinese philosopher Mencius. His subsequent translations were numerous and important. He was also the author of several treatises on the industries and arts of the Chinese, and in 1869 he published the first part of a "Syntax of the Chinese Language." He was acquainted with nearly all the European languages, but was especially an orientalist. He succeeded Rémusat as professor at the College de France, became subsequently president of the college, and was conservator of the Imperial Library.

Born at Orleans, 1799; died 1873.

JULIEN-DU-SAULT ST., a town of France, department Yonne, 21 miles N.W. of Auxerre, on the right bank of the Sonne. Manf. Coarse cloth, worsted, and leather. Pop. 2,300.

JULIUS I., ju'-li-us, Pope, and saint of the Roman calendar, succeeded Marcus in 337. He strenuously supported the cause of Athanasius, and was a man of great learning and piety. Some of his letters are extant.

Died 352.

JULIUS II. (Giuliano della Rovere), succeeded Pope Pius III. in 1503. Sixtus IV. his uncle, made him cardinal and commander of his troops, a post which suited his enterprising genius. The emperor Maximilian, with the kings of France and Aragon, endeavoured to depose him; but he frustrated their design, and formed an alliance with them at Cambray in 1508. He then demanded from the Venetians the territories of Faenza and Rimini, which had been originally taken from them by Alexander VI., and on the death of that pontiff recovered by the Venetians, who, for refusing Julius's unjust claim, were put under an interdict. At last, being reduced to the greatest extremities, the state of Venice was obliged to submit. The pope then turned his arms against France, and besieged La Mirandola, which he entered in triumph in 1511; but, fortune turning, he was driven to Rome, and the council of Pisa declared him suspended. He was the patron of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Bramante.

Born 1441: died 1513.

JULIUS III. (Giovanni Maria della Monte), obtained the tiara in succession to Paul III. in 1550. He had formerly presided at the council of Trent under Paul III., and, on being elected to the papacy, joined the emperor against Octavius Farnese, duke of Parma.

Born 1487; died 1555.

JULUNDER, or JULINDER, ju-lin-der', a town in the Punjab, 80 miles E. of Lahore. It is surrounded by a large number of fine mausoleums. Pop. 52,000; capital of div. of same name, 2,421,781.

JUMBOOSIER, or JUMBUSER, jum-boo-seer', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Gujerat, 35 miles S.W. of Baroda, in the presidency of Bombay. The inhabitants are engaged principally in the cotton and grain trade. Pop. 10,500.

JUMET, zhoo'-mai, a town S.W. of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 3 miles from Charlerci. Manf. Glass and leather. There are extensive coal-works in its vicinity. Pop. 20,000.

JUMILLA, hoo-meel'-ya, a town of Spain, in Murcia, 65 miles from Carthagena. The streets are straight and wide, and on an adjoining hill are the ruins of an ancient castle. It has two churches, in one of which are some fine frescoes and paintings said to be by Rubens. Manf. Woollens, linens, soap, firearms, and pottery. Pop. 7,500.

JUMIÈGES, zhoo-me-aige', a village of France, department Seine-Inférieure, near the right bank of the Seine, 11 miles W. of Rouen. There are extensive remains of a splendid monastery founded in 661, the two lofty towers forming a conspicuous landmark. The edifice is of various dates, and exhibits specimens of several styles of architecture. Adjoining the monastery are the remains of a royal residence. Pop. 1,700.

JUMILLAC-LE-GRAND, zhoo-meel'-yac, a town of France, department Dordogne, near the sources of the Isle, 20 miles E. of Nontron. The old castle figured in the wars between England and France. There are blast furnaces and other ironworks. Seven annual fairs are held. Pop. 2,500.

JUMNA, jum'-na, a celebrated river of India, which has its source in the Himalaya mountains, at Jumnotri, 10,850 feet above the level of the sea. It passes the cities of Delhi and Agra, and, after a course of 680 miles, falls into the Ganges at Allahabad. The principal affluents are the Chumbal, Sind, Betwa, and Cane, on the right bank; the Hindon, Seergoor, and Rind on the left.

JUMNOTRI, jum-noo'-tre, a place of pilgrimage at the source of the Jumna. The name of the place refers to the spot where ablution is performed. It is also remarkable for hot springs. Lat. 30° 59′ N. Lon. 78° 35′ E. The heights of the three mountains known as the Jumnotri Peaks, are 20,122, 20,916, and 21,155 feet, respectively, above the sea level.

JUNCTIN, or GIUNTINO, FRANCIS, joon-te'-no, a mathematician of Florence, was for some time a Carmelite, but quitted his order, went to France, and abjured the Roman Catholic religion. He became a corrector of the press, and afterwards a manufacturer of paper and a banker, by which means he gained a large fortune. He wrote some arithmetical works, commentaries on the Sphere of Sacrobosco, on the Reformation of the Calendar, and on the Age of the "Loves of Petrarch."

Born 1523; died 1590.

JUNDIAHI, yoon-de-a-he', a town of Brazil, province of San Paulo, near the left bank of a river of the same name, 30 miles N.W. of the town of San Paulo. There is a Benedictine convent. Manf. Saddles and harness for mules. The sugar cane is extensively cultivated in the district. Pop. 8,000.

JUNG, JOHANN HEINRICH, yung, more generally known as Jung Stilling, was born at Imgrund, in Nassau, studied medicine at Strasburg, and settled as a practitioner at Elberfeld, where he was especially successful in operations for cataract. He was subsequently professor at Marburg and Heidelberg. In his student days he formed a close intimacy with Goethe. He published an autobiography in three vols. 1777 and 1778, which were followed at intervals by other works of a similar character. In religion Jung has been described as a "pietistic rationalist." His collected works were published at Stuttgart in 1838, in 14 vols.

Born 1740; died 1817.

JUNGFRAU, yoong'-frou (the Maiden), a lofty mountain of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern, 13,671 feet above the level of the sea. In 1804 it was first ascended by the brothers Aaron, and again by them in 1812. In 1828 it was scaled by six peasants; and, in 1841, by Forbes, of Edinburgh, and Agassiz, of Neufchâtel. It ranks as the eighth in height of the mountains of Europe.

JUNIEN, ST., zhoo'-ne-a, a town of France, department Haute-Vienne, at the confluence of the Vienne and Glane, 19 miles N.W. of Limoges. There is an ancient and beautiful church. Manf. Woollens, gloves, paper, leather, wax, stoneware, and porcelain. Pop. 7,200.

JUNIUS, ADRIAN, ju'-ni-us, a learned Dutchman, who studied physic, and took his doctor's degree at Bologna, after which he went to England, where he wrote several works, particularly a Greek and Latin lexicon, which he dedicated to Edward VI. He afterwards returned to his own country and practised physic. He wrote "Commentaries on various Latin Authors," "A Poem on the Marriage of Philip II., king of Spain, with Mary, Queen of England;" "Translations from the Greek," &c.

Born at Hoorn, 1515; died 1575.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, professor of divinity at Leyden. He studied at Geneva, and, in 1565, became minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp, and afterwards chaplain to the prince of Orange; at last, he was made theological professor at Leyden. He is chiefly known by a Latin version of the Bible, with notes, in which he was assisted by Tremellius.

Born 1545; died at Leyden, 1602.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, son of the preceding. In 1620 he visited England, and was taken into the family of Thomas, earl of Arundel. There he studied the northern languages, in which he attained to considerable proficiency. He left a valuable collection of MSS. to the library of Oxford.

Born at Heidelberg, 1589; died at Windsor, 1677.

JUNIUS, the assumed name of a political writer, who, between the years 1769 and 1772, published some remarkable letters to celebrated persons, in the "Public Advertiser." Although both printer and bookseller were prosecuted, the author eluded all inquiry at the time; and, notwithstanding various conjectures have been started on the subject, supported on more or less plausibility, their author is still positively unknown. These letters have been ascribed to Mr. Burke, who solemnly disclaimed the imputation. Mr. William Gerard Hamilton, commonly called Single-speech Hamilton, was also suspected; but he likewise denied the charge. Other persons to whom they have been imputed are Lord Chesterfield, John Wilkes, Mr. Dunning (afterwards Lord Ashburton), Lord Temple, Lord Grenville, Horne Tooke, Lord George Sackville, Colonel Barré, Lord Lyttelton, and, lastly, Sir Philip Francis, whose claims to their authorship would appear to be the best founded. (See FRANCIS, Philip.) The letters are written in a nervous, clear, and masterly style.

JUNIUS BRUTUS. (See BRUTUS.)

JUNKSEYLON, or SALANG, junk'-se-lon', an island at the S.E. extremity of the Bay of Bengal, lying on the W. coast of the Malay peninsula, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. It is 25 miles long by about 10 broad, is hilly and fertile, and produces edible birds' nests, and wood. It has numerous herds of buffaloes, hogs, and deer. Pop. about 5,000, consisting of a mixture of Malays, Chinese, Siamese, and Birmans. Lat. 7° 46' N. Lon. 98° 18' E.

JUNO, jū'-no (in Greek, HERA), the queen of the gods, according to the Roman mythology, was daughter of Saturn and Ops, and sister to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Vesta, Ceres, &c. Her brother Jupiter was not insensible to her charms, and proposed to marry her, and the nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greatest solemnity: the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. The worship of Juno was universal, and even more so than that of Jupiter, according to some authors. Her sacrifices were offered with the greatest solemnity. Among the birds, the hawk, the goose, and particularly the peacock, often called the bird of Juno, were sacred to her; and the dittany, the poppy, and the lily were her favourite flowers. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, she had the privilege of hurling the thunder of Jupiter when she pleased. Her temples were numerous; the most famous of which were at Argos and Olympia. The surnames of Juno are various; they are derived either from the function or things over which she presided, or from the places where her worship was established. She was the goddess of all power and empire, and she was also the patroness of riches. She was represented sitting on a throne, with a diadem on her head and a golden sceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally sat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her sceptre; while Iris, behind her, displayed the thousand colours of her beautiful rainbow. The Roman consuls, when they entered upon office, were always obliged to offer her a solemn sacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana.

JUNOT, ANDOCHE, zhod'-no, duke of Abrantes, a French general. He entered the army as a volunteer during the Revolution, and attracted the attention of Bonaparte at the siege of Toulon, in 1793. This was the origin of his fortune: he was appointed aide-de-camp, and went with the army to Egypt, where he so greatly distinguished himself that, on his return, he became general of division, and, in 1804, governor of Paris. In 1805 he was sent as ambassador to Lisbon, and two years afterwards assumed the command of the army sent into Portugal. Junot rapidly made himself master of that kingdom, and was created governor, with the title of duke of Abrantes; but the next year he was defeated at Vimeira by the duke of Wellington, compelled to sign the capitulation of Cintra, and obliged to abandon his conquest. This reverse brought him under the displeasure of Napoleon; he nevertheless took part, in 1810, in the Spanish campaign, and in that of Russia in 1812, becoming governor of the Illyrian provinces. His reason suddenly failing, he was compelled to return to France, and was taken to his father's house, near Dijon, where he threw himself from a window and fractured his thigh-bone. Amputation was performed, but Junot tore off the bandages, and died a few days afterwards. His widow, a woman of great accomplishments, wrote some "Memoirs on the Empire," which are full of interest.

Born at Bussy-le-Grand, 1771; died 1813.

JUNTA, PHILIP, joon'-ta, Italian printer in the 15th and 16th centuries. He printed, at Lyons, the Letters of Leo X. by Bembo, and the works of other authors. He had, also, printing offices at Genoa, Venice, and Florence, and produced some excellent editions of Greek authors, as Plutarch, Xenophon, Aristophanes, Sophocles, and Homer.

Born 1450; died 1519.

JUPITER, jū'-pi-ter, in Roman mythology (or Greek mythology, ZEUS), the most powerful of all the gods, was the son of Saturn and Ops. He was saved from destruction by his mother, and intrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan, on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops concealed Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on Mount Ida, in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa. He received the name Jupiter. As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by his son. Saturn, however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was, for this treachery, driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly into Latium. Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, whom he subdued by the assistance of Hercules. Jupiter now gave himself up to pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Eurynome, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. His intrigues with Danaë, Antiope, Leda, Europa, Ægina, Calisto, and Alcmena, are all well known. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. He was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak is sacred to him, because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented sitting upon a golden throne, holding, in one hand, thunderbolts just ready to be hurled, in the other a sceptre; and an eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon, in Libya. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and everything was subservient to his will, except the Fates.

JURA, joo'-ra, a mountain-chain of Europe, belonging to the system of the Alps, commencing near Geneva, and extending N. along the frontier of France and Switzerland, separating the departments of the Ain, the Jura, and the Doubs, from the cantons of Geneva, Vaud, Neufchatel, and Bern. The Rhine divides the range into the Swiss, or French, and the German Jura. The highest peaks are Reculet, Tendre, the Colombier, and the Dole. All these are between 5,500 and 5,700 feet high. The range is about 220 miles long, with a breadth of about 62 miles at its broadest part. Many of its sides are covered with woods in which are numerous wolves and a few brown bears.

JURA, a department in the E. of France, bounded by Switzerland on the E., and by the French territory in every other direction. It is mountainous, being covered in the E. by the principal chain of the Jura, but intersected by many beautiful and fertile valleys, and a low plain is near the western bed. The usual cerealia and the grape are cultivated; the pastures being rich and extensive, vast numbers of cattle are reared, and the produce of the dairy forms a principal source of wealth to the inhabitants.

Rivers.—The Ain, Doubs, and Loire.
Minerals.—Iron, marble, alabaster, and coal; and there are some saline and mineral springs.
Manf.—Principally iron, woollens, linen, leather, clocks, watches, and articles of wood and ivory.
Area.—1,943 square miles.
Pop.—285,263.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 584 communes. The chief towns are Lons-le-Saulnier, the capital, Poligny, Sainte-Claude, and Dôle.

JURA, a river rising near Ratova, in the Russian government of Wilna, and, after a course of 75 miles, falling into the Niemen, above Tilsit.

JURA, one of the Hebrides, or Western islands of Scotland, situate to the N.E. of the island of Islay, and opposite to the district of Knapdale, in Argyleshire, to which county it is annexed. It is 27 miles long, with a mean breadth of about 5, and is the most rugged of the W. isles, being composed chiefly of huge rocks, piled on one another in the utmost apparent disorder, naked, and incapable of cultivation. The mountainous ridges terminate in four similar peaked mountains, called the Paps of Jura, the highest of which attains an elevation of 2,556 feet. All the inhabitants live on the E. side. Here, along the margin of the sea, the coast is pretty level. The only crops are oats, barley, potatoes, and flax; the chief manure is the seaweed which is cast ashore. There is only one small village, called Jura, on the E. coast of the island, inhabited by a few fishermen. The Gaelic is the only language spoken in the island. Pop. 761. Lat. 56° 2′ N. Lon. 5° 51′ W.

JURANÇON, zhoo'-ran-sohn, a town of France, department Basses Pyrénées, 1 mile W. of Pau, on the side of a hill where are excellent vineyards. Pop. 2,200.

JURIEU, PETER, zhoo'-re(r), a French Protestant divine, was the son of Daniel Jurieu, pastor of the reformed church at Mer, in the diocese of Blois. His mother was sister to the famous Peter du Moulin. He received his education partly in Holland and partly in England, and while there received episcopal ordination. On his return home, he became assistant to his father, and professor of divinity and Hebrew at Sedan, where he gained great reputation by his lectures and preaching. He wrote against Bossuet's "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church," and defended the moral character of his sect against the accusations of Arnauld. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he retired to Holland, and was chosen pastor of the Walloon church at Rotterdam. He there applied assiduously to the study of the Book of Revelation, and believed he had discovered most of the mysteries therein, particularly with regard to Antichrist. He addressed William III. king of England, as the instrument appointed to destroy the kingdom of the beast. He embroiled himself in controversy with Bayle and Beauval, who had objected to the extravagance of his opinions. His chief works are, "The History of Calvinism and Popery, with a Parallel between them;" "Pastoral Letters," "On the Unity of the Church," "Treatise of Nature and Grace," and "Critical History of the Doctrines and Worship of the Church, and those of the Pagans."

Born at Mer, in France, 1637; died at Rotterdam, 1713.

JURIEV POLSKOI, joo'-re-ev pols'-koi, an ancient town of Russia, government of Vladimir, at the confluence of the Kolokocha with the Snakscha, 39 miles N.W. of Vladimir. There are five churches and a monastery. Manf. Silk, calico, and leather. Pop. 5,000.

JURIEV POVOLSKOI, po-vols'-koi, a town of Russia, government of Kostroma, on the left bank of the Volga, 90 miles S.E. of Kostroma. Pop. 2,800.

JURIN, JAMES, ju'-rin, secretary to the Royal Society of London, and president of the College of Physicians. He wrote papers on philosophical and medical subjects in the "Philosophical Transactions," and had disputes with Michelotti on the motion of currents; with Keill and Senac on the motion of the heart; with Robins upon distinct vision; and with the partisans of Leibnitz on the active forces.

Born 1684; died 1750.

JURUA, hoo-roo'-ha, a river of South America, an affluent of the Amazons, having its sources in the north-east of Peru. The length of the course, generally in a north-easterly direction, is 540 miles.

JURUENA, hoo-roo-hai'-na, a river of South America, and for a great part of its course forming the boundary between Brazil and Peru. It joins the Arinos, after a course of 460 miles, in lat. 9° 30′ S.

JURZEN, yoor'-zen, a river of Russia, rising on the western slope of the Ural mountains, and joining the Ufa, on the left bank, after a course of 140 miles.

JUSHPORE, joosh-pore', a native state of India under British protection, in the S.W. of Bengal. The country is a table land containing much uncleared jungle. The produce is chiefly rice, oil, and wild silk. Area, 617 square miles. Pop. 67,000.

JUSSEY, zhoos'-se, a town of France, department Haute-Sâone, on the right bank of the Amance, 19 miles N.W. of Vesoul. It is a place of great antiquity, and endured a famous siege in 1595. Pop. 2,900.

JUSSIEU, ANTOINE DE, zhoos'-se-u(r), a French botanist and physician. After travelling over Europe, he settled at Paris, where he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and professor of botany in the Royal Garden. He enriched the memoirs of the French Academy with several valuable papers on botany and mineralogy, the result of observations made during his travels. He also wrote the appendix to Tournefort's "Institutions of Botany," and abridged Barrelier's work upon the Plants of France, Spain, and Italy; he was likewise the author of a "Discourse on the Progress of Botany."

Born at Lyons, 1686; died 1758.

JUSSIEU, BERNARD DE, brother of the above. He distinguished himself as an able physician and botanist. He became professor and demonstrator in the Royal Garden, and was chosen a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of several foreign societies. He published an edition of Tournefort's "History of Plants in the Environs of Paris," and was the author of a book entitled "The Friend of Humanity; or the Advice of a Good Citizen to the Nation."

Born at Lyons, 1699; died at Paris, 1777.

JUSSIEU, JOSEPH DE, brother of the preceding, was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and accompanied Condamine to Peru in 1735. He was not only a good naturalist and physician, but an excellent engineer. He published a journal of his voyages.

Born at Lyons, 1704; died 1779.

JUSSIEU, LAURENT DE, a celebrated French botanist, nephew of the preceding, was the greatest philosopher of his family, and author of the "Natural System of Botany." He went to Paris, in 1765, to complete his studies, under the direction of his uncle Bernard. In 1770 he took the degree of doctor of medicine, and was soon afterwards chosen professor of botany in the Royal Garden. In 1789, he published his great work, the "Genera Plantarum," in which, for the first time, the whole vegetable kingdom was arranged according to a natural classification. He subsequently filled many important scientific posts in Paris, and continued till his eighty-eighth year to dictate valuable memoirs on the science of botany. The great work of Jussieu, in an improved and amended form, is one of the chief text-books on botany, not only in France but in England.

Born at Lyons, 1748; died at Paris, 1836.

JUSSIEU, ADRIEN DE, son of the above, was educated for the medical profession, but devoted himself to the science which his father had so greatly benefited. In 1826 he succeeded his father as professor of botany; and, although he wrote no large work on the science, he contributed a great number of valuable memoirs relative to it to the scientific annals of France. He also contributed to the "Natural History" of Milne-Edwards. He was a member, and afterwards president, of the French Academy of Sciences.

Born at Paris, 1797; died at the same place, 1853.

JUST, ST. (See SAINT JUST.)

JUST, ST. (LA PENDUE), a town of France, department Loire, 12 miles S.E. of Roanne. Pop. 3,200.

JUST, ST. (SUR-LOIRE), a town of France, department Loire, on the right bank of the Loire, 12 miles S.E. of Montbrison. The river is crossed by a suspension bridge. Manf. Shawls, printed collars, bottles, and chemicals. Pop. 2,300.

JUSTEL, CHRISTOPHER, zhoos'-tel, counsellor and secretary to the king of France. He published, "The Code of Canons of the Universal Church," and the "Councils of Africa, with Notes;" also "The Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne."

Born at Paris, 1580; died 1649.

JUSTEL, HENRY, son of the above, and his successor as counsellor and secretary. He was a man of learning and liberality, and so partial to England that he sent his father's MSS. to the university of Oxford, which learned body complimented him in return with the degree of LL.D. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to London, and was appointed keeper to the king's library.

Born 1620; died 1693.

JUSTI, JOHANN HEINRICH GOTTLIEB VON, yoos'-te, German mineralogist, who was appointed member of the Council of Mines. He afterwards became professor of political economy and natural history at Göttingen. He wrote treatises on mineralogy and on money, for some free remarks in which, on the states of Prussia and Wirtemberg, he was confined for a considerable time in the castle of Breslau. He had projected a German Encyclopædia, and wrote some pamphlets against eminent naturalists.

Born 1720; died 1771.

JUSTIN, jus'-tin, a Roman author of the 3rd or 4th century. His history is mainly a compilation from an earlier work of Trogus Pompeius, which has not been preserved.

JUSTINIANI, BERNARD, joos'-teen-e-a'-ne, a Venetian noble, was sent as ambassador to Louis XI. of France, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In 1474 he was made procurator of St. Mark, the second dignity of the republic of Venice. He wrote a History of Venice and other works.

Born 1408; died 1489.

JUSTINIANI, AUGUSTIN, bishop of Nebio, in Corsica. Francis I. of France made him his almoner and royal professor of Hebrew at Paris. He perished in a shipwreck in sailing from Genoa to Corsica.

Born at Genoa, 1476; died 1536.

JUSTINIANUS, or JUSTINIAN, I., jus-tin-e-a'-nus, emperor of the East, succeeded his uncle Justinus I. in 527. He was the protector of Christianity, and carried his arms with success against his enemies, for which he was chiefly indebted to his general Belisarius, who also preserved him from a formidable conspiracy. Peace being restored, Justinianus formed into a body all the Roman laws, a work which was executed under the title of "Digests" or "Pandects." After this great work was finished, the laws of modern date were collected into one volume, called the "Novellæ." He exerted himself against the ecclesiastical encroachments of Popes Sylverius and Vigilius. He built many churches, particularly the famous Saint Sophia at Constantinople, and abolished the consulate.

Born at Tauresium (site of the modern Kustendje) 483; died 565.

JUSTINIANUS II., was the elder son of Constantine III., whom he succeeded on the throne of Constantinople in 685. He recovered several provinces from the Saracens, and made an advantageous peace with them; but his exactions, cruelties, and debaucheries tarnished the glory of his arms. He formed the design of destroying all the inhabitants of Constantinople, which being discovered, the tyrant was deposed in 694, and banished to the Crimea. Leo the Patrician gained the throne, but he was displaced by Tiberius. About 704, Justinianus, being aided by the Bulgarians, regained his crown, but was slain, with his son Tiberius, by Philippicus Bardanes his successor.

Born 670; died 711.

JUSTINUS I., jus-ti'-nus, emperor of the East. He rose to the rank of general from being a private soldier, before which he was a swineherd. The soldiers of the prætorian band forced him to accept the imperial dignity on the death of Anastasius, in 518. He recalled the bishops who had been banished by the Arians, and published several severe edicts against that sect. Hearing of the destruction of Antioch by an earthquake, he laid aside the imperial robes, clothed himself in sackcloth, and passed several days in fasting and prayer, to avoid divine judgment. He rebuilt that city, and other places which were destroyed by the same calamity.

Born 470; died 527.

JUSTINUS II. was the nephew and successor of Justinianus I. in 565. He caused his cousin Justinus to be strangled, and put to death some of his senators from a suspicion of their being disaffected. He made war against Chosroes, king of Persia, who, being defeated at the head of a numerous army, was obliged to sue for peace. Justinus married Sophia, niece of Theodora, wife of the emperor Justinianus, a woman of high spirit, who, taking advantage of her husband's weakness, governed the empire in conjunction with Tiberius.

Died 578.

JUSTINUS, a Latin historian, who made an abridgment of the "Universal History" written by Trogus Pompeius. This work remains, but the original is lost.

Lived in the 2nd century.

JUSTINUS, commonly called Justin Martyr, a Christian philosopher and martyr in the 2nd century. His parents were heathens, and himself a zealous adherent to the Platonic philosophy; but, disputing with a Christian in 132, he was converted to that faith, though he still continued to wear the pallium, or cloak of the Grecian philosophers. He was an equal honour to Christianity by his knowledge, his firmness, and the purity of his life. A persecution breaking out against the Christians under Antoninus, Justinus presented to that emperor an admirable apology in their behalf, which had the desired effect. He afterwards addressed another apology to Marcus Aurelius, in which he defended his co-religionists against the calumnies of Crescentius, a Cynic philosopher. This last is said to have gained him the crown of martyrdom. Besides these apologies, his dialogue with Trypho, a learned Jew, and some other pieces in the Greek language, are extant. The best edition of his works is that of Jena, 1844.

Died 165.

JUTECALPA, joo-te-kal'-pa, a town of Honduras, Central America, capital of the department of Olancho. It is situated 4,000 feet above the sea level. It is the commercial centre of eastern Honduras. Pop. 4,000.

JUTERBOCK, yoo'-ter-bok, a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, on the Nuthe, 27 miles S. of Potsdam. Manf. Woollens and linens. Pop. 6,700.

JUTES, jutes, an ancient people of Germany, who belonged to the Gothic race, and gave name to Jutland.

JUTLAND, jut'-land, a province of Denmark, which formerly comprised the whole peninsula, forming the mainland of the Danish dominions; but the name of Jutland is now confined to the northern half of the peninsula. Jutland is inclosed on all its sides, except the S., by the sea. On that side it is bounded by Schleswig. It is very irregular in shape, narrowing in the north to a point, the breadth in the centre being 106 miles, and at its southern base 70 miles. The greatest length is 180 miles. The coast line is estimated at 523 miles. The E. coast, particularly from Aarhuus in the south, 277 miles in length, has several good harbours and inlets, and presents a succession of fertile elevations; whilst the west coast faces the German Ocean for more than 246 miles, and presents, almost without interruption, a long line of sand-banks and reefs. On this side there is hardly a single harbour or navigable creek. On the north coast is an immense range of sand-banks, which often rise almost to the surface of the water, and, with the numerous currents, render the navigation extremely hazardous. The degree of its fertility is various: in some places the pasturages are excellent; but they are bordered by a chain of small hills of moving sand, which does infinite mischief. The southern division of the W. coast, particularly below Ribe or Ripen, consists of alluvial soil, deposited by the ocean, of surprising fertility, but marshy and unhealthy. Dykes are necessary, as in Holland, to prevent the inroads of the sea. The climate is temperate, but variable, and on the west coast especially, mists are of very frequent occurrence.

Rivers.—Not numerous, and none of great size, the largest being the Lonberg, Guden, Stor, Skjern, Warde Könge, Skive, and Holm: but the want of them is amply compensated by a number of bays, or inlets of the sea, which run up a great way into the country, especially the Lymfiord. (See DENMARK.)

Zoology.—Game is abundant; and a few boars are still found in the forests.

Pro.—Rye is the kind of corn most generally cultivated. The pasturages, however, are rich and extensive. The culture of potatoes is progressively extending; but, in general, the state of agriculture is very backward. The principal exports are corn and cattle; of the former, the great articles are rye and oats; the other exports are stockings, woollens, and earthenware.

Area.—About 8,500 square miles.

Pop.—868,511, considered to be the best representatives of the old Danish stock.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—The province is divided into 10 amts, or districts. The most important towns are AARHUUS, AALBORG, and WIBORG.

Lat. between 55° 25′ and 57° 45′ N. Lon. between 8° 7′ and 10° 48′ E.

JUVARA, PHILIP, yoo-va'-ra, an Italian architect, who was employed by the king of Sardinia to build some fine structures at Turin. In 1734 the royal palace at Madrid being burnt, Philip V., king of Spain, sent for him to erect another, more magnificent; he made a design, which was approved of, but the commencement of the work being delayed from day to day, it is supposed the architect died of chagrin.

Born at Messina, 1668; died 1735.

JUVENAL, DECIMUS JUNIUS, joo'-ve-nal, a Roman satirical poet. He went to Rome when young, and was for some time a pleader, after which he applied himself to writing satires with great success. Domitian sent him into honourable exile, by appointing him to a military command on the frontiers of Egypt. The best translations of Juvenal's works are those of Dryden, Gifford, and Hodgson. The biographical notices preserved differ so materially that it is impossible to fix with precision the date of his birth or death.

Lived in the latter half of the 1st, and beginning of the 2nd century.

JUVENTAS, ju-ven'-tas, in Roman mythology, a goddess, who presided over youth and vigour. She is the same as the Hebe of the Greeks, and was represented as a beautiful nymph in variegated garments.

JUXON, WILLIAM, juz'-on, archbishop of Canterbury. He studied at St. John's College, Oxford, of which, in 1621, he was elected president. In 1633 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and the year following appointed to the bishopric of Hereford, but, before consecration, he was advanced to the see of London. In 1635 he was appointed lord high treasurer, which excited great indignation against Archbishop Laud, as the means of it; but the conduct of Bishop Juxon in that dignity was irreproachable. He suffered, in the rebellion, the loss not only of his ecclesiastical revenues, but a great part of his temporal estate. In 1648 he attended the king upon the scaffold, after which the regicides caused him to be taken into custody, to make him reveal what Charles I. had secretly intrusted to him. At the Restoration he was made archbishop of Canterbury.

Born 1582; died 1663.

JYNTEAH, jin'-te-ah, a district of British India, formerly an independent state, but now annexed to Sylhet. It is about 108 miles long, and 57 broad. The southern part consists of a well-watered and fertile plain. The other parts of the district have mountains of moderate elevation. Lat. 25° to 26° N. Lon. 91° to 93° E. The capital of the district is Jynteahpoor, 20 miles N.E. of Sylhet.

KÆMPFER, ENGELBERT, kæmf'-pfer, a German physician and traveller, who, in 1683, accompanied, as secretary, the Swedish ambassador to Moscow and Ispahan. He afterwards embarked in a Dutch vessel, visited India, and then proceeded to Japan, making many valuable observations relative to the natural history of that country. He returned to Europe in 1693, and took up his residence in his native land, where he occupied himself in writing memoirs upon the countries he had seen. He left a collection of valuable manuscripts, which Sir Hans Sloane published in English in 1797, under the title of "History of Japan." This work was afterwards translated into German and French.

Born at Lemgo, 1651; died 1716.

KAFA, kaf'-fa, a country of East Africa, south of Abyssinia, consisting of an elevated plain, about 5,000 feet above the sea level, to the south of the river Godafe, or Gojeb. Very little is known of the country or the inhabitants, who are of the Abyssinian type. This is the native country of the coffee plant, and from which its name is derived. The chief town is Bonga.

KAFFA, CAFFA, FEODOSIA, or THEODOSIA, a seaport of the Crimea.

KAFFIR, or KAFIR, kaf'-fer, the name given by the Arabs and early Portuguese settlers of the east coast of Africa to the natives of the regions lying to the south of Mozambique, and extending to the country of the Hottentots. The name is derived from the Arabic Kiafir, "an unbeliever." They are a fine warlike race, of a dark brown colour, and in the north of the territory inhabited by them assimilate to the Negro type. They have no defined religious views, but are very superstitious. The name Kaffir is now generally restricted to the tribes occupying the district between Cape Colony and Natal, those dwelling near the east coast being known as Zulus. The Betjuans, or Bechuanas, are in the north and north-west, towards Lake Ngami; and the Damaras near the west coast. It is estimated that the Kaffir tribes number about 3,000,000, spread over a territory of about 1,000,000 square miles. (See KAFFRARIA PROPER, KAFFRARIA BRITISH, and NATAL.)

KAFFRARIA, PROPER, or INDEPENDENT, kaf-fra'-re-a, that portion of South Africa occupied by the Kaffirs, not yet under British rule, extending from the Kei River on the E., to the boundary of Natal on the N.W., and bounded to the N. by the Transkeran Territories, recently annexed to the Cape. Very much of it presents a broken surface, especially near the coast, where the river generally runs in deep beds. It is well watered and wooded, and generally has a rich and fertile soil. Along the coast slopes of the mountains are large grassy plains. The coast is rocky and dangerous, and the anchorages are unsafe.

Rivers.—The Kei, Umzimvoobo, or St. John's (with its branches), the Tsetse and Tena; the Umzimculu, Umtata, Umtamkee, and other streams, generally mountain torrents, with short courses, and unnavigable.

Pro.—Corn, pumpkins, and cotton. There are extensive forests, whence excellent timber of many ornamental and useful kinds might be obtained. A trade is carried on with the adjacent colonies in hides, horns, tallow, and timber.

Area.—25,000 square miles.

Pop.—220,000. The Amapondo Kaffir tribes inhabit that part of the country next Natal. The Amagcleka Kaffirs inhabit the coast region, next the Kei, while the Tambookie Kaffirs are located further north.

KAFFRARIA, BRITISH, the name, until recently, given to the region between the Kei rivers, the Keiskamma, and the Indian Ocean, and now a portion of Cape Colony, forming the divisions of King William's Town and East London. It is bounded on the N. by the Amatola range, about 4,000 feet high, a continuation of the great Wintenberg and Katberg ranges. There are many fertile and well-watered valleys, and extensive districts, including elevated grassy plateaus, well adapted for grazing and agricultural purposes.

Rivers.—The Keiskamma, Chumie, Buffalo, Gonubi, and several mountain torrents. The Great Kei separates the district from Kaffraria Proper.

Area.—4,500 square miles.

Pop.—119,000, of whom about 9,500 are Europeans, or of European descent.

Chief Towns.—King William's Town, the capital, and the port of East London, at the mouth of the Buffalo river.

History.—British Kaffraria was constituted an independent colony in 1861, and annexed to Cape Colony in 1865.

KAFIRISTAN, kaf-ir-is-tan', a country of Central Asia, on the southern slope of the Hindoo-Koosh, the spurs of the range dividing it into long narrow valleys. The soil is fertile, and timber and metals are abundant. Area, 7,000 square miles. Pop. the number is unascertained. They differ from the neighbouring tribes in language and appearance, and seem to have a greater affinity with European races. They maintain an isolated and independent existence. The name given to the country by the Mahomedan neighbours, means "country of the infidels." Lat. 35° to 36° N. Lon. 69° 20′ to 71° 20′ E.

KAGALNIK, ka-gal-nik', a river of Southern Russia, flowing in a south-easterly direction, and, after a course of 110 miles, discharging into the Black Sea, by a large lagoon.

KAGOSIMA, ka'-go-si-ma, a town and seaport of Japan, on the south of the island of Kiusiu, near the head of a harbour 40 miles long and 12 wide. The town is strongly fortified, and there is a manufactory of arms and ammunition after the European model. Bombarded and nearly destroyed by the English in 1863. Pop. 47,580.

KAHLA, ka'-la, a town of Saxe-Altenburg, Germany, on the left bank of the Saale, 8 miles from Jena. It is walled and has three suburbs; on the opposite side of the river (crossed by a bridge) is the old castle of Leuchtenberg, now a prison. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, leather, chemicals, and tiles. Pop. 2,800.

KAIFFA. (See CAIFFA.)

KAI-FUNG, or KAE-FUNG-FOO, kai-foong', a large town of China, capital of the province of Honan, on the right bank of the Yellow River, which frequently inundates it, notwithstanding that many miles of dykes have been erected. This town is the principal place in China for Jews, who have a very large place of worship. Lat. 34° 55′ N. Lon. 114° 20′ E.

KAINSH, kainsh, a town of Asiatic Russia, in Siberia, government of Tomsk, on the Om. Large fairs, chiefly for furs, are held, and are frequented by traders from all parts of Siberia. Lat. 53° 30′ N. Lon. 78° 30′ E. Pop. 4,100.

KAIOUK, or GAIOU-KHAN, kai'-ouk, third grand khan of the Mongols, was son of Oktai, and grandson of Ghengis-Khan. He completed the conquest of China, commenced by his father, but died suddenly in the midst of his victories. Kaiouk is called, among the sovereigns of China, Ting-Tsoung.

Born about 1205; died 1248.

KAIRA, kai'-ra, a town of British India, province of Gujerat, 52 miles N.W. of Baroda; has a court-house, prison and a large European church. Pop. 12,681; of district of same name, 804,800.

KAIRWAN, or KAIROAN, kar'-wan, a city of Northern Africa, 80 miles S. of Tunis. The great Okbah mosque is esteemed at once the most magnificent and most sacred in Barbary. It contains many ancient and beautiful pillars of marble, granite, and porphyry. There are nearly 50 other mosques. Manf. Morocco leather, saddlery, boots, and slippers, and there is a trade in furs. Pop. 12,000.—In the 9th century this was the capital of the Arab dominions in Africa. It still has numerous remains of antiquity.

KAMNITZ, kam'-nitz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, in a mountainous district, 25 miles N.E. of Leitmeritz. There are a chapel, to which pilgrimages are made, and the ruins of an old castle. Pop. 3,200.

KAMOURASKA, kam'-our-as-ka, a county of the province of Quebec, dominion of Canada, on the right bank of the St. Lawrence. Area, 1,077 square miles. Pop. 21,500, nearly all of French descent.

KAMPEN, kam'-pen, a town of the Netherlands, province of Overyssel, on the Yssel, which is crossed by a good bridge. Manf. Chiefly woollens. A good general trade is carried on. Pop. 8,524.

KAMTCHATKA, kamt-chat'-ka, a peninsula on the N.E. of Asia, forming part of the Russian government of Irkutsk, and the district of Okhotsk, to which it is joined at its N. extremity. It is bounded on the E. by the Sea of Kamtchatka, on the W. by the Sea of Okhotsk, on the S. by the Pacific, and on the N. by the country of the Tchuktches. It is 725 miles long, with a breadth of 280 at its widest parts, and is traversed by a range of lofty mountains, extending the whole length of the peninsula. About 14 of these are volcanic; but the most remarkable is Plutchevesky, 16,000 feet high, situate near Nijni Kamtchatsk, the volcano of which was formerly very active. The soil is generally stony, but there are many tracts suitable for cultivation.

Rivers.—The Kamtchatka, which has a course of 150 miles, with its principal affluent the Jelowka. Kurile Lake has a length of 20 miles, and a breadth of 12.

Zoology.—A great variety of animals, which produce the richest and most valuable furs. The sable is more plentiful here than in Siberia, though its fur is not quite so beautiful. There are several varieties of the Arctic fox, or fire-fox of Kamtchatka. The other animals are the beaver, the hare, the marmot, and the argali, or wild sheep. The bear is the most formidable, and the hunting of it the most serious occupation of the Kamtchatdale. Sledge-dogs, of great strength and sagacity, are reared in large numbers. Game is abundant, particularly woodcocks, snipes, grouse, wild geese, and ducks, the eggs of which last are collected by the natives, and preserved in the fat of fish. The coasts and rivers swarm with fish, which form the main article of food to the inhabitants. The excellence of the salmon, herrings, and different kinds of shell-fish, is particularly remarked.

Pro.—The only vegetable productions are a stunted birch, dwarf pines, the cedar, and the larch. Shrubs are more plentiful; such as the mountain ash, wild rose, and raspberry; there is also a variety of berries. Rye, barley, and a few potherbs, are cultivated in the interior, where, protected by the mountains, the climate is milder.

Minerals.—Iron and sulphur; the latter abundant.

Commerce.—The trade of Russia with Kamtchatka is carried on from Irkutsk by the difficult and tedious route of Okhotsk, whence three ships are sent annually with supplies of grain and sugar. The imports, besides brandy, are nankeens and other Chinese stuffs, together with various commodities of Russian and foreign manufacture; as ribbons, handkerchiefs, stockings, caps, shoes, boots, and, in general, all articles of European consumption, but in small quantity, and bearing a very high price. The only exports are furs, whale oil, fish, and eggs. The goods are conducted on sledges drawn by dogs.

Pop.—10,000, the most numerous native race being the Kamtchatdales, who are in general below the common height, with broad shoulders and large heads. The face, and particularly the nose, is long and flat, the eyes small and sunk, the lips thin, and they have scarcely any beard. They are nominally Christians, but are superstitious, indolent, and addicted to coarse sensuality. Their principal food is fish, which they devour with avidity, and without the least regard to cleanliness or delicacy. Other native races are the Kourdetri and Omolotzi. There are about 6,000 Russians.

Chief Towns.—NIJNI-KAMTCHATSK, the capital, and PETROPAULOVSK, the principal fort.

Lat. between 51° and 60° N. Lon. between 155° 40′ and 164° 20′ E.

History.—In 1706, all Kamtchatka was surveyed and occupied by the Russians.

KANARIS, KONSTANTIN, kan'-a-ris, a celebrated Greek mariner, the master of a small merchant vessel, who, in the Greek war of independence, signalized himself by conducting the fire-ships into the Turkish fleet. In 1822 he blew up the ship of the Turkish admiral in the Strait of Chios, and later in the year burnt another admiral's ship in the harbour of Tenedos. In 1824, he burnt a Turkish frigate at Samos, and a corvette in the port of Mitylene; after which he served under the Greek admiral as captain. In 1825 he attempted to destroy the squadron of Mehemet Ali, as it lay in the port of Alexandria, preparing to embark troops for the Morea; but the fire-ships, driven back by a contrary wind, burnt themselves out in the open sea, doing no injury to the enemy. In 1827 he represented his native island Ipsara at the national Greek assembly; subsequently, he commanded the Greek fleet, but on the assassination of the president, in 1831, he resigned, and retired into private life. He was nominated minister of war and president of the council in 1848-49 took part in the revolution of 1862, which compelled the abdication of king Otho, and has since held ministerial office. He has been called the "Themistocles of Modern Greece," and Victor Hugo has popularized his daring deeds in verse.

KANE, ELISHA KENT, M.D., an American traveller and Arctic explorer. After concluding his education at the medical college of Pennsylvania, he was appointed, in 1843, assistant-surgeon in the United States navy, and accompanied the first American embassy to China. He afterwards visited the Philippines, Ceylon, and travelled into the interior of India. Dr. Kane subsequently visited Egypt and explored the Nile as far up as the frontiers of Nubia; he walked completely over Greece, and, after a short sojourn in the United States, set out in 1846, for the coast of Africa, penetrating to the slave-markets of Whydah. Prostrated by fever, caught in that country, he returned in an enfeebled condition of health to his native land. He next served with the American army against Mexico, and experienced many fatigues and dangers throughout the campaign. In 1850 he accompanied the first American expedition, despatched by Mr. Grinnell, a merchant of New York, in search of Sir John Franklin, and four years afterwards published "A Personal Narrative of the Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin." In 1853 he was appointed to the command of a second expedition to the Arctic regions, for the same purpose, and was absent two years. In 1856 he published the results of his second voyage, under the title of "Arctic Explorations." The Queen, the Royal Geographical Society of London, the American Congress, and the New York Legislature bestowed upon him large gold medals.

Born at Philadelphia, 1822; died at Havanna, 1857.

KANE, SIR ROBERT, M.D., a distinguished Irish chemist and writer on medicine. After being educated for the profession of medicine, he became professor of chemistry to the Apothecaries Hall of Dublin, and was subsequently elected member of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of the same city, and of the Paris societies of Pharmacy and Medical Chemistry. In 1830-31, he published an essay on the "Pathological Condition of the Fluids in Typhus Fever," which gained the prize offered by Dr. Graves; and the "Elements of Practical Pharmacy." The following year he received the degree of M.D. from Trinity College, Dublin; in 1841 he became fellow of the Irish College of Physicians. In 1844 he published a work on "The Industrial Resources of Ireland," which excited considerable interest at the time; he was subsequently employed by government, in conjunction with Professors Lindley and Taylor, to investigate the cause of the potato disease in Ireland; but the labours of these gentlemen were pronounced unsuccessful. From 1846 to 1847 he was professor of natural philosophy to the Royal Dublin Society. The lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in 1846, bestowed upon him the honour of knighthood. He has since aided in the formation of the Museum of Irish Industry, and published several works on the application of chemistry to agriculture and manufactures. In 1848 he became president of Queen's College, Cork, an office he resigned in 1864.

Born at Dublin, 1810.

KANT, IMMANUEL, kant, an eminent Prussian philosopher. His father, who was a saddler, was descended from a Scotch family, the name of which was spelt Cant; but it was altered by the philosopher to Kant. He received his education at the gymnasium, and afterwards at the university of Königsberg. On the completion of his studies, he became tutor in a clergyman's family, and afterwards in that of a nobleman, on quitting which he returned to the university, and subsisted by teaching private pupils. In 1755 he obtained the degree of M.A., and, commencing as public lecturer, obtained a number of scholars. In 1770 he was appointed professor of logic and metaphysics. He was a prolific writer; and wrote several works on natural philosophy. But it was in metaphysics that he chiefly excelled, and upon which he published a prodigious number of works. The leading principle of his philosophy is a criticism or examination of the knowing faculty, or faculty of cognition, as a necessary preliminary to an examination of the objects of knowledge. The "Kritik der reinen Vernunft" ("Critic of Pure Reason,") is the work mostly famous to English readers. His principles attracted considerable attention in Germany, obtained many followers, and, although attacked by several writers, continue to exercise the greatest influence, even at the present time.

KATCHALL, or KATSCHULL. (See NICOBAR ISLANDS.)

KATER, HENRY, kat'-ter, an English mathematician, who although holding a military commission, devoted his life to science. He was intended for the profession of the law, but preferred a military career, and at the age of 16 obtained a commission in the 16th foot, then stationed in India. He was engaged in the trigometric survey of India, and after 14 years' service, returned to England and became a student at Sandhurst, and afterwards a captain in the 62nd regiment. He commenced his researches in physical science with two papers, "On the Light of the Cassegrainian Telescope compared with that of the Gregorian." He subsequently made several valuable experiments on pendulums and other astronomical apparatus, and published two essays on the "Construction and Adjustment of the New Standards of Weight and Measures of Great Britain." A large number of scientific treatises were also contributed by him to the Transactions of the Royal and other learned bodies. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London, and was knight of the order of St. Anne of Russia. He assisted Dr. Lardner in writing a "Treatise on Mechanics," published in "Lardner's Cyclopædia."

Born at Bristol, 1777; died in London, 1830.

KATONA, ISTURAN, ka-to'-na, a Hungarian historian. He was professor of poetry and rhetoric in the university of Buda, and wrote the "History of Hungary," in Latin, in forty-one volumes. This work is the standard authority on the subject, and its value is greatly enhanced by the bibliographical notices it contains of Hungarian authors.

Born in Hungary, 1732; died 1811.

KATRINE, LOCH, kat-rin, a lake of Scotland, near the south-western borders of Perthshire, at an elevation of 370 feet above the sea level. It is 8 miles long and less than a mile in average breadth. It forms portion of the scenery of Sir W. Scott's poem of "The Lady of the Lake." In October, 1859, Queen Victoria formally opened the works by which the waters of this beautiful lake are made available for the supply of the city of Glasgow. (See GLASGOW.)

KATSENA, kat'-se-na, a large, but partially deserted town of Central Africa, capital of a province of the same name, subject to the Sultan of Sokoto. It is surrounded by a wall, and was formerly a place of considerable importance, and about 100,000 inhabitants, but was nearly destroyed in native wars early in the present century. As a commercial centre it is superseded by KANO. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 12° 54′ N. Lon, 7° 25′ E.

KATTYWAR, kat'-te-war, a district of India, occupying a considerable portion of the peninsula of Gujerat. It is divided between about 200 petty chiefs, under the protection of the British government. The climate is unhealthy, but the soil is fertile, producing maize, millet, wheat, sugar, and cotton. Area, 21,000 square miles. Pop. 2,343,899.

KATWIJK-AAN-ZEE, kat'-wishk, a village of the Netherlands, province of South Holland, at the mouth of the Rhine, 8 miles N.W. of Leyden. Pop. 5,500, chiefly engaged as sailors, and in the herring fishery.

KATYAYANA, ka'-te-a'-ya-na, Hindoo grammarian. Nothing is known of his personal history, but his grammatical treatise is valued by Oriental scholars.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

KATZBACH, kats'-bak, a river of Prussia, in Silesia, rising at Ketschdorf, and, after a course of 35 miles, joins the Oder, 30 miles from Breslau. The great battle of Katzbach, on which the Prussians under Blucher gained a complete victory over the French under Macdonald, in August 1813, was fought on the banks of this river.

KAUFBEUREN, kouf'-boi'-ren, a town of Bavaria, province of Suabia, on the Wersach, 48 miles S.W. of Munich. Manf. Cotton, linen. Pop. 4,800.

KAUFFMANN, MARIA ANGELICA, kouf'-man, an eminent artist, was the daughter of a Swiss painter, who from her earliest years instructed her in his art. At 11 years of age she drew portraits; after wandering in Italy for several years, she went to London in 1766, where she was made one of the original thirty-six members of the Royal Academy. She returned to Italy in 1782, and there married Antonio Zucchi. Her paintings, characterized by nobleness and grace, are somewhat deficient in drawing. There is a large allegorical painting by her in the National Gallery, called "Religion attended by the Graces." Miss Thackeray has recently made her the heroine of a novel, "Miss Angel."

Born at Chur, in the Grisons, 1742; died at Rome, 1807.

KAULBACH, WILLIAM, koul'-bak, a celebrated German painter. He was the son of a goldsmith, and was at first apprenticed to that trade, but evincing great talent for drawing, he was, after some opposition, allowed to study in the Düsseldorf academy, under Cornelius, who was so delighted with his pupil, that when he was himself solicited to paint a grand series of frescoes in Munich, he requested the assistance of Kaulbach. The young artist went to Munich in 1825, and painted there six allegorical frescoes. He exhibited his first unaided work of art, "Irrenhaus," in 1829. When his great ability became recognized he was employed to decorate the new palace of Munich with designs in fresco and encaustic. He embellished the throne-room, the queen's apartment, the drawing-room, and the state bed-room. His greatest work in oil is "The Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus." In 1840 he succeeded Cornelius as director of the Bavarian Academy of Art. In his later years he worked almost exclusively at portrait-painting. Kaulbach also drew a very large number of thoughtful and elegant designs for books, and his illustrations to Göthe's "Reinek Fuchs" have become celebrated, not alone in Germany, but also in England.

Born at Arolsen, in Waldeck, 1805; died 1874.

KAUNITZ, WENZEL ANTON, Prince von, kou'-nitz, count of Rietberg, an eminent Austrian statesman, who during forty years was chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He studied at Vienna, Leipsic, and Leyden, travelled in the chief countries of Europe, and on his return entered on an active political career, and was appointed minister of state for Hungary in 1744. He distinguished himself as a diplomatist in 1748 at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, was afterwards Austrian ambassador in France, in 1753 was appointed court and state chancellor, and enjoyed successively the confidence of Maria Theresa, Joseph II., Leopold II., and Francis II. Under his prudent administration the cabinet of Vienna obtained great influence with the other courts of Europe. The project for the partition of Poland originated with him. He was a man of narrow views, and extremely egotistic and domineering, but had strict notions of duty. He promoted ecclesiastical reforms, and was a liberal patron of art and literature.

Born at Vienna, 1711; died 1794.

KAVALA, or CAVALLO, ka-va'-la a seaport town of European Turkey, or the Ægean Sea, opposite the island of Thasos. It has a trade in cotton and tobacco. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 40° 55′ N. Lon. 24° 25′ E.

KAZIMIRZ, kaz'-e-mertz, a town of Russia, in Poland, government of Lublin, on the right bank of the Vistula, 30 miles S.E. of Radom. It was formerly a great centre of the trade in grain, in which many English merchants were engaged; but is now much decayed. Pop. 2,600, of whom many are Jews.

KEA-HING-FOO, a fortified city of China, province of Che-keang, on the Imperial Canal, 50 miles N.W. of Ningpo. Pop. 270,000.

KEAN, EDMUND, kene, a celebrated English actor, was the son of a stage carpenter and an actress at minor theatres and in showmen's booths. Both his parents neglected him during his infancy, and he owed whatever small stock of education he obtained during his early years, to the care of Miss Tidswell, an actress at the London theatres, who generously took charge of him. This lady instructed him in the actor's art; but, when he was about twelve years of age, his mother took him away, and employed him to assist her in hawking about perfumery and flowers, and occasionally to play in showmen's booths over the country. So clever was "Master Carey," as he was termed, that, when performing with his mother in Richardson's booth at Windsor, George III. summoned him to the castle, for the purpose of giving recitations. His majesty was greatly pleased at the boy's efforts, and dismissed him with a handsome present. After leading the life of a strolling player for about 15 years, he, in 1814, made his first appearance at Drury-lane theatre, the playbills announcing the performance of "The Merchant of Venice; Shylock, Mr. Edmund Kean, from the Exeter theatre." The house, on the first night was only poorly attended, but the effect produced on the audience was remarkable, and the extraordinary merits of a provincial actor soon became known throughout the metropolis, and Drury-lane theatre rapidly became the crowded resort of the most fashionable circles. Kean's fame was fixed. He was universally acknowledged to be the greatest English actor since Garrick. His success remained unabated till the year 1825, when his connection with the wife of Alderman Cox led to a lawsuit, on the termination of which Kean was compelled to pay £800 damages. He was then hissed from the stages of Drury-lane and Edinburgh; whereupon he paid a visit to the United States. After two seasons he returned; but, though favourably received once more, his career was near its end. He had always been a loose liver, and he now indulged in constant intoxication; his constitution was weakened, and his memory so impaired, that he could not study a new part. In 1833 he was announced to play the part of Othello, his son Charles being cast for Iago. Kean struggled through the opening scenes of the play, but when he came to the speech, "Villain, be sure," he sank exhausted upon his son's shoulder, and was led off the stage. This was his last appearance. His performances of Othello, Shylock, Richard III., and Sir Giles Overreach, are set down in the annals of the stage as inimitable efforts of the actor's art. His son, Charles Kean, attained considerable reputation as an actor and manager, his elaborate and picturesque production of standard works at the Princess's Theatre marking an era in theatrical annals.

Born in London, about 1787; died at Richmond, 1833.

KEANE, LORD JOHN, a British military commander, who entered upon his career as ensign at the age of 13 years. In 1799 he became captain in the 44th regiment, after which he served in Egypt and the Mediterranean. In 1812 he joined the duke of Wellington's army in Spain as brigadier, in which capacity he took part in the battles of Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Orthes, and Toulouse. In 1814 he was sent, with the grade of major-general, to the West India station, afterwards acting in the attack on New Orleans, where he received two severe wounds. In 1833 he went to Bombay, as commander of the forces; and, five years afterwards, he led the army which invaded Scinde. In 1839 he reduced the hitherto impregnable fortress of Ghuznee, after a desperate defence, and for this service was rewarded with a peerage, being created Baron Keane, of Ghuznee, in Afghanistan. The East-India Company settled upon him, and his two next successors, the sum of £2,000 annually, both houses of parliament voting him their thanks.

Born 1781; died at Burton Lodge, Hampshire, 1844.

KEANG-SE, an inland province of China. Area, 72,176 square miles. Pop. 24,534,000.—The capital is Nan-chang-foo.

KEATE, GEORGE, keete, a miscellaneous writer. Having completed the tour of Europe, during which he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, at Geneva, he returned to England, and was called to the bar; but, not meeting with much encouragement in the law, he abandoned that profession for literature. His first performance was "Ancient and Modern Rome," a poem published in 1650. His publications after this were very numerous; the principal being "An Account of the Pelew Islands," compiled from the papers of Captain Wilson, a translation of the "Semiramis" of Voltaire.

Born at Trowbridge, Wiltshire, 1727; died 1797.

KEATING, JEFFREY, kee'-ting, an Irish ecclesiastic of the Roman church, and doctor of divinity, who wrote a history of the poets of Ireland, and the genealogies of the principal families.

Died 1650.

KEATS, JOHN, ketes, an eminent English poet. He was the son of a livery-stable proprietor in Finsbury, and was sent, when about the age of 5 years, to Mr. Clarke's school, at Enfield. While there he exhibited great intellectual activity, and a love for poetical literature. The old Grecian mythology, which he afterwards reconstructed and reanimated by his feeling and fancy, was his especial study. In 1810 he left school, and his father dying about the same time, he was left the sum of £2,000, and was apprenticed to Mr. Hammand, a surgeon at Edmonton. Some sonnets contributed by him to the Examiner, attracted the attention of Leigh Hunt, who became one of the young poet's firmest friends. In 1817 he published a volume of Juvenile Poems, and shortly afterwards, "Endymion," "Lamia," "Isabella," "The Eve of St. Agnes," and "Hyperion," were produced during the three or four succeeding years. On the appearance of "Endymion," the "Quarterly Review" attacked the poet, and his kindred writers, in a violent manner. The poet's health, always delicate, became greatly weakened by his attentions upon a dying brother; and his own decease occurring soon afterwards, it was for some time erroneously attributed to the attacks of the "Quarterly" reviewer. This was quite untrue; the young poet was predisposed to hereditary phthisis, and a disappointment in love, carefully concealed, preyed upon his mind. He went to Italy for the purpose of regaining strength, and had reached Rome when his malady assumed a most alarming form, and he was soon carried off by consumption. Although he left behind only three volumes of verse, his rich and luxuriant fancy, his teeming brilliant imagery, his stimulating and suggestive diction, have been an honour and a glory to English literature, the annals of which can show many instances of precocity of genius, but no other poet at the same age gave such indications of the possession of the very highest poetic genius.

Born in London, 1796; died at Rome, 1821.

KEBLE, JOSEPH, ke'-bel, an English lawyer. He wrote an "Explanation of the Law against Recusants;" "The Statutes at Large," in paragraphs and sections; "Reports in the Court of the King's Bench;" and two essays, one entitled "Human Nature, or the Creation of Mankind," the other, on "Human Actions." He also left a number of folio and quarto volumes in MS.

Born in Suffolk, 1632; died 1710.

KEBLE, REV. JOHN, M.A., a highly popular writer of sacred poetry, for many years vicar of Hursley, in Hampshire. Soon after taking his B.A. degree, he was chosen fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and from 1831 to 1841 was professor of poetry at his university. His chief works are "The Christian Year," of which thousands of copies have been sold, and "Lyra Innocentium."

KEILL, JOHN, kile, a British mathematician. After taking his degree of M.A. at Edinburgh university, he entered of Balliol College, and is said to have been the first who taught Sir Isaac Newton's principles by experiments. In 1698 he published an "Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth," to which he subjoined "Remarks on Whiston's Theory." The year following he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy. In 1708 he defended Newton's claim to the invention of fluxions, which brought him into a dispute with Leibnitz. In 1709 he was appointed treasurer to the Palatines, and attended them in that capacity to New England. In 1714 he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and the year following appointed decipherer to the queen. In 1714 the university conferred on him the degree of M.D., and, in 1715, he published an edition of "Commandine's Euclid." In 1718 appeared his "Introductio ad veram Astronomiam;" which treatise h translated into English.

Born at Edinburgh, 1671; died 1721.

KEILL, JAMES, younger brother of the above. He obtained the degree of M.D. at Cambridge, and settled as a physician at Northampton. His works are: "The Anatomy of the Human Body;" "An Account of Animal Secretion, the Quantity of Blood in the Human Body, and Muscular Motion."

Born in Scotland, 1673; died at Northampton, 1719.

KEISKAMMA, kets-kam'-ma, or "clear water," a river of South Africa, forming the boundary between Cape Colony and British Kaffraria.

KEITH, a new county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 2,016 square miles.

KEITH, JAMES, field-marshal in the Prussian service, was the younger brother of George Keith, tenth and last earl-mareschal of Scotland. He attached himself to the Pretender in 1715, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir. He, however, escaped with his brother to Spain, and served as an officer of the Irish brigade for ten years. He afterwards went to Russia, and was made a general. He signalised himself in all the battles between the Russians and Turks, and was the first who entered the breach at the taking of Otchakov. He also displayed great military skill against the Swedes, and, on the restoration of peace, was appointed field-marshal, and sent on several embassies. But conceiving that his services had not been properly compensated, he accepted an invitation from the king of Prussia, who gave him a large pension, and made him governor of Berlin, and field-marshal. That monarch also took him into his confidence, and made him the companion of his travels. He was killed at the battle of Hochkirchen.

Born at Kincardine, 1696; died 1758.

KEKKEO, MOORI-KAMEN, or BLAUENSTEIN, kek'-ke-o, a market town of Hungary, on the left bank of the Kürtös, 15 miles S.E. of Karpfen. There is a fine old castle, and five annual fairs are held. Pop. 1600.

KELAT, or KHELAT, ke-lat', the capital of Beloochistan, standing on a hill, 7,000 feet above the level of the sea, was a place of considerable military importance. It has a transit trade and a manufactory of arms. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 28° 52′ N. Lon. 66° 33′ E. KELLERMAN, FRANÇOIS CHRISTOPHE, kel'-ler-man, marshal of France, and duke of Valmy. He served with distinction during the Seven Years' War, and when the revolution burst forth, in 1789, he was a brigadier in the French army. In 1792 he was named commander of the army of the Moselle, and fought, with Dumouriez, the battle of Valmy, in which the greatly superior Prussian army was defeated and compelled to evacuate French territory. He was, nevertheless, incarcerated as a suspected person in 1793, but was afterwards set at liberty. In 1795 he became commander-in-chief of the armies of the Alps and Italy, sustaining, with 47,000 men, the attacks of an army mustering 150,000 soldiers. In 1804 Napoleon created him marshal of the empire, duke of Valmy, senator, &c., and he was afterwards charged with several commands in chief, in all of which he acquitted himself with great distinction. At the Restoration he attached himself to the Bourbons, and was created peer of France.

Born at Wolfsbuchweiler, Alsace, 1735; died at Paris, 1820.

KELLERMAN, FRANÇOIS ÉTIENNE, son of the above, served with distinction in the campaigns in Prussia, Germany, Italy, and Spain, and signalised himself at the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, Vimeira, Bautzen, and Waterloo. He was general of division in 1814, and was created a peer during the Hundred Days. Excluded from the Chamber by Louis XVIII., he did not return to it till after the revolution of 1830.

Born 1770; died at Paris, 1835.

KELLEY, EDWARD, kel'-le, an English alchemist. He received his education at Oxford, which he quitted without taking a degree; and rambling about the country, committed some offence, for which he lost his ears at Lancaster, after which he became assistant to Dr. Dee, whom he accompanied abroad. The emperor Adolphus II. was so much deceived by Kelley's pretensions to the power of making gold, that he conferred the honour of knighthood on him. He afterwards sent him to prison at Prague, whence, in endeavouring to make his escape by tying the sheets together, he fell, and broke both his legs. He wrote a poem on chemistry, and another on the philosopher's stone.

Born at Worcester, 1555; died 1595.

KELLS, kels, an ancient market-town of Ireland, in the county of Meath, on the Blackwater, 34 miles N.W. of Dublin. Manf. Lace. Pop. 2953. —The town originated in a monastery founded in the 6th century by St. Columba, and has been associated with many important events in the early history of Ireland.

His "Reminiscences," published shortly before his death, abounds with amusing anecdotes.

Born 1762; died 1826.

KELSO, kel'-so, a market town of Scotland, in the county of Roxburgh, on the north bank of the Tweed, opposite the junction of the Teviot, over both which rivers handsome bridges are built, 22 miles from Berwick. In the centre of the town is a square, from which six streets diverge in different directions. This square, with the principal streets, contain many neat shops and houses. An old abbey, now in ruins, is the great ornament of Kelso. It was founded by David I. in 1124, partially destroyed by the English under the earl of Hertford, in 1545, and only the abbey church left, which was used as a Protestant church till 1771, when a report being spread abroad that the building was giving way, it was never again made use of. The style of the building is later Norman or Romanesque, with a central tower 90 feet high. Besides the established church, there are places of worship for various denominations, a dispensary, several subscription libraries, a museum, and schools. It has a weekly market for grain, and six yearly markets, at which farm servants are hired. To the north-west of the town is Floors Castle, seat of the Duke of Roxburgh, built from the designs of Sir John Vanbrugh, in 1718. Manf. Boots and shoes, leather, woollens, linen, hosiery, and iron. Pop. 5,235.—A station on the North Eastern and North British railway.

KEMBERG, kem'-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth. Pop. 3,200.

KEMBLE, JOHN PHILIP, kem'-bel, an eminent English actor. He was brother of the famous Mrs. SIDDONS, and the son of Roger Kemble, the manager of a provincial theatre, and although, while young, he was employed to play children's parts in the theatre, he was not intended for the stage. He was educated at a Roman Catholic seminary in Staffordshire, and afterwards at Douay College in France; but having a natural inclination for the actor's profession, he returned to England at the age of 19, and made his appearance on the stage at Wolverhampton. After playing with great success in various provincial theatres, he made his first appearance at Drury Lane theatre, in Hamlet, in 1783, became a great favourite, and, in 1803, purchased a share in Covent Garden theatre, and assumed the managership of that establishment. During the subsequent fourteen years, he continued to play the leading tragedy parts with the greatest success; indeed, in the characters of Brutus, Coriolanus, Cato, King John, Wolsey, and Macbeth, he is said to have been without an equal. In 1817 he retired from the stage, and soon afterwards went to reside in the south of France, and later, at Lausanne, in Switzerland.

Born 1757; died, at Lausanne, 1823.

KEMBLE, CHARLES, brother of the preceding, was also a distinguished actor, but excelled chiefly in comedy. After receiving his education at the Roman Catholic college of Douay, in France, his brother John obtained for him an appointment in the General Post-office; but resigning this situation, he made his first appearance on the stage as Orlando, in "As You Like It," at Sheffield. After playing in the provinces, he appeared in London, at Drury Lane, as Malcolm, in "Macbeth," in 1794. At first he was cast for secondary characters only, but in a few years he had so improved himself by study, that he became the first English actor in the walk of high comedy, and, like his brother, had certain characters in which he was unrivalled, such as Orlando, Falconbridge, Cassio, Benedick, Mercutio, Petruchio, and Charles Surface. He also produced on the English stage a number of adaptations from the French and German. In 1806 he married Miss De Camp, an actress of great ability. He retired from the stage in 1840, having been a short time previously appointed examiner of plays, but two years afterwards appeared again for a few nights. He subsequently appeared on several occasions as a reader of Shakspeare. Like many other members of his family, he was an educated and accomplished man.

Born at Brecon, South Wales, 1775; died 1854.

KEMBLE, FRANCES ANNE, daughter of the above, was educated chiefly in Paris, and, in 1829, made her first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre as Juliet, achieving a great success, and for a few years, "Fanny Kemble" was the most popular tragic actress of the times. In 1832, she visited the United States, where she married a gentleman of property, named Butler. The union, however, proved unhappy, and they were divorced in 1840. She afterwards published a volume of poems, exhibiting considerable imaginative power, a drama, called "The Star of Seville," and some account of her travels, both in America and in Italy. She afterwards frequently gave readings from and lectures on Shakspeare. In 1876 she published, in the "Atlantic Monthly," an American magazine, an amusing series of reminiscences, under the title "Old Woman's Gossip."

Born 1811.

KEMBLE, ADELAIDE, a younger daughter of Charles Kemble, studied for the operatic stages and appeared, with extraordinary success, as Norma, at Covent Garden Theatre, in 1841. She exhibited vocal and dramatic power of the highest order, in this and other characters, chiefly tragic, but having married Mr. Sartoris, retired in 1843. Like others of her family, she possesses considerable literary talent, and, in 1867, published "A Week in a French Country House." In 1874 her son married the daughter of General Ulysses Grant, President of the United States.

Born 1816.

KEMBLE, JOHN MITCHELL, son of Charles Kemble, one of the most distinguished Anglo-Saxon scholars of the age. After receiving his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and studying at Göttingen, under Jacob Grimm, he, in 1833, commenced his labours by the publication of "The Anglo-Saxon Poems of Beowulf," which were followed by several volumes of translations and collections of the same early literature. In 1849, he produced "The Saxons in England, a History of the English Commonwealth till the period of the Norman Conquest," which is the most important of all his works. He was editor for many years of the "British and Foreign Review," and continued to act in that capacity till the periodical ceased to exist in 1845. Mr. Kemble held the office formerly filled by his father,—that of examiner of plays under the lord chamberlain.

Born 1807; died 1857.

KEMP, GEORGE MICKLE, kemp, a self-educated architect, who designed the Scott monument at Edinburgh. He was the son of a shepherd, and was apprenticed to the trade of a millwright, at which trade he worked for several years, in Scotland, London, and Manchester. From early youth he is said to have evinced a great admiration for the study of architecture, and while working as a journeyman at his trade, he contrived to visit the abbeys of Melrose and Jedburgh, the cathedral of Glasgow, and several cathedrals in England: he was also an ardent lover of poetry, and of the works of Sir Walter Scott. In 1824 he set out for the continent, intending to travel over Europe. He was, however, compelled to return in a year; but not before he had seen most of the cathedrals of France and the Netherlands. He attempted, without sucess, to establish himself in business at Edinburgh; after this he studied drawing and perspective with so much zeal, that, in 1830, he was enabled to make three splendid drawings of Melrose Abbey. He was next employed to make a large model for a palace to be erected by the duke of Buccleuch; he subsequently travelled over Scotland, taking sketches for a proposed work on the ecclesiastical antiquities of that country. When the design for the Scott monument was announced for competition, Kemp furnished one, and obtained one of the three premiums of £50. He was again successful on the second competition, and his design was commenced; the architect, however, did not live to see his work finished. In 1844 his body was found in the canal; it is supposed he had fallen into it on a dark night. His remains were followed to the tomb by the members of the Royal Scottish Academy and most of the other public bodies in Edinburgh.

Born at Newhall, on the Esk, 1794; died 1844.

KEMPELEN, WOLFGANG, Baron de, kemp'-en, Hungarian mechanician, famous for his automaton chess-player (afterwards discovered to have been constructed so as to give room for a small man to be hidden inside), automaton duck, and other extraordinary pieces of mechanism.

Born at Presburg, 1734; died 1804.

KEMPEN, kem'-pen, a walled town of Prussia, province of Düsseldorf, 20 miles N.W. of the town of that name. There are two Roman Catholic churches and a synagogue. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth, hosiery, and candles. Pop. 5,000.

KEMPEN, a town of Prussia, province of Posen, on the borders of Silesia. Manf. Leather, and wax. Pop. 6,100, more than half Jews.

KEMPER, kem'-per, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 15,719, of whom more than half are coloured. The capital is De Kalb.

KEMPIS, THOMAS A, kem'-pis, a pious writer of the 14th century. His real name was Hämerken, the name by which he is generally known being that of his native village. At 21 he entered the monastery of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, where his brother was prior. He led a life of strict devotion, occupying himself in copying the Bible and the writings of the saints. The treatise "De Imitatione Christi," or "On the Imitation of Christ," is universally known under his name. No religious book has been so frequently translated; it is said that there are 60 distinct versions in French alone. The authorship has been disputed, but the general opinion of scholars is that it was written by à Kempis. He wrote, also, the history of his monastery.

Born at Kempen, 1380; died 1471.

KEMPTEN, kem'-ten, a city of Bavaria, on the Iller, 64 miles S.W. of Augsburg. The old abbey stands on a hill, and that part of the city which surrounds it is known as Stifts-stadt, the other portion being on the plain at the foot of the hill. Manf. Cotton, linen, and paper. Pop. 13,872.

KEN, THOMAS, an English bishop. He was educated at Winchester school, whence he removed to New College, Oxford, where he was elected fellow. About 1680 he was appointed chaplain to the princess of Orange, whom he accompanied to Holland. He afterwards went with Lord Dartmouth to Tangier, and, on his return, was made chaplain to Charles II., whom he attended in his last illness, but was hindered from exercising the duties of his function by the duke of York, who introduced a Romish priest into the bedchamber. Charles had a great regard for him, and nominated him to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, which was confirmed by James II. The bishop governed his diocese in an exemplary manner; he opposed the endeavours of James to introduce popery, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower for resisting that monarch's dispensing power. He refused, however, to take the oaths of the Revolution, for which he was deprived. Queen Anne granted him a pension of £200 a year; and he was universally esteemed for his amiable manners and unaffected piety. He published some pious manuals, and wrote several hymns, among them the famous "Morning" and "Evening Hymns," and an epic poem, entitled "Edmund."

Born at Berkhampstead, Herts, 1637; died in Wiltshire, 1710.

KENDAL or KIRKBY KENDAL, ken'-dal, a market-town, municipal and parliamentary borough of Westmoreland, on the right bank of the Ken, 38 miles S. of Carlisle. Its principal buildings are a large ancient church, recently restored, a modern church, a town-hall, court-house, house of correction, theatre, assembly-rooms, learned institutions, a grammar-school, with three exhibitions to Oxford, and various other schools. Manf. Kendals, a sort of coarse woollen cloth, linseys, knit worsted stockings, flannels, doeskins, tweeds, hats, serges, &c.; also smaller manufactures of fish-hooks, wool-cards, scouring waste silk, leather; and there are marble-works. Pop. 13,696.—A station on the London and North-Western railway. This is one of the oldest manufacturing towns in the kingdom, some Flemish woollen-weavers having here taken up their abode in the reign of Edward III.

KENDALL, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 324 square miles. Pop. 14,000. The capital is Oswego.

KENDALL, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 2,763. The capital is Boerne.

KENEH, or GHENEH, ke-na', a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, 33 miles N.E. of Thebes. It is the centre of considerable trade with the Arabian coast, which it supplies with corn. Manf. Porous water jars and bottles, immense quantities of which are formed into rafts and floated down the Nile to Cairo and Alexandria. Pop. 10,000.

KENILWORTH, ken'-il-worth, a market-town of Warwickshire, 5 miles N. of Warwick. There is an ancient church; but the town is principally noted for the remains of its once magnificent castle, the most extensive ruins in England. The splendid gaieties which here took place in the days of Queen Elizabeth are graphically described in the admirable fiction of "Kenilworth," by Sir Walter Scott. The town is supposed to derive its name from Kenulph, king of Mercia. Manf. Ribbons, leather, combs, and chemicals. Pop. 3,335.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

KENMARE, ken-mair', a beautifully situated town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, 15 miles S.W. of Killarney, at the north-eastern extremity of Kenmare Bay, which is crossed by a suspension bridge. It lies in an isolated district, but has a convenient harbour and pier, which can be approached by large vessels. Pop. 1,200.

KENNEBEC, ken-ne-bek', a river of the United States, in Maine, rising in Moosehead Lake, and falling into the Atlantic between Phipsburgh and Georgetown. In its course of 150 miles the river falls 1,000 feet, affording valuable water power.

KENNEBEC, a county of Maine, United States. Area, 1,130 square miles. Pop. 53,058. AUGUSTA is the capital.

KENNEBUNK, ken-ne-bunk, a seaport of Maine, United States, on the right bank of a river of the same name. There is a good harbour, and a coasting trade is carried on. Kennebunk Port is a town of about equal size on the opposite bank of the river. Pop. 2,700.

KENNET, BASIL, ken'-net, an English writer, who, in 1696, published "The Antiquities of Rome." The year following he was chosen fellow of his college, and published the "Lives of the Greek Poets." In 1706 he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, where he narrowly escaped falling under the power of the Inquisition. He published several translations of foreign writers.

Born at Postling, Kent, 1674; died in London, 1714.

KENNET, WHITE, an English prelate and antiquarian, brother of the preceding. He was educated at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his abilities. In 1684 he took his degree of M.A., and was presented to the vicarage of Amersden, in Oxfordshire. In 1701 he engaged in the controversy on the rights of convocation, against Dr. Atterbury. In 1707 he was made dean of Peterborough, but he was at this time very unpopular, owing to his Whig principles, and his opposition to Dr. Sacheverel. Dr. Welton, rector of Whitechapel, who presented an altar-piece representing the Lord's Supper to his church, caused the figure intended for Judas Iscariot to be drawn like the dean of Peterborough. This giving great offence, the bishop of London ordered it to be taken down. In 1718 he was preferred to the bishopric of Peterborough. He published a collection of English historians, under the title of "The Complete History of England," in 3 vols. folio, the last of which was written by himself. He also wrote the Life of William Somner, the antiquary, "Historical Account of Appropriations," and several sermons and miscellaneous tracts. The British Museum library of manuscripts contains a voluminous collection of his unprinted works.

Born at Dover, 1669; died 1728.

KENNET, a river of England, rising in Wiltshire, flowing through Berkshire, and joining the Thames at Reading.

KENNETH I., ken'-neth, king of Scotland, reigned for one year only, 604-5.

KENNETH II., king of Scotland, succeeded Alpin, his father, in 834. He made war upon the Picts, and subdued their dominions beyond the Forth, which he divided among his soldiers. He removed the stone chair to Scone, where his successors were crowned, till it was removed to England by Edward I.

Died 854.

KENNETH III. was the son of Malcolm, and became king in 969. He subdued the Britons of Strathcluyd, and was equally successful against the Danes, who had invaded his dominions; but attempting to alter the succession of the crown in favour of his family, was assassinated.

Died 994.

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN, ken'-ni-kot, English divine and biblical scholar. By the liberality of some gentlemen, he was sent to Exeter College, Oxford, where he applied himself to his studies with such diligence, that, while an undergraduate, he published two dissertations on the tree of life in Paradise, and on the oblations of Cain and Abel, for which the university presented him his bachelor's degree, without fees, and before he had completed his terms. He next undertook to publish a correct edition of the text of the Hebrew Scriptures, collated from ancient manuscripts. In this great work, for which he was admirably fitted by patience, industry, and learning, he met with extensive encouragement, and many sovereigns and other illustrious personages appeared in his list of subscribers. To enable him to perfect his design, he was, in 1767, made keeper of the Radcliffe Library, and in 1770, canon of Christ Church. More than 600 Hebrew and Chaldean MSS. were collated in the preparation of the work.

Born at Totnes, Devonshire, 1718; died at Oxford, 1783.

KENNINGTON. (See LONDON.)

KENOSHA, ke-no'-sha, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 306 square miles. Pop. 13,550.

KENOSHA, capital of the above state, on Lake Michigan. There is a good harbour, with piers. Manf. Iron, leather, flax, hardware, boots and shoes, agricultural machinery, and joinery. A large trade in the produce of the district is carried on.

KENSINGTON. (See LONDON.)

KENSINGTON, a township in the United States, forming a suburb of Philadelphia. Manf. Cottons, woollens, glass; and shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 48,000.

KENT, kent, a maritime county of England, forming the south-eastern angle of the kingdom, and nearer to the continent than any other part of the kingdom. It is bounded N. by the Thames, which (with the exception of a few acres at North Woolwich) divides it from Essex; E. and S.E. by the German Ocean and the Straits of Dover; S. by the county of Sussex, and W. by that of Surrey. It is one of the most beautiful counties of England from the extreme diversity of its surface, and the richness and variety of its scenery. It is traversed from east to west by a range of chalk hills, known as the North Downs, part of the extensive ridge which runs from Hungerford, through Hampshire and Surrey, to Dover, and forming the white cliffs which are there to be seen on the coast. This ridge, in some parts, attains a height of nearly 700 feet, and from the identity of the strata on the opposite side, is supposed to have once extended across the Channel to Calais. There is another ridge, further south, of less elevation, chiefly of ironstone and ragstone. The interior plain, known as the Weald of Kent, is one of the most fertile districts of England. There are considerable tracts of alluvial soil, skirting the banks of the Thames and Medway, and a large district, in the south-east, Romney Marsh, (44,000 acres), which affords excellent pasturage. The Isle of Thanet is a district of remarkable fertility. In the Isle of Sheppey there are large tracts of marsh and pasture lands. These are entirely devoted to the rearing of sheep and fattening of cattle, which are of various breeds, principally Welsh and Sussex. Kent has been long famous for its fine breed of Romney-Marsh sheep, one of the most valuable in the kingdom, producing a large fleece of fine long wool, and becoming very fat at an early age. The Dorset, Wilts, and Southdown sheep are also kept in most parts of the county.

Rivers.—The principal, after the Thames, are the Medway, the Stour, the Darent, and the Rother. The inferior rivers are the Ravensbourne, the Cray, the little Stour, &c.

Pro.—In Kent every department of husbandry is pursued to a large extent, and with great ability and success. Besides the usual agricultural products, of which the wheat is peculiarly famed, Kent produces excellent hops, to the extent of about one-fourth of the whole crops in England, about 40,000 acres being devoted to the cultivation; also fruits of various kinds for the London market, especially cherries, filberts, and apples; woad and madder for dyers: with plenty of samphire, hemp, and sainfoin; also canary-seed, various other succulent plants, and in the woody parts, timber and birch-twigs for brooms. The oyster fisheries of Faversham, Milton, and Whitstable, and of the Swales of the Medway, have been long noted; and at St. Margaret's Bay, near Dover, large quantities of small but very delicate lobsters are caught.

Minerals.—Chalk, flint, ragstone, and pyrites, are the only ones that are worked. The most extensive and important chalk-pits are those of Northfleet and Greenhithe, near Gravesend.

Manf.—Not extensive, with the exception of paper. The various dockyards at Deptford, Woolwich, Chatham, &c., employ numerous hands; and shipbuilding is pursued on the coast.

Area.—1,624 square miles.

Pop. 977,585.

Chief Towns.—MAIDSTONE (the county town), CANTERBURY, ROCHESTER, CHATHAM, DOVER, DEAL, FOLKESTONE, RAMSGATE, MARGATE, TUNBRIDGE, TUNBRIDGE WELLS, SHEERNESS, GRAVESEND, WOOLWICH, GREENWICH, DEPTFORD, ASHFORD, DARTFORD, and BROMLEY.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into Mid, East, and West Kent, each division returning 2 representatives. Canterbury returns 2; Maidstone 2; Dover 2; Rochester 2; Sandwich and Deal 2; Greenwich 2; Gravesend 1; Chatham 1; Hythe 1.

KENT, a county of New Brunswick, dominion of Canada, between the river Sorel and St. Lawrence. Area, 1,720 square miles. Pop. 36,000; half of French extraction. The capital is Richibucto.

KENT, a county of Ontario province, dominion of Canada, on the shores of Lake Erie. Area, 951 square miles. Pop. 36,000. The capital is Chatham.

KENT, a maritime county of West Australia. The coast is very irregular.

KENT, a maritime county of Tasmania, bounded N. by the river Huon and d'Entrecasteaux Channel, and W. by the Southern Ocean. The county town is Ramsgate.

KENT, a county of Delaware, United States. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 32,874, about one quarter coloured. The capital is Dover.

KENT, a county of Maryland, United States. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 18,000, more than one-third coloured. The capital is Chestertown.

KENT, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 73,000. Grand Rapids is the capital.

KENT, a county of Rhode Island, United States. Area, 186 square miles. Pop. 21,000. The capital is East Greenwich.

KENT, WILLIAM, an English painter and architect, who at first worked at coach-painting, but abandoned it for the higher branches of the art. In 1710 he went to Italy, where he became acquainted with the earl of Burlington, through whom he gained considerable employment, and was appointed principal painter and architect to the king. Although only an indifferent artist, he yet takes rank as the great improver of modern English landscape-gardening; indeed, he is regarded as the founder of the art.

Born in Yorkshire, 1684; died 1748.

KENT, JAMES, an English musical composer. In his youth he was chorister in Winchester Cathedral, and afterwards in the Chapel Royal. He subsequently became organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Winchester Cathedral. He assisted Dr. Boyce in the production of his "Collection of Cathedral Music," and also wrote many anthems, several being familiar to the congregations of our cathedrals at the present time.

Born at Winchester, 1700; died 1776.

KENT, JAMES, a distinguished American judge and legal commentator. He was elected professor of law in Columbia College in 1794; in 1800 he assisted in revising the legal code of New York; and, in 1804, was nominated chief justice of that city. His great work, "Commentaries on American Law," was concluded in 1830, and remains the standard work on the constitutional law of the United States.

Born at Fredericksburg, New York, 1763; died 1847.

KENT, EDWARD AUGUSTUS, duke of, was fourth son of George III. He commanded in both America and Spain. In 1818 he married a daughter of the duke of Saxe-Coburg, by whom he had the Princess Victoria, who is now queen of England.

Born 1767; died 1820.

KENTIGERN, or ST. MUNGO, ken'-ti-gern, a Scotch bishop, was the son of a British prince and princess, settled on the north side of the Firth of Forth. He was educated at the monastery of St. Serf, near Culross, and preached Christianity on the banks of the Clyde, where Glasgow now stands. Being banished to Wales, he founded the bishopric of St. Asaph. Born about 514; died about 601.

KENTON, ken'-ton, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 140 square miles. Pop. 44,000. There are two capitals, Independence and Covington.

KENTUCKY, ken-tuk'-e, one of the United States, bounded on the N. by Ohio and Indiana; W. by Missouri; S. by Tennessee, and on the E. by Virginia. The surface of the state is (except in the south-eastern portion) generally of little elevation, and slopes gradually towards the Ohio on the north, and the Mississippi on the west. The flats which border the shores of the Ohio, from its mouth to that of Big Sandy River, average about a mile in breadth, and produce various kinds of wood, such as beech, maple, sycamore, cotton-wood, hackberry, pawpaw, and honey-locust. These flats are, in some places, subject to periodical inundations, but are nevertheless susceptible of cultivation. Parallel to the Ohio, and behind these flats, lies a strip of country from 5 to 20 miles wide, and extending the whole length of the state. It abounds with valleys, which are watered by numerous creeks, which enter the Ohio. This soil is rich, and the greater part capable of improvement. Between this strip, Big Sandy and Green rivers, and the eastern counties, lies the garden of the state. It is about 150 miles long, and from 50 to 100 wide. This extensive tract is intersected by Little Sandy, Licking, Kentucky, and Salt rivers, and their numerous forks. In some parts there are enormous precipices of limestone along the banks of the river, containing remarkable caverns, of which the most famous is the stupendous Mammoth Cave, which has been explored to the extent of 10 miles, and been found to contain many lateral branches, with rivers and cataracts, and enormous stalactites.

Rivers.—The principal are, the Ohio, which washes the northern margin of the state for the space of 838 miles; the Mississippi, which forms its western limit for 74 miles; the Big Sandy, which forms its eastern limit for nearly 200 miles; the Licking, and the Kentucky, which fall into the Ohio, the one opposite the town of Cincinnati, and the other 77 miles above Louisville. There are, besides, the Salt River, Green River, Tradewater River, and the Cumberland River, all tributary to the Ohio. The Tennessee runs about 75 miles in Kentucky, and then joins the Ohio; and the Kaskinampas, which falls into the Mississippi, waters the western end of the state. There are, besides, numerous smaller streams, which are principally tributary to the Ohio.

Pro.—Wheat, rye, maize, oats, barley, and buckwheat. Maize is the principal grain raised for home consumption.

Cotton, hemp, flax, and tobacco succeed in many parts extremely well, and the potato grows abundantly, as do a great variety of garden vegetables. In the forests are black walnut, cherry, buckeye, sugar maple, mulberry, elm, ash, and other valuable trees. The tobacco crop is very large. Apples, pears, cherries, peaches, and plums are the fruits most commonly cultivated; but horses, mules, cattle, and hogs for export, are the prime objects of rural industry.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, marble, lime, nitre, and salt from mineral springs.

Zoology.—The domestic animals are the same as in the other parts of the northern States, but are large and beautiful, particularly the horse. Cattle are raised in great numbers, and wild turkeys are still numerous in the unsettled parts. Bears, deer, wolves, and foxes are still found in the eastern and southern counties; whilst rabbits and grey squirrels are very plentiful.

Manf.—Cloths and stuffs, bagging for cotton and hemp, iron, castings, nails, earthenware, glass, leather, cordage, paper, distilled spirits, oil, saltpetre, gunpowder, and maple sugar. There are many rope-walks, paper-mills, furnaces, and powder-mills. Large quantities of salt and maple sugar are exported.

Area.—40,300 square miles.

Pop.—1,648,690. Being amongst the oldest of the slave states, a large proportion of the population is of negro origin, though with considerable mixture of races.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 115 counties. FRANKFORT is the state capital; LOUISVILLE the most important commercial town; and LEXINGTON the oldest and finest. COVINGTON and NEWPORT are large and busy towns.

History.—This state originally formed part of Virginia, from which it was separated in 1789, and admitted into the Union in 1792.

KENTUCKY, a river of the United States, rising in three branches or "forks" in the Cumberland Mountains, towards the S.E. corner of the above state in the Laurel Mountains, and, after a course, generally to the north-west, of 260 miles, falling into the Ohio at Carollton.

KENTY, ken'-te, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, on the right bank of the Sola. Manf. Woollens, linens, and leather. Pop. 3,500.

KENYON, LLOYD, Lord, ken'-yon, an eminent English judge. He received his education at Ruthin school, in Denbighshire, after which he was articled to an attorney at Nantwich, in Cheshire. After serving his clerkship, he became a member of the society of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761. His first great rise in the profession took place in 1780, when he led the defence, with Mr. Erskine, for Lord George Gordon. In 1782 Mr. Kenyon was made attorney-general and chief justice of Chester. He was also returned to parliament for Hindon, in Wiltshire. In 1784 he was appointed master of the Rolls; and on the resignation of the earl of Mansfield in 1788, by the interest of Lord Thurlow, he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, and created Baron Kenyon. As an English judge, Lord Kenyon was distinguished for his legal learning, which was exact and profound, and the greater portion of his adjudications are at the present time regarded as of the highest value. He was in private life temperate and frugal, even to parsimony, although enormously wealthy. On his death he left a fortune of £300,000.

Born at Greddington, Flintshire, 1732; died 1802.

KENZINGEN, ken'-sin-gen, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, at the confluence of the Elz and the Black, 27 miles S. of Strasburg. There are a church, town-house, and old Franciscan monastery, and the Elz is crossed by a handsome bridge. Manf. Linen and tiles. Pop. 2,600.

KEOKUK, ke'-o-kuk, a commercial city in Iowa, United States, on the banks of the Mississippi, about 200 miles above St. Louis. There are 12 churches, numerous schools and other educational establishments, including the Medical College of the State, several churches, a hospital, &c. Pop. 12,800.

KEOKUK, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 21,000. The capital is Sigourney.

KEPLER, JOHANN, kep'-ler, a celebrated German astronomer. He received his education at Tubingen, and in 1593 was appointed professor of mathematics at Gratz. In 1600 he went to Bohemia, on a visit to Tycho Brahé, and was introduced by him to the emperor Rudolph, who appointed him his mathematician. Kepler completed the tables left unfinished by Tycho, who died in the same year, and which he called the Rudolphine Tables. In 1613 he was at the assembly at Ratisbon, and assisted in the reformation of the calendar. He was the author of numerous valuable works on astronomy, besides his Tables and Ephemerides; among others, the "New Astronomy," which contains the great treatise on the Motion of Mars. His fame rests upon his discovery that the planetary orbits are elliptical.

KEPPEL, AUGUSTUS, Viscount, kep'-pel, a celebrated English admiral, was the second son of William earl of Albemarle. He accompanied Commodore Anson in his voyage round the world, and afterwards raised himself to the first honours of his profession. In 1778 he commanded the Channel fleet, and in the same year fell in with the French under Count d'Orvilliers, off Ushant. A partial action ensued, which the English admiral intended to renew on the following morning, but the enemy had retired. This affair gave great dissatisfaction to the nation, which was aggravated by Sir Hugh Palliser, second in command, preferring a charge against Admiral Keppel, who was honourably acquitted by a court-martial, at Portsmouth. Sir Hugh was then tried and censured. These trials occasioned great excitement, Keppel being the popular hero. In 1782 Admiral Keppel was raised to the peerage; he subsequently acted on two different occasions as first lord of the Admiralty.

Born 1725; died 1786.

KERAH, or KARA-SU, ke'-rah, a river of Persia, the ancient Choaspes, rising in lat. 35° 38′ N., lon. 46° 40′ E., and flowing southward falls into the Euphrates, after a course of 350 miles. It receives two large rivers, the Mori and the Gomas-Si.

KERRY, ker'-re, a county of Ireland, bounded on the N.W. by the Shannon, which separates it from the county of Clare; on the N.E. by the county of Limerick; on the S.E. by Cork, and on the W. by the Atlantic. Its greatest extent from N. to S. is about 53 Irish miles, and, from E. to W., 41 Irish miles. It is diversified, with an irregular surface, some particular spots being as charming for their exquisite scenery as they are fruitful in crops, and equally adapted for tillage and pasture. A portion of the county in the west and south, however, is dreary, desolate, and covered with lofty mountains, of which Cairn Tual, the highest in Ireland, is 3,404 feet, and there are others of scarcely inferior elevation, and other parts are intersected by tracts of bog. The coast-line is deeply indented with bays and fringed with islands. The chief bays are Tralee, Brandon, Dingle, Ballynaskelligs, and the estuary of the Kenmare river.

Pro.—Agriculture is in a low state; but crops of wheat, barley, and potatoes are produced. Numerous herds of goats and Irish cattle are pastured on the mountains.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, copper, lead, and slate.

Rivers.—The principal are the Cashen, the Lane, the Roughty, the Mang, and the Feale.

KHILOK, ki'-lok, a river of Asiatic Russia, rising in the government of Irkutsk, flowing generally in a westerly direction, and after a course of 430 miles, joining the right bank of the Selenga, 7 miles below Selinghinsk.

KHIVA, KHAUREZON, or URGUNGE, ki'-va (the ancient Chorasmia), a khanate of Turkestan, Central Asia. The name is sometimes applied so as to include a vast sandy desert, over which the khan at one time claimed dominion, but is more correctly limited to oases, or fertile districts bounded N. by Russian territory and the Sea of Aral; E. by Khokand and Bokhara; W. by the Caspian Sea; and S. by Persia. It is generally a fertile tract, watered by canals and by the Amoo river, between which and the Caspian are large swampy tracts, generally under water. The climate is temperate and agreeable, and the soil very fertile, producing abundant crops of wheat, maize, rice, barley, leguminous vegetables, the ordinary fruits, and cotton. The vine thrives well.

Area.—190,000 square miles.

Pop.—500,000, about half of whom are of nomadic habits; and there are nearly 40,000 Persians, who have been taken prisoners and are held as slaves.

History.—Khiva formed part of the ancient kingdoms of Bactria and Persia, and the Kalifate. The Khivans, at one time masters of Persia and Afghanistan, were subdued by Ghengis Khan in 1221. In the early part of the 16th century, a chief of the Uzbeks, a Turkish tribe, obtained the sovereignty, and founded the present dynasty of Khans. The territory has for nearly two centuries been an object of ambition to Russia. Peter the Great sent an unsuccessful expedition in 1717; in 1819 a Russian army perished from the rigour of the climate. In 1873 another expedition was sent, and the town of Khiva was captured in June of that year. The result of the success was a treaty by which the Khan ceded to Bokhara his possessions on the right bank of the Oxus, and agreed to pay to Russia a war indemnity of 2,000,000 roubles (286,900*l.*).

KHIVA, capital of the above Khanate, a miserably built town, inclosed by an earthen wall. There are 17 mosques, and 22 schools, generally mean edifices. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 41° 50′ N. Lon. 60° 20′ E.

KHODORKOW, ko-dor-kof', a town of European Russia, government of Kiew, on the left bank of the Irpen, 51 miles S.W. of Kiew. There is a trade in cattle. Pop. 2,800, including a large number of Jews.

KHOI, ko'-e, a town of Persia, province of Azerbijan, beautifully situated near the Kotoura, crossed by a bridge of seven arches. It is large and well fortified, and has a Khan's palace, several mosques, and many baths. The trade by caravans is considerable. Pop. 20,000.

KHOJEND, ko'-jend, a town of Russian Turkestan, 90 miles N.W. of Khokand, on the Sir-Darya. Pop. 28,000.

KHOKAND, KOKAN, or FERGHANA, ko-kan', formerly a khanate of Central Asia, now incorporated as a Russian province, bounded on the N. by Chinese Turkestan, on the W. and N. by Kirghiz, and on the S. by Bokhara. The territory is bounded on three sides by almost inaccessible mountains; its genial climate and the numerous mountain streams, which are distributed over the whole country by a comprehensive system of canalisation, make it as fertile as a garden. The population is very numerous at the foot of the mountains, where water is most easily obtainable, and the highest cultivation is to be found to the south of the Sir-Darya. Agriculture has attained a considerable degree of development, and large quantities of cotton and silk are produced; there is also considerable mineral wealth, though it has as yet remained untouched except by the Russians who have lately opened some oil wells. In the north, and to a certain extent in the east, the population is mostly composed of nomads; in other parts of the khanate the nomads are gradually settling down into colonists. Among the races inhabiting the country are the Sars, the Kiptchaks, the Kirghiz, and the Usbeks. Pop. 3,000,000.—

Khokand was first invaded by the Russians in 1864 and a treaty of commerce was concluded in 1868, which recognised the independence of the khanate. Subsequent disturbances led again to the interference of Russia, and it was formally annexed in 1876.

KHOKAND, the capital of the above province, is situated in a fertile and cultivated district on both sides of the Syr, or Schon. There is a palace of the khan and some fine mosques. Manf. Silk and cotton. There is a trade in cattle and silk. Pop. 100,000. Lat. 41° 23′ N. Lon. 73° 32′ E.

KHOLMOGORY, kol-mo-go'-re, a Russian town in the government of Archangel, noted for its breed of cattle. It was formerly a populous and thriving place, but has declined, in consequence of the removal of the seat of government to Archangel.

KHONSAR, kon-sar', a large town of Irak, in Persia, province of Irak-Ajmi, 80 miles N.W. of Ispahan. It is beautifully situated, and the houses are enclosed by gardens. Pop. 13,000, mostly engaged in raising and preserving fruits.

KHOONDOOZ, koon-dooz', a khanate of Turkestan, bounded S. by Afghanistan, W. by Bokhara, and E. by the Bolor Mountains. The greater part of the surface is mountainous, but there are many fertile tracts. The climate is unhealthy, owing to the prevalence of marshes and the extremes of temperature. There is an active trade with Yarkand and Bokhara, and a traffic in slaves.

KHOONDOOZ, capital of the above khanate, on the left bank of the Bunghee, near the junction of the Goree. It is a wretched place, consisting chiefly of mud huts. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 36° 48′ N. Lon. 69° 21′ E.

KHOPER, ko'-per, a river of European Russia, rising in the government of Saratov, and flowing into the Don, on the left bank, after a course of 300 miles, 100 being navigable.

KHORASAN, or KHORASSAN, ko'-ras-san', 'country of the sun,' a province of the north-east of Persia. Nearly one-third of the province is a salt waste. In the north are branches of the Elburz range, enclosing some fertile valleys. Pro. Wheat, rice, tobacco, cotton, and hemp. Large herds and flocks are reared, and goats' hair is an important article of produce. Area, 210,000 square miles. Pop. 2,000,000. Lat. between 31° and 38° N. Lon. between 53° and 62° E.

KHORSABAD. (See NINEVEH.)

KHOSRU. (See CHOSROES.)

KHURJA, koorja, a town of British India, 54 miles S. of Meerut, near the Ganges Canal. Pop. 27,190.

KHUZISTAN, ku-sis-tan', a province of Persia, bordering on the Persian Gulf, and with the Tigris and Euphrates on the western boundary, mostly mountainous, and with large desert tracts, but there are some fertile valleys, producing maize, barley, rice, cotton, silk, dates, sugar, and indigo. Large herds and flocks are also reared. Lat. between 30° and 38° 1′ N. Lon. between 47° 45′ and 51° E.

KHVALINSH, ke-vai'-linsh, a town of Russia, government of Saratov, on the right bank of the Volga, 120 miles N.E. of Saratov. There is an important fishery, and a considerable trade in corn with Astrakhan. Pop. 14,500.

KHYBER PASS. (See AFGHANISTAN.)

KHYERPOOR, ki-er-poor', a town of Scinde, 15 miles from the Indus. It is a wretched, filthy place, with mud hovels, but the residence of the Ameers of Scinde. Manf. Coarse cottons. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 27° 30′ N. Lon. 68° 48′ E.

KI or KEY ISLANDS, ke, a group in the Malay archipelago, about 70 miles from the south-west coast of Papua, producing timber, tortoise-shell, and cocoa-nut oil. Pop. of the whole, about 10,000. Lat. 6° S. Lon. 133° E.

KIAKHTA, or KIACHTA, ke-ak'-ta, a town of Asiatic Russia, government of Irkutsk, 170 miles S. of Irkutsk, on the boundary of Chinese Mongolia. On the Chinese side is a town or suburb, Maimachen. It is the centre of all the trade carried on between the Russian and Chinese empires. The great fair is held in December, when merchants flock thither from every part of the Russian empire. They bring cloths, furs, beavers, Russia and Morocco leather; and receive in exchange, nankeens, silk stuffs, tea, rhubarb, &c. Lat. 50° 20′ N. Lon 106° 35′ E. Pop. about 5,000.

KIAMA, ki-a-ma', a town of Western Africa, 56 miles S.W. of Boussa. It carries on a considerable trade with Dahomey and other neighbouring states. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 9° 38′ N. Lon. 3° 45′ E.

KIAMA, a seaport of New South Wales, Australia, 90 miles S. of Sydney. There is a good harbour, the works connected with which have cost £30,000. There are several churches, barracks, and hotels. In the neighbourhood are many dairy farms, and there is a considerable export of butter, eggs, and poultry. Pop. 1,600.

KIDDERMINSTER, kid'-der-mins'-ter, a market-town and municipal and parliamentary borough of Worcestershire, divided into two unequal parts by the Stour, 15 miles from Worcester. Its principal buildings are a town-hall, corn-exchange, public-hall, market-house and workhouse, grammar-school, and various other schools. The church is a handsome building in the decorated and perpendicular styles, and contains several interesting monuments. There are five modern churches, and several places of worship for dissenters. Manf. Kidderminster has long been noted for its broad-cloth, which was made in the reign of Henry VIII. This was succeeded by linsey-woolsey; after which woollen and worsted tammies, and flowered stuffs were introduced; and since that period, crapes, bombazines, poplins, and damasks for upholsterers. But the carpet manufacture is that which has taken the firmest root here, has flourished best, and promoted most essentially the trade, wealth, and population of the town. Pop. 24,270.—A station on the Great Western railway.

KIDWELLY, kid-wel'-le, a market-town of Caermarthenshire, on an inlet in Caermarthen Bay, and 9 miles S. of the town of that name. It is divided into the Old and New town, on both sides of the Lesser Gwendraeth, a handsome stone bridge over the river forming the communication between them. There is a handsome cruciform church, with a tower at the west end, and a spire 165 feet high. There are extensive remains of the old castle, on the west side of the Gwendraeth. The trade consists mostly in the coal and iron which abound greatly in the neighbourhood. Pop. 1,355.—A station on the Great Western railway.

KIEF. (See KIEV.)

KIEL, keel, a walled seaport-town, the capital of the Prussian province of Slesvig Holstein, at the extremity of an inlet from the Baltic, called the Kielerfiord, 54 miles N.E. of Hamburg. It is regularly built, and has straight, well-paved streets, which terminate in the market-place. Its principal buildings are the church of St. Nicholas, five other churches, a castle, in which is a gallery of sculptures, and a university, founded in 1665. There are two bridges connecting the older part of the town with the suburbs. There are pleasant public gardens, and a bathing establishment. The harbour is good, and shipbuilding and mercantile agency are the principal occupations of the people. It is an important station for steamboat communication between Germany and the Baltic ports. Manf. Tobacco, sugar, woollens, iron, oil, leather, vinegar, and machinery. Butter is extensively exported. As the fortified naval port of Prussia, the place is rapidly rising in importance. Lat. 54° 10′ 43″ N. Lon. 10° 8′ 18″ E. Pop. 51,699.

KIELCE, keelse, a town of European Russia, in Poland, 105 miles S.W. of Warsaw. There are a collegiate and three other churches, an episcopal palace, a gymnasium, and other educational establishments. Manf. Hardware. There are copper, iron, and lead mines in the vicinity, and a trade in corn is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

KIEN-LOONG, ke-en'-loong', emperor of China, who succeeded his father, Yung-Tching, in 1736. He wrote some poetical pieces, and when Lord Macartney went to China as ambassador, he gave him some of his verses to present to the king of England. He favoured the missionaries, and was, in all respects, a very amiable monarch.

Born 1709; died 1796.

KIEOU-KIANG, ke-oo-ke-ang, a city and treaty port of China, province of Keang-se, on the right bank of the Yang-tse-Kiang. The harbour is large, and an active trade is carried on. Lat. 29° 38′ N. Lon. 115° 42′ E.

KIERINGS, ALEXANDER, keé'-rings, a landscape-painter of Utrecht. His views were copied from nature, and he finished them with amazing patience, even the bark and the fibres of the trees being distinctly marked.

Born 1590; died 1646.

KIEV, KIEF, or KIEW, ke'-ef, a large government of European Russia, comprising a part of the Ukraine, and bounded by the provinces of Podolia, Volhynia, Minsk, Tschernigov, and Poltava, from which last it is separated by the Dnieper. In the south are branches of the Carpathian ranges, and on the north the surface is flat and marshy; but other districts are fertile, and covered with good timber. Pro. Wheat, rye, oats, maize, hemp, lint, hops, wines, and tobacco. Cattle are also extensively reared. Manf. Beetroot sugar, tobacco, cloth, china, and earthenware. There is a large trade in timber and firewood. Area, 19,546 square miles. Pop. 2,507,231.

KIEV, the capital of the above province, on the right bank of the Dnieper, crossed by a very fine suspension bridge. Kiev really consists of three towns. Petchersk, on a steep hill, is strongly fortified, and contains the remarkable wooden church of St. Nicholas, and near to it is the famous monastery of Petscherkoi, with long ranges of caverns, forming catacombs. Kiev Proper occupies a height on the north, and is also, but less elaborately, fortified. It contains the famous cathedral of St. Sophia, founded in the 11th century, and contains a marble tomb of the grand duke Jaroslav, who built it. The third town, Podol, the poorest part, is at the foot of the hill. There are altogether 30 churches, and among the other public buildings are the palace of the archbishop, a university founded in 1833, a gymnasium, and other educational institutes. Manf. Leather, pottery, and confectionery. There is a large annual fair, lasting three weeks, and an extensive trade is carried on. Pop. 70,500.—Kiev was anciently recognised as the capital of Russia, and it was there that Christianity was introduced.

KIL, or KILL, kil, a prefix, signifying "a wood" and "church," and connected with the names of numerous parishes in Ireland. Also the prefix of several places in Scotland.

KILBIRNIE, kil-bir'-ne, a village of Ayrshire, Scotland, on the Garnock, 17 miles S.W. of Glasgow. Manf. Extensive, including cotton spinning and weaving, muslin embroidery, handloom weaving, iron founding and smelting. Pop. 5,243.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

KILBURN, kil'-burn. (See LONDON.)

KILBYE, RICHARD, kil'-be, an English divine, who, in 1590, was elected rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, and was afterwards made Hebrew professor and prebendary of Lincoln. He was one of the translators of the present version of the Bible.

Died 1620.

KILDA, ST., kil'-da, a general name for a group of small islands, 60 miles from the west coast of Scotland. There are very few inhabitants. The principal island gives its name to the rest. It is about 3 miles long from east to west, and 2 broad from north to south. Next to St. Kilda, Borera is the largest of the islands; it presents a beautiful verdure. Soa is the next in size, and possesses also some pasturage; but Lavenish, Stackly, and Stackermin, are devoid of any. The islands altogether are supposed to be capable of pasturing 2,000 sheep.

KILDARE, kil-dair', an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, bounded on the N. by Meath, on the E. by Dublin and Wicklow, on the S. by Carlow, and on the W. by King's and Queen's counties. It is generally an extensive flat of fine arable soil, which for centuries has mostly supplied the capital with grain. It comprehends, however, a considerable tract of bog, including a portion of the great bog of Allen. The Curragh of Kildare is one of the most beautiful commons in the island. It is 6 miles long and 2 wide. There are several round towers, crosses, old castles, and other antiquities. The well-known Roman Catholic College of Maynooth is in this county.

Rivers.—The principal are the Barrow, the Liffey, the Blackwater, and the Boyne.
Area.—715 square miles.
Pop.—76,102, of whom 72,000 are Roman Catholics.
Chief Towns.—KILDARE, Naas, and Athy.
Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

KILDARE, a market-town of Ireland, in the above county, 25 miles S.W. from Dublin. It has the ruins of two abbeys, a cathedral, an infirmary, market-house, and a jockey-club. The town is chiefly supported by the frequent horse-races on the Curragh, on which a permanent military camp has been formed. Pop. 1,400.—A station on the Great Southern and Western of Ireland railway.

KILIA, kil'-e-a, a fortified Turkish town, situated on a branch of the Danube, 25 miles N.E. of Ismail, in the province of Bessarabia. Pop. 6,500.

KILIAN, St., Bishop of Wurzburg, in the 7th century. He was one of a band of Irish missionaries who introduced the Christian religion into Thuringia, under papal sanction. Having provoked the enmity of Geilana, the wife of duke Gosbert, by declaring her marriage invalid in consequence of her previous union with Gosbert's brother, he was murdered, with his companions, Colman and Donatus.

Died 789.

KILIMANDJARO, kil-e-mand'-ja-ro, the highest known mountain in Africa. (See AFRICA.)

KILKEE, kil-kee', a watering place of the county of Clare, Ireland, on the creek of Mabay, 8 miles N.W. of Kilrush. The accommodation for bathing is good, and there are chalybeate springs. Pop. 1,900.

KILKENNY, kil-ken'-ne, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, bounded on the N. by Queen's county, on the E. by Carlow and Wexford, S. by Waterford, and W. by Tipperary. The surface is generally undulating and fertile. There is little of bog land; and where the hills subside into plains or valleys, the soil is of great fertility. There are very extensive dairies, from the produce of which many farmers pay their rents; but agriculture generally is in a backward state. The cave of Dunmore, between Kilkenny and Castlecomer, is entered by a natural arch 50 feet high, contains many stalactites, and is traversed by a subterranean stream. There are many ecclesiastical and other interesting antiquities in the county.

Rivers.—The Barrow, Nore, and Suir.

Minerals.—In the N. parts of the county are excellent quarries for flags, and coal is in great abundance but of poor quality. In the limestone district are many valuable quarries of black marble. Manganese, iron ore, lead ore, and some indications of copper ore, are perceived in different parts.

Area.—796 square miles,

Pop.—99,064, of whom 92,000 are Roman Catholics.

Chief Towns.—KILKENNY, the capital; Callan, Castlecomer, Freshford, and Thomastown.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, and one for Kilkenny.

KILKENNY, the capital of the above county, on the Nore, across which there are two handsome bridges, 61 miles S.W. of Dublin. It contains many fine buildings. The most remarkable are the castle of the earl of Ormond, now modernized; the cathedral (restored in 1864), part of which dates from the 13th century; the Abbey church of St. John's (the Black Abbey); a new Roman Catholic cathedral; St. Kyran's College, for Catholics; and the college, or grammar school. Manf. Starch, machinery, metal foundry, carriages, leather, and nails. There are extensive marble works, and a large provision trade is carried on. Pop. 12,299.—A station on the Great Southern and Western of Ireland railway.

KILLALA, kil'-la-la, a market-town and seaport of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, 8 miles N. of Ballina. There is a small but ancient cathedral. Pop. 940.—Here, in 1798, a French force landed and took the town.

KILLALOE, kil-la'-lo, a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Clare, on the right bank of the Shannon, over which is a bridge with 19 arches, 13 miles N.E. of Limerick. It is a very old town, destitute of trade. The cathedral is a venerable structure, which has been built above seven centuries. Steamboats ply from this place to Limerick by means of canals. About a mile from Killaloe was the residence of King Brian Boroimhe, but which is now marked only by an earthen fort. Ballina is a suburb, on the opposite bank of the river. Manf. Marble chimney pieces and ornaments, frieze, coarse linens, and flannel. There are works for marine boilers, and large slate quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 2,000.—A station on the Waterford and Limerick railway.

KILLARNEY, kil-lar'-ne, a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, province of Munster, much frequented on account of the adjoining lakes of Killarney. It is 46 miles N.W. of Cork. Its public buildings are a parish church, a Roman Catholic cathedral, a monastery, nunnery, court-house, market-house, and assembly-rooms. Pop. 6,651.—A station on the Great Southern and Western of Ireland railway.

KILLARNEY, LAKES OF, three connected lakes in the county of Kerry, Ireland, the lowest of which is within 2 miles of the above town,—the Lower, which is the largest (about 5 miles long and 3 broad, with numerous islands), Middle, and the Upper. The surplus water is conveyed by the river Laure to Castlemain Harbour. The scenery of these lakes is almost unrivalled for beauty.

KILLIECRANKIE, kil-le-krank'-e, a noted pass to the Highlands of Scotland, in Athol, near the junction of the Tummel with the Garry, 15 miles N.W. of Dunkeld. At the N.W. end, the battle in which Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, fell, was fought in 1689.

KILLIGREW, CATHARINE, kil'-li-gru. She married Sir Henry Killigrew, of Cornwall, and was a lady of great accomplishments, being mistress of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages. She also wrote many poems.

Born in Essex, about 1530; died about 1600.

KILLIGREW, ANNE, a beautiful and accomplished English lady. She received a liberal education, distinguished herself in painting, and drew the portraits of the duke and duchess of York; she was also eminent for her piety. Her poems were published in 1686, with an elegiac ode by Dryden prefixed.

Born in London, 1660; died 1685.

KILLIGREW, WILLIAM, an English dramatic writer, was the son of Sir Robert Killigrew. He received his education at St. John's College, Oxford, after which he went on a tour of travel. On his return, he was made governor of Falmouth, and Pendennis Castle. For his adherence to the cause of Charles I. he suffered considerably in his fortune. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made vice-chamberlain to the king. Besides "The Siege of Urbin," "Selindra," "Ormasdes; or, Love and Friendship," he wrote "Midnight and Daily Thoughts," in prose and verse, and "The Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court."

Born at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605; died 1693.

KILLIGREW, THOMAS, brother of the preceding. He was page to Charles I. and groom of the bedchamber to Charles II. He wrote nine plays. He was commonly called King Charles's jester; but had more wit in conversation than in writing.

Born 1611; died 1682.

KILLIGREW, HENRY, brother of the above. In 1642 he was made prebendary of Westminster. He suffered much for his loyalty to Charles I. in the rebellion, but at the Restoration recovered his prebend, and was appointed master of the Savoy, and rector of Wheathamstead, in Hertfordshire. He wrote "The Conspiracy," a tragedy; "Pallantus and Eudora," a tragedy.

Born 1612; died about 1690.

KILMAINE, CHARLES JOSEPH, kil-main', a general in the armies of the French republic. He fought against the English in America, under Lafayette, and was employed as brigadier in the French army sent into La Vendée; he signalized himself in Italy, at Mantua and at Castiglione, and was nominated commander-in-chief of the army that was to make a descent upon Ireland: but the expedition was abandoned; he was subsequently placed at the head of the army of Helvetia; but, being unsuccessful, was superseded by General Massena.

Born at Dublin, 1754; died at Paris, 1799.

KILMAINHAM, kil-main'-ham, a suburb of DUBLIN. (See DUBLIN.)

KILMARNOCK, kil-mar'-nok, a parliamentary and municipal borough and market-town of Ayrshire, in Scotland, 19 miles S.W. of Glasgow, near the confluence of Kilmarnock water with the Irvine. It is generally well built of freestone. The town-house is on a bridge across the Kilmarnock; there are 9 churches, and several chapels, and near the cross is a marble statue of Sir James Shaw. A stone pillar, about 9 feet high, called Seuls' Cross, erected in 1444, in memory of an English nobleman, Lord Seuls, who was killed on the spot by an arrow from one of the Kilmarnock family, is situate in the north-east part of the town. A statue of Burns, erected at a cost of 2,500*l.*, was inaugurated in August, 1879, and on the same day a public park, the gift of the late Mr. Kay, of Glasgow, was opened. Manf. Carpets, shoes, blankets, tartans, and other woollen cloths; bonnets, caps, mits, stockings, gloves, leather, saddlery, machinery, muslins, silks, and calico. There are, besides, tan-works, breweries, and works for making machinery, and its dairy produce is extensive, the largest cheese show in Scotland being held here. Pop. 25,864.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

KILMORE, kil-mor', a municipal town of Dalhousie county, Victoria, Australia, 39 miles N. of Melbourne, in a mining district.

KILRUSH, kil-rush', a market and seaport town of Ireland, in the county of Clare, on the north side of the estuary of the Shannon, 36 miles W. of Limerick. It is much resorted to for sea bathing. There is a good harbour, and a trade in provisions, hides, Irish moss, and turf is carried on. Manf. Frieze, flannels, and linen sheeting. Pop. 4,118.—A station on the Waterford and Limerick railway.

KILSYTH, kil'-sith, a burgh or barony of Stirlingshire, Scotland, 13 miles N.E. of Glasgow. Here Montrose gained a victory, in the 17th century, over the covenanters. Pop. 6,840, chiefly cotton weavers.

KILWA. (See QUILOA.)

KILWARDEN, ARTHUR WOLFE, LORD, kil-waor'-den, chief justice of the King's Bench, in Ireland. He was called to the bar in 1766; he was afterwards appointed king's counsel, and sat in parliament. In 1787 he was made solicitor-general, and two years later attorney-general. On the death of Lord Clonmel he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, in which dignity he conducted himself with impartiality and moderation. Notwithstanding this, he fell a victim to a ferocious mob, by whom he and his nephew, the Rev. Richard Wolfe, were dragged from his coach in Thomas Street, Dublin, and murdered. Miss Wolfe, his lordship's daughter, was in the coach, but one of the mob took her under his protection, and conveyed her to a place of safety. The death of the old judge has been portrayed in a popular picture called the "Assassination of Lord Kilwarden."

Died 1803.

KILWINNING, kil-win'-ning, a town of Ayrshire, Scotland, on the right bank of the Garnock, over which is a stone bridge of two arches, 3 miles from Irvine. Adjoining to it is the small village of Byres. It is noted for being the seat of the first Masonic lodge in Scotland, whence all the other lodges have taken their rise. Of this lodge the poet Burns was a member. The ruins of a monastery are to the south of the town. There are collieries and iron-works in the vicinity. Eglinton Castle is about a mile and a half to the south-east of the town. Pop. 7,037.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

KIMBLE, kim'-bel, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,400 square miles. It is almost uninhabited.

KIMBOLTON, kim-bole'-ton, a market-town of Huntingdonshire, 9 miles S.W. of Huntingdon, noted for its castle, where queen Katharine of Aragon was confined, after her divorce from Henry VIII. It is now the residence of the duke of Manchester. Pop. 1,600.

KIMCHI, DAVID, kim'-che, a celebrated Jewish rabbi and commentator. He was a native of Spain, and had two brothers, Joseph and Moses, both men of learning. David's "Commentary on the Old Testament" is regarded as a work of the greatest value by the Jews. He was appointed, in 1232, to arbitrate with respect to the differences between the French and Spanish synagogues respecting the books of Maimonides. His Hebrew Grammar was printed at Venice in 1545, and his Talmudical Dictionary in 1506.

Died 1240.

KIMPOLUNG, kim'-po-lung, a town of Wallachia, 80 miles N.W. of Bucharest. There are several Roman Catholic and Greek churches and convents. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 8,500.

KINASTON, SIR FRANCIS, ki-nas'-ton, English poet, was educated at Oxford and Cambridge. He was knighted by James I., and wrote numerous poems of small value. His best claim to remembrance is that he endeavoured to establish a university in London, and commenced by founding an institution, in Covent Garden, known as Minerva's Museum.

Born at Otley, Shropshire, 1587; died 1642.

KINCARDINE, kin-car'-dine, a burgh of barony and seaport of Scotland, on the right bank of the Forth, with a commodious harbour, 25 miles S.E. of Perth. Shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent, and coal is exported. Pop. 2,000.

KINCARDINESHIRE, or the MEARNS, kin-kar'-din-sheer, a county of Scotland, bounded on the E. by the North Sea, for about 35 miles, including the various indentations of a high and precipitous rocky shore; on the N. by the river Dee and part of Aberdeenshire; and on the W. and S. by Forfarshire, from which it is separated, in almost the whole line, by the river North Esk. The county is extremely diversified, and may be divided into the five following districts:—1. The Deeside district, or the valley which lies on the N. side of the Grampians, through which flows the river Dee.—2. The district on the coast, N. of the Water of Cowie, which flows into the German Ocean near Stonehaven.—3. The Coast district, S. of this water.—4. The Valley, or How of the Mearns, to the S. of the Grampians.—5. That part of the county which is occupied by the Grampians. Of the Dee-side district there is little more than one-eighth part in cultivation. The Coast district, north of Stonehaven, is generally barren and unproductive. The district on the coast S. of this, contains very fertile lands, with some that are not so valuable. The valley, or How of the Mearns, lies to the W. of the Dee district, and immediately S. of the Grampians. It is a low champaign country, well cultivated, and dotted with gentlemen's seats, villages, and plantations. The dreary regions of the Grampians stretch through the whole breadth of the country, from E. to W., with the Dee-side district on the N., and the How of the Mearns on the S., and carries sterility of soil and ruggedness of aspect almost to the verge of the ocean. This bleak country, commencing at about three miles from the coast, with a height of from 500 to 600 feet, increases rapidly in altitude, but at a tolerably regular scale of gradation, until, at the W. extremity of the county, the culminating point appears in Mount Battock, nearly 2,500 feet above the level of the sea. The principal antiquities are Fenella's Castle, remarkable for vitrified walls, about a mile and a half W. of Fettercairn; the Queen's Castle, about a mile E. from that town; the Kame of Mathers, about 6 miles from Montrose; Whistleberry Castle, about 2 miles from Bervie; and Dunnottar Castle, about a mile S. from Stonehaven; all placed on the summits of lofty insulated rocks on the seashore.

Rivers.—The principal are the Dee, the North Esk, Bervie Water, and the Cowie. There are, also, the Carron, the Feuch, the Aven, and the Dye, besides others of inferior note.

Minerals.—Granite and sandstone.

Area.—394 square miles.

Pop.—34,651.

Chief Towns.—STONEHAVEN, the county town; Bervie (or Inverbervie), Laurencekirk, and Johnshaven.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

KINDERHOOK, kin'-der-hook, a village of New York, United States, 19 miles S. of New York. Manf. Cotton. Pop. 4,400.

KINEL, ki'-nel, a river of Russia, rising in a branch of the Ural Mountains, in the government of Orenburg. After a circuitous course of 170 miles, it joins the right bank of the Samara, 20 miles above the town of that name.

KING, PETER, Lord Chancellor of England. His father was a grocer, and intended him for the same business; but a love of learning rendered him superior to trade, and he was suffered to follow his inclination. The philosopher John Locke, who was his maternal uncle, left him half his library at his death, which was of great service to him. By the advice of the same great man he went to Leyden, and, on his return, entered of the Inner Temple, where he applied himself to the study of the law with great assiduity. He also devoted some time to other studies, particularly theology, and in 1691 published, anonymously, "An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church, that flourished within the first 300 years after Christ." This work was well received, and soon reached a second edition. In 1699 he was chosen member of parliament for Beer-Alston, in Devonshire. In 1702 appeared his "History of the Apostles' Creed," a book of considerable information. In 1708 he was chosen recorder of London, and knighted. In 1709 he was appointed one of the managers of the House of Commons on the trial of Dr. Sacheverel. At the accession of George I., in 1714, he was made chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, and, in 1725, created Lord King, baron of Ockham, in Surrey, and shortly after was appointed lord chancellor. He resigned the seals in 1733.

Born at Exeter, 1669; died 1734.

KING, WILLIAM, an English writer. In 1718 he was chosen principal of St. Mary Hall, but, on offering himself as candidate to represent the university, he resigned that place. Being disappointed, he went to Ireland; but how long he remained there is not known. While in Ireland he wrote a satirical poem, entitled "The Toast." In 1749 he spoke the oration in the theatre at Oxford, on the dedication of Radcliffe's library. He was a zealous Tory, and generally considered as disaffected to the Brunswick family, which brought him into discredit. He published several curious tracts of his own, and five volumes of South's Sermons.

Born in London, 1685; died 1763.

KING, EDWARD, poet, the subject of Milton's "Lycidas."

Born 1610; died 1637.

KING WILLIAM, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 270 square miles. Pop. 8,000, of whom 5,000 are coloured. The capital is King William Court House.

KING WILLIAM'S TOWN, the chief town of British Kaffraria, Cape Colony, South Africa, on the left bank of the Bush, near its junction with the Buffalo river, 80 miles N.E. of Grahamstown. There are barracks and other military buildings, and a considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 2,000.

KING-CHEOU-FOU, king'-chee-oo-foo', a city of China, province of Hoo-peh, on the left bank of the Yang-tse-Kiang. It is large, well-fortified, and occupied by a strong Tartar garrison. Lat. 30° 28' N. Lon. 111° 37' E.

KING-TE-CHING, tching, a town of China, province of Keang-si. The town had formerly a reputation for the manufacture of the best porcelain in China, which gave occupation to nearly all the inhabitants. Pop. estimated at 1,000,000. Lat. 29° 15′ N. Lon. 116° 52′ E.

KINGAN-FOU, kin'-gan-foo', a large city of China, province of Keang-si, on the left bank of the Kan-Kiang. The suburbs are busier and more thriving than the older part of the town. Manf. Linen and cotton. Lat. 27° 7′ N. Lon. 114° 32′ E.

KINGHORN, king'-horn, a parliamentary borough and seaport of Scotland, in the county of Fife, on the north side of the Frith of Forth, immediately opposite Leith, 3 miles S.W. of Kirkcaldy, with which it unites in returning a member. There is a small and unimportant harbour. Manf. Linen. Pop. 1,800.—A station on the North British railway.

KINGLAKE, ALEXANDER WILLIAM, king'-lake, an English barrister, and author of "Eothen," a celebrated book of Eastern travel. He received his education at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1837. He supplied several articles to the newspapers, during the Crimean war, descriptive of the military and naval operations; he has also written a short biography of the Hungarian hero, General Guyon, and some papers for the "Quarterly Review." In 1857 he was elected a member of the House of Commons for Bridgewater, and again in 1868, but was unseated on petition. In 1863 appeared the first volume of his great work, "Invasion of the Crimea," in which he violently attacked the Emperor Napoleon, exciting much controversy.

Born at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1809.

KINGS, a county of New York, United States, forming the western extremity of Long Island. Area, 72 square miles. Pop. 419,921. Brooklyn is the county seat.

KING'S, a county of New Brunswick, Canada. Area, 1,048 square miles. Pop. 25,000. Hampton is the capital.

KING'S, a county of Nova Scotia, Canada. Area, 812 square miles. Pop. 22,000. The capital is Kentville.

KING'S, a county of Prince Edward's Island, Canada. Area, 644 square miles. Pop. 26,500. The capital is Georgestown.

KING'S COUNTY, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster. It is bounded on the N. by East and West Meath, on the E. by Kildare and Queen's county, on the S. by Tipperary, and on the W. by Roscommon and Galway, from which it is separated by the river Shannon. The arable land is naturally fertile, and chiefly consists either of a deep moor or a shallow gravelly loam; but more than a third part of the whole county is occupied by bog and mountain. The Bog of Allen traverses it from east to west, and in the south are branches of the Slieve Bloom Mountains. In the north-west are the ruins of the famous Clonmacnoise Abbey, and there are numerous castles, chiefly of the Elizabethan period. Wheat, barley, oats, and potatoes are cultivated.

Rivers.—The principal are the Shannon, the Brosna, the Barrow, and the Boyne. There are also several smaller rivers.
Area.—771 square miles.
Pop.—72,668, of whom 67,000 are catholics.
Chief Towns.—Parsonstown and Tullamore.
Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

KING'S ISLAND, an island at the western extremity of Bass's Straits, South Australia. It is 35 miles long, and 13 wide. The only inhabitants are a few sealers. Lat. 39° 35′ S. Lon. 144° E.

KING'S ISLAND, an island of the Pacific, off the west coast of North America. It was named by Vancouver. Lat. 32° N. Lon. 128° W.

KING'S NORTON, a manufacturing village of Worcestershire, 5 miles S.W. of Birmingham. There are an old church in the decorated English style, with a fine spire, chapels, and a free school. Manf. Gunbarrels, bayonets, screws, paper, and india-rubber. Pop. 34,683.—A station on the Midland railway.

KINGSBURY, kings-ber'-re, a county of Dakota Territory, United States. It has been but recently formed, and is very thinly inhabited. Area, 750 square miles.

KINGSCLERE, a market-town of Hampshire, 19 miles N. of Winchester. There are a fine ancient cruciform church, a new church, several chapels, and an endowed school. Pop. 2,000.

KINGSLEY, REV. CHARLES, kings'-le, novelist, poet, and essayist. At 14 years of age he became the pupil of the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, son of the poet. In 1840 he went to Cambridge university, where he distinguished himself both in classics and mathematics. He was at first intended for the law, but the church was afterwards chosen. In 1844 he was appointed curate of Eversley, in Hampshire; two years later he succeeded to the same living. His first acknowledged contributions to literature were a volume of "Village Sermons," and "The Saints' Tragedy," a drama in verse; published in 1848. "Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet," was his third essay, and, from its first appearance, it commanded the greatest attention. The bold and earnest views of its author,—"the Chartist clergyman" as he was called, sank deeply into the public mind. A second novel,—"Yeast, a Problem," was first published in "Fraser's Magazine," and afterwards reprinted in 1851; this is a philosophical rather than a political novel. His subsequent works were "Hypatia; or New Foes with an Old Face," a beautiful descriptive fiction, illustrating the times of the early Christian church in the East; "Westward Ho! or, the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth;" and "Two Years Ago." Mr. Kingsley also produced a volume for juvenile reading, called "The Heroes," in which the deeds of some great chiefs of the Grecian mythology are narrated in a captivating manner. Among the more important of his religious writings may be enumerated "The Message of the Church to Labouring Men," "Sermons on National Subjects, preached in a Village Church," and "Sermons for the Times." He expounded mental philosophy in "Phaethon; or, Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers," and "Alexandria and her Schools;" while, for natural philosophy and the science of natural observation, he contributed his "Glaucus; or, the Wonders of the Shore." He wrote for "Fraser's Magazine," the "North British Review," "The Encyclopædia Britannica," and "Macmillan's Magazine." His "Water Babies," is a charming story for children, "Hereward," a powerful romance of the Saxon times in England; and some of his ballads are among the finest in the language. A bold, independent, and earnest thinker, Mr. Kingsley has, in every one of his popular and excellent works, contributed in elevating and improving the tone of modern society. He was appointed professor of modern history in the university of Cambridge in 1859, but resigned the appointment 10 years afterwards. In 1869 he was made canon of Chester, and shortly before his death, of Westminster.

Born at Holme Vicarage, Devonshire, 1819; died at Eversley, 1875.

KINGSMILL ISLANDS. (See GILBERT ISLANDS.)

KINGSTON, kingz'-ton, a seaport on the south coast of Jamaica, of which it is the commercial capital, situate on the north side of an excellent harbour. The principal buildings are several churches and chapels, a theatre, a free school, Athenæum, a poor-house, and a public hospital. In the lower part of the town is the market-place, which is plentifully supplied with butcher-meat, poultry, fish, fruits, and vegetables, the stalls being mostly kept by negroes. Pop. 32,000.—In 1846 a railway between this town and Spanish Town, 16 miles to the west, was opened.

KINGSTON, or KINGSTOWN, the capital of the island of St. Vincent's, in the West Indies, situate at the head of a bay of the same name, on the S.W. shore of the island. It has a government-house, botanic garden, and a court-house. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 13° 6′ N. Lon. 81° W.

KINGSTON, capital of the county of Frontenac, province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, standing at the E. extremity of Lake Ontario, at the point where the Canadian lakes discharge into the St. Lawrence. It is regularly built, and covers a large surface. Its harbour is one of the best on the lake, which enables it to be the entrepôt of the trade between the two provinces of Canada. There are Queen's University and College, incorporated in 1841; Regiopolis (Roman Catholic College), and several other educational institutions. The town is the seat of the bishopric of Ontario. Manf. Steam-engines, railway rolling-stock, agricultural implements, tools, and leather. Ship-building is extensively carried on. Pop. 14,500.—Kingston was incorporated as a town in 1838, and as a city in 1846. From 1840 till 1845 it was the seat of the Canadian government.

KINGSTON, or PORT CAROLINA, a town of South Australia, on the Maria Creek, 169 miles S.E. of Adelaide. There is a good harbour, and the place is rising into importance.

KINGSTON, a town of Victoria, Australia, near Ballarat. It is the centre of a busy gold field, and is rapidly rising into importance. There are two churches, banks, town-hall, and other good buildings. Pop. 2,000.

KINGSTON, a town of New York, United States, capital of the county of Ulster, on the west bank of the Hudson river, 57 miles below Albany. There are 18 churches, and several educational institutions. Here is the terminus of the Hudson and Delaware canal. There is a large trade in stone, lime, cement, and ice. Pop. 6,400.

KINGSTON, ELIZABETH CHUDLEIGH, duchess of, a celebrated English adventuress. She was at first maid of honour to the princess of Wales, and carried on an intrigue with the duke of Hamilton. She afterwards secretly married Captain Hervey, but separated from him in a short time. Going abroad, she was well received by Frederick the Great at Berlin. On her return to England, she married the duke of Kingston, who left her a widow, with immense wealth; but the relatives of the duke prosecuted her for bigamy, and stripped her of her title; they could not, however, reclaim the great wealth which her second husband's will had given her. She went abroad a second time, and succeeded in inspiring prince Radziwill with a lively passion.

Born in Devonshire, 1720; died near Paris, 1788.

KINGSTON-UPON-HULL. (See HULL.)

KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES, a municipal borough and market-town of Surrey, on the right bank of the Thames, 10 miles S.W. of London. It is of great antiquity, and has a spacious market-place, at the north end of which stands the town-hall. The front is ornamented with a statue of Queen Anne. The church is an ancient cruciform structure. Near the market-place, and enclosed by an ornamental railing, is a large stone, on which, according to historic tradition, seven Anglo-Saxon monarchs were placed during their coronation, and from that the name of the town is supposed to be derived. Numerous Roman remains have been discovered in the vicinity. The river is crossed by two fine bridges, one of stone, and the other an iron railway viaduct. Surbiton is a suburb of the town, with many elegant residences. On the opposite side of the river is Hampton Wick, which, although in Middlesex, may also be considered a suburb of the town. Pop. 19,875.—A station on the London and South-Western railway. Kingston was a place of considerable importance in the Saxon times. Here, in 838, Egbert held a general ecclesiastical council. The first armed force of the parliamentary army assembled in this town, and here the last attempt in favour of Charles I. was made.

KINGSTOWN, a seaport town and watering-place of Ireland, on the south shore of the Bay of Dublin, 6 miles S.E. of Dublin. There is a fine harbour of 250 acres, with two piers and a breakwater. It is a mail-packet station for communication with Liverpool and Holyhead. Pop. 18,586.—There is a railway to Dublin and Bray. Previous to 1821, there was a fishing village named Dunleary, but on the occasion of the visit of George IV. the name was changed to Kingstown.

KINKEL, JOHANN GOETTFRIED, kin'-kel, a German poet and politician. When the revolution of 1848 burst forth on the continent, he was professor of philosophy at Bonn, where he was a Protestant preacher of great popularity. Declaring himself a partisan of the republicans, he was in a few months compelled to fly; but, being taken prisoner in Baden, he was tried and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He was confined in the celebrated fortress of Spandau, but contrived to effect his escape, and reached England. In 1851 he visited America, but in a short time returned to London, where he has since remained, engaged as a teacher of the German language and literature. His poetical works are exceedingly popular in Germany. He has also written several volumes of tales and sketches, a history of painting, sculpture, and architecture, and many other philosophical and historical works.

Born at Obercassel, 1815.

KINNEY, kin'-ne, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 4,487.

KINROSS, kin-ros', the county town of Kinross shire, at the western end of Loch Leven, 14 miles S. of Perth. It has a county-hall, town-hall, and several churches. Manf. Cottons, tartan shawls, plaids, and damasks. Pop. 1,926.

KINROSS-SHIRE, a small county of Scotland, bounded on the N. and W. by Perthshire, and on the S. and E. by Fifeshire. The middle part of this county is occupied by Lochleven lake, from the banks of which the ground rises gently towards the north; but towards the south the rise is more abrupt and rugged. The soil in the low grounds is inclined to clay, and is well adapted for all kinds of crops. In the more elevated parts it is light and scanty, and in the hilly districts moorish and barren. Agriculture is greatly attended to. Lochleven lake is chiefly supplied by three small streams, the North and South Queich, and the Gairney. It gives rise to the river Leven. The antiquities in this county are numerous and interesting. In the castle of Lochleven, Mary queen of Scots was a prisoner for some time.

Area.—70 square miles.
Pop.—6,699.
Chief Town.—KINROSS.
Parliamentary Representation.—The county unites with Clackmannan and parts of Perthshire in sending a member to parliament.

KINSALE, kin'-sail, a municipal and parliamentary borough and seaport of Ireland, in the county of Cork, on a bay at the mouth of the river Bandon, 14 miles S.W. of Cork. The bay forms a fine harbour, two miles long and half a mile wide, called the Harbour of Kinsale, which is protected by a regular fort, begun by the earl of Orrery, in 1670. The town is built under Compass Hill, the chief street running round the hill, with others above it, communicating by steep lanes. The principal buildings are, the parish church (an ancient cruciform structure), a richly decorated Roman Catholic chapel, a friary, nunnery, and town-hall. The fisheries are valuable, and are the principal dependence of the people. There is a trade in agricultural produce. At the termination of a promontory, the Old Head of Kinsale, is a lighthouse. Pop. 5,386.—A station on the Midland Great Western railway. Kinsale was, in 1601, taken by the Spaniards, and in 1608 king James II. landed here. Its foreign commerce is now chiefly transferred to Cork, which it supplies most largely with fish.

KINTYRE. (See CANTIRE.)

KIORBOE, CARL FREDERIC, ke-or'-bo, animal painter. He served in the Swedish army, but for the last 30 years of his life resided chiefly in Paris, where he was a regular exhibitor. One of his works, "The Inundation," representing a dog tied on the roof of a kennel with her puppies drowning around her, is well known by means of engravings and photographs.
Born at Slesvig, 1800; died at Dijon, 1876.

KIOTO. (See MIAKO.)

KIOWA, ki-o'-wa, a new county of Kansas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. Unascertained.

KIPANDA, ki-pan'-da, a town of Western Africa, on the Kikombo, 85 miles N.E. of Benguela. It is defended by a strong stone wall. Pop. 3,000.

KIPINGIUS, HENRY, kip-ing'-i-us, a learned German Lutheran. After completing his education at the university of Rostock, he was pressed for a soldier; but a Swedish counsellor of state, observing him with a Latin book in his hand, took him from the army, made him his librarian, and procured him the place of sub-rector of the university of Bremen. He wrote a supplement to the History of John Pappus; a "Treatise on Roman Antiquities;" and another on the Creation.
Died 1678.

KIPPIS, ANDREW, kip'-pis, an English Unitarian divine and biographical writer, who was educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. His first settlement as a minister was at Boston, in Lincolnshire, in 1746; thence he removed to Dorking, in Surrey, in 1750, and in 1753 became pastor of a congregation in Prince's Street, Westminster. He was a writer in the "Monthly Review" for some time, and in 1761 had a share in a periodical work, called the "Library." In 1777 he became the editor of the new edition of the "Biographia Britannica." In 1788 he published the "Life of Captain Cook," in one volume, and the same year, a "Life of Dr. Lardner." Dr. Kippis also wrote the "History of Knowledge," and a variety of other pieces, particularly sermons and tracts. He received the degree of D.D. from the university of Edinburgh, and was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies.
Born at Nottingham, 1725; died 1795.

KIRBY, REV. WILLIAM, an eminent English naturalist. He received his education at Caius College, Cambridge, and entered upon holy orders in 1782. Up to this period, he had been a diligent botanical observer, and he now became an earnest student of entomology. In 1788 he was nominated one of the original members of the Linnæan Society, to which, in 1793, he forwarded his first paper, entitled, "A Description of three New Species of Hirudo." He furnished to the Transactions of the same learned body a succession of valuable papers during the ensuing four years. In 1802 he published his first separate work, "A Monograph concerning English Bees," which, from the novelty of its observations, and the lucid style in which they were conveyed, excited the liveliest interest in the entomological world. In 1805 he made the acquaintance of Mr. Spence, and the friendship subsisting between these two gentlemen led to the production of a work on natural history, which ranks among the best contributions to the popular science of England. This was the celebrated "Introduction to Entomology," which model scientific work was completed in 1826. In 1830, when 70 years of age, he wrote his "Habits and Instincts of Animals," one of the well-known Bridgewater treatises. Mr. Kirby also wrote the descriptions of insects contained in Captain Parry's "Voyage for the Discovery of the North-west Passage," and likewise those found in the "Zoology of the Northern Parts of British North America." In addition to these, he, throughout his long life, furnished many of the learned societies with papers on his favourite study. He was honorary president of the Entomological Society, fellow of the Royal and Geographical societies, and corresponding member of many scientific bodies on the continent and in the United States.
Born at Barham, Suffolk, 1759; died at Witnesham Hall, 1850.

KIRCH, MARIA MARGARET, keersh, a learned German lady, distinguished for her skill in astronomy. She married M. Godfrey Kirch, an astronomer, and assisted him in his observations, and in the calculation of his Ephemerides. When the king of Prussia founded the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, in 1700, M. Kirch was appointed astronomer, with a pension. There his lady acquired the friendship and admiration of all the learned men. In 1702 she discovered a comet, of which her husband published the observations. In 1707 she made a discovery of a remarkable aurora borealis, of which mention was made by the Academy of Sciences at Paris. In 1711 she published a discourse on the approaching conjunction of Saturn, Jupiter, &c.
Born near Leipsic, 1670; died at Berlin, 1720.

KIRCHBERG, keersh'-bairg, a town of Saxony, circle of Zwickau, 20 miles S.W. of Chemnitz. There is a handsome church, with a fine peal of bells. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths, and tiles. There is a trade in cattle, and three annual fairs are held. Pop. 5,500.

KIRSCHER, ATHANASIUS, keersh'-er, German writer on physical science. He was a monk of the order of Jesuits, and wrote many works, in some of which mysticism is conjoined with physical research.

Born 1602; died 1680.

KIRCHDORF, keesh'-dorf, a town of Hungary, 8 miles S.E. of Leutschau. There are a cathedral and the bishop's castle, a convent, and several educational establishments. Manf. Red woollen sashes. There is a trade in flax and hops, and four annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,500.

KIRCHHEIM, keersh'-hime, a town of Wurtemberg circle of the Danube, 39 miles N.W. of Ulm. It is well built, and surrounded by planted boulevards. There are two churches, a castle, and several schools. Manf. Articles in straw. A trade in wool and wine is carried on. Pop. 5,600.

KIRCHHEIM-BOLANDEN, a town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, 30 miles N.W. of Spires. There are a Roman Catholic and two Protestant churches, and a castle. Manf. Musical instruments and iron. Mines of tin and quicksilver are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

KIRCHHOFF, GUSTAV ROBERT, keersh'-hof, German natural philosopher, appointed in 1854 professor of natural philosophy at Heidelberg. His discoveries in connexion with the solar spectrum placed him on a very high position in the scientific world. He has received the Prussian order of merit, the highest honour of the kind in Germany.

Born at Königsberg, 1824.

KIRCHMAN, N., keersh'-man, a Russian professor of philosophy, celebrated for his electrical experiments, and particularly for the manner of his death. Being engaged near St. Petersburg in attracting, with apparatus, the electric fluid from the clouds, a ball of fire struck him on the head, and killed him on the spot.

Died 1753.

KIRENGHA, a river of Adriatic Russia, rising in the mountains on the west shore of Lake Baikal, and joining the right bank of the Lena, below Kirensk, after a course of nearly 300 miles.

KIRENSK, ke-rensk', a town of Asiatic Russia, in the government of Irkutsk, on the right bank of the Lena, 410 miles N.E. of Irkutsk. It stands nearly 800 feet above the level of the sea, and has several churches and schools. Pop. 1,500, mostly employed in hunting and fishing.

KIRGHISES, or KIRGHIZ, kir'-ge-sees, the "Cossacks of the Steppes," a numerous and widely-extending people of Independent Tartary, occupying a great part of the southern frontier of Asiatic Russia. The area over which they extend is estimated at 850,000 square miles, chiefly composed of barren plains, and abounding in salt lakes, some of which are 100 miles in length. The Kirghises are a Mongol race, divided into three hordes, and numbering about 1,250,000. Their country lies between lat. 44° and 55° N.; lon. 53° and 78° E.

KIRIA, or KERREA, keer'-e-a, a town of Chinese Turkestan, 175 miles S.E. of Rhoten. Near it are gold mines wrought by the Chinese government. Pop. Unascertained.

KIRILOV, kir'-i-lof, a town of European Russia, in the government of Novgorod. It is surrounded by lakes, and, by means of a canal, is united to the basins of the Volga and the Dwina, through the Suchona and Scheksna rivers. Pictures and other articles connected with the worship of the Greek church are made here. Pop. 2,200.

KIRKCALDY, kir-kaw'-de, a royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the north coast of the Firth of Forth, and stretching along the shore of a bay of the same name, forming with its suburbs, Linktown and Newtown of Abbotshall, on the west, and Pathhead, St. Clairtown, and Gallatown on the north-east, a continuous town 3 miles long. There are four churches, a handsome corn-exchange, with a great hall for meetings, and other good public buildings. Manf. Checks, sheetings, dowlas, tull, sailcloth, and cottons, flax, tow, jute, land and marine engines, floorcloth (extensive), and pottery. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 8,528. —A station on the North British railway.

KIRKCUDBRIGHT, or the STEWARTRY OF KIRKCUDBRIGHT, kir'-kud-brite, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N.E. and E. by Dumfriesshire, where the rivers Cairn and Nith form its boundary; S. by the Solway Firth and the Irish Sea; W. by Wigtonshire, where the Cree is the boundary; and N.W. by the county of Ayr. The surface is exceedingly diversified, presenting a continual succession of hills, more or less abrupt. On these, the land is, for the most part, capable of tillage; but it is only in a few places that it presents a smooth and uniformly arable surface, and there are mountains of large dimensions. Of these, Meyrick is 2,746 feet high; Cairnsmore 2,597 feet; and Cuffel 1,867 feet. Considerable tracts of smooth unbroken land are everywhere interspersed among the more elevated parts, and much of it is also composed of smooth rounded hills, which are frequently extremely barren. The moorlands, also, which form a considerable proportion of the county, are extremely barren, though there are detached tracts of alluvial soil interspersed. There are extensive mosses and numerous small lakes.

Rivers.—The principal are the Cree, on the W.; the Fleet, the Dee, formed by the union of the Ken, Deugh, and Dee; and the Orr, or Urr.

Pro.—Wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, and turnips. The pastures are excellent; and the Galloway breed of cattle is reared and fattened for export. Southdown and Cheviot sheep are also numerous on the mountain. The shire is famed for its honey.

Area.—954 square miles.

Pop.—42,126.

Chief Towns.—KIRKCUDBRIGHT, the county town; New Galloway, Creetown, Gatehouse, and Castle Douglas.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

KIRKCUDBRIGHT, the chief town of the above county, on the left bank of the Dee, about 6 miles above its confluence with the Solway Firth, and 25 miles S. of Dumfries. It is neatly built, and has a large and elegant church, several other places of worship, a court-house, and other good public buildings. The harbour is the most commodious on the south coast of Scotland. Agricultural produce is exported. Pop. 2,470.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway. Kirkeudbright was erected into a royal burgh by King James II., in 1455.

KIRKDALE, kirk'-dail, a township of Lancashire, a suburb of Liverpool. (See LIVERPOOL.)

KIRKE, PERCY, Colonel, an English military officer, who was for some time in command of the garrison at Tangier, and made himself notorious by the cruelty with which he treated the native population. He was employed, in 1665, by James II., in the suppression of the Monmouth rebellion, and commanded the troops at Bridgewater, where the wanton cruelty and heartless licentiousness of himself and men, known as "Kirke's lambs," recommended him to the favour of the king. With characteristic want of principle he deserted his old master, and made peace with William of Orange, by whom he was sent to relieve Londonderry, in 1689. He exhibited little energy, and it was not until he had received imperative orders from home that he accomplished the task. In 1699 he fought a duel with Conway Seymour, eldest son of Sir Edward Seymour, in St. James's Park. The quarrel arose from an impertinent remark made by Kirke, and Seymour received a wound which proved fatal. Kirke was tried and found guilty of manslaughter.

Died about 1699.

KIRKE, SIR DAVID, colonial adventurer. He was the son of an English merchant at Dieppe, France. He started as wine merchant at Bordeaux and Cognac, but the Huguenot troubles drove him out of France, and in 1627, he went in an expedition under letters of marque to break up the French settlements in Canada and Nova Scotia. In this he was partially successful, defeating De Roquement, the French admiral, near Gaspé; and in a second expedition he obtained possession of Nova Scotia. On his return in 1632, he was knighted by Charles I., and, with others, obtained a grant of Newfoundland, of which he was dispossessed by Cromwell, but he recovered part of the property by, it is said, bribing Claypole, Cromwell's son-in-law.

Born at Dieppe, 1596; died at Ferryland, Newfoundland, 1653.

KIRKHAM, a market-town of Lancashire, on a small stream flowing into the estuary of the Ribble, 8 miles N.W. of Preston. Manf. Sailcloth, sacking, cotton fabrics, and cordage. Pop. 3,600. —A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

KIRKILISSA, kirk-i-lis'-sa, a ruinous town of European Turkey, 32 miles E. of Adrianople. It is inclosed by walls, and has many mosques and baths. There is a trade in confectionery, butter, and cheese. Pop. 8,000.

There are bleaching and cotton printing works, and collieries, iron mines and quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 10,591.—A station on the North British railway.

KIRKLAND, MRS. CAROLINE STANSBURY, an American novelist and descriptive writer. Her principal works, for the most part characterized by an acute perception, richness of observation, and a light and somewhat sarcastic turn of thought, are—"The New Home" published in 1839; "Forest Life," published in 1842; "Western Clearings;" "Essay on the Life and Writings of Spenser;" and "Holidays Abroad, or Europe from the West."

Born at New York, 1815.

KIRKSTALL, kirk'-stall, a village of Yorkshire, on the Aire, 3 miles N.W. of Leeds. There are a handsome church, and the extensive and beautiful ruins of an abbey built in the 12th century. Manf. Woollens and iron. Pop. 2,900.—A station on the Midland railway.

KIRKWALL, kirk'-waul, a royal and municipal burgh, market-town, and seaport of Scotland, and the chief town of the county of Orkney, in the island of Pomona, or Mainland, Orkney Islands, built on a neck of land projecting into the sea, 26 miles N.E. of John o'Groat's. Its cathedral, or church of St. Magnus, is a fine cruciform mixed Norman and Gothic building, founded, it is said, by Haco, a Norwegian jarl, in the year 1138. Opposite to it are the ruins of the king's castle, also the ruins of a building called the Earl's Palace, and almost adjoining to it is the bishop's palace, a ruin of very great antiquity. The principal modern buildings are a town-hall, assembly-rooms, gaol, custom-house, museum, libraries, and a grammar-school.

Manf.—Linen and straw plait, with an export trade in beef, fish, butter, hides, tallow, feathers, and some corn. There is a large annual fair in August. The harbour is excellent.

Born at Breslau, Silesia, 1577; died 1640.

KIRWAN, RICHARD, kir'-wan, a chemical philosopher. Shortly after concluding his education at the Jesuits' College of St. Omer's, he inherited his family estate, and thenceforth devoted his life to chemical science. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1780, and was subsequently nominated president of the Royal Irish Academy. He was also a member of nearly all the learned societies of Europe. His chief works were "An Essay on the Constitution of Acids," "Geological Essays," and "An Essay on the Analysis of Chemical Waters."

Born in Ireland, 1735; died 1812.

KISARIA. (See CÆSAREA.)

KISFALUDY, SANDOV, kis-fa-loo'-de, Hungarian poet, who studied at Raab and Presburg, served for several years in the Austrian army, and then, being possessed of a sufficient estate, devoted his time between literature and farming. A poem, "Hunfy's Love," published anonymously in 1800, produced a great sensation; and a second part, with the author's name attached, appeared in 1807. This was quickly followed by a collection of the old legends of Hungary, and several historical and social dramas, which were warmly received, and several retain their place on the stage.

Born at Sümegh, 1772; died 1844.

KISFALUDY, KAROLY, poet and dramatist, younger brother of the preceding, who attained very great popularity by his poems, tales, and comedies, and was indeed considered as the founder of modern Hungarian drama. An important literary society, named after the brothers, was established in their honour in 1817.

Born 1790; died at Pesth, 1830.

KISHENAU, otherwise KISHINEFF, a town of Russia, capital of Bessarabia, on the Buik, a tributary of the Dniester, 95 miles N.W. of Odessa. It has rapidly risen into importance. There are 14 churches, a synagogue, and various educational institutions. Manf. Woollen cloths, brandy, leather, and candles. A large trade is carried on in corn, cattle, flax, hemp, fruit, wine, and tobacco. Pop. 130,000, of a very mixed character.

KISHME, or KISMIS, kish'-me, called also Jezira Derauz (Long Island), an island at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, surrounded by many smaller islands, and separated from the mainland by a dangerous strait. It is 70 miles long and 12 broad. The chief town, of the same name, is at the eastern end. The island belongs to the Imaum of Muscat. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 26° 57′ 30″ N. Lon. 56° 50′ E.

KISHNUGUV, kish-noo-goov', a town of British India, 64 miles N. of Calcutta, on the Jellinghee, 10 miles above its junction with the Hooghley. There is a government college. Manf. Fine muslins.

KISS, AUGUST, kiss, a German sculptor. He studied under Rauch, the eminent sculptor of Berlin, and first attracted notice by his colossal group, the "Amazon attacked by a panther," which was cast in bronze by public subscription in Germany. A copy of this work formed one of the chief attractions in the London Great Exhibition of 1851. He was professor of sculpture in the Royal Academy of Berlin, and has produced several groups remarkable for vigour.

Born at Plesz, Upper Silesia, 1802; died 1865.

KISSER, kis'-ser, an island of the Malay Archipelago, lying to the N. of Timor. It has a circumference of about 20 miles and a population of 8,000.

KISSINGEN, kis'-sin-gen, a favourite pleasure-resort of Bavaria, province of Lower Franconia, in the valley of the Saale, 30 miles N.E. of Wurzberg. The mineral waters, which are both drunk and used as baths, are considered to be valuable as remedies for gout and other chronic diseases. Mud baths are also patronized. Pop. 5,000.

KISTNAH, or KRISHNA, krish'-na, a celebrated river of India, rising in the Western Ghauts, at an elevation of 4,500 feet above the sea level, and after receiving numerous tributaries, falling into the Bay of Bengal.

KISTNAH, an Indian district in the province of Madras. Area, 8,471 sq. miles. Pop. 1,548,480.

KISTNAPURAM, kist-na-poor'-am, a town of India, near the Malabar coast, 56 miles S.E. of Cochin. It is fortified, and there is a pagoda, where an annual festival of 30 days is held.

KITCHENER, WILLIAM, Dr., kit'-chen-er, physician and writer on cookery. He is best known by "The Cook's Oracle," but produced works on medical subjects, and the construction of telescopes, and collected the loyal and national songs of England.

Born 1775; died 1827.

KITSOP, kit'-sop, a county of Washington Territory, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 900. The chief town is Port Madeson.

KITTO, JOHN, kit'-to, a modern English writer on Biblical subjects. In his earliest years he displayed great aptitude for acquiring knowledge. His father had been a respectable builder, but was reduced to the condition of a journeyman mason, in which labour young Kitto assisted him. In his 13th year, he had the misfortune to fall from a high scaffold, and, after suffering for some time from its effects, he remained permanently deaf. His after-years were spent in great destitution. He contrived to acquire knowledge, however, and, in 1823, he contributed some essays to the "Plymouth Journal;" and in the following year Mr. Grove, a dentist of the town, took him into his service. He was afterwards sent out, as a printer, to Malta, having previously been taught the trade in the Missionary College at Islington. His constitution being too weak for this work, he returned to England in 1829, and, in the same year, he accompanied Mr. Grove in an extensive Eastern tour. He visited St. Petersburg, Astrakan, the Calmuck Tartars, the Caucasus, Armenia, Persia, and Bagdad, returning home in 1833. In that year he obtained an introduction to Mr. Charles Knight, by whom he was subsequently engaged to edit the "Pictorial Bible," the "Pictorial History of Palestine," and other works. He also wrote "The Lost Senses—Deafness and Blindness," and edited the "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature." In 1854 the doctor's degree was conferred on him by the University of Giessen. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke in 1854, and became greatly embarrassed in his means. A pension of £100 per annum was accorded him in 1850, whereupon he retired to Germany to recruit his health.

Born at Plymouth, 1804; died at Cannstadt, Würtemberg, 1854.

KITTS, ST. (See ST. CHRISTOPHER'S.)

KITZINGEN, kit'-zing-en, a town of Bavaria in Lower Franconia, on the right bank of the Maine, with a suburb on the opposite side, 10 miles S.E. of Wurzberg. Both town and suburb are walled, and the river is crossed by a handsome bridge. The churches and other public buildings are good. Manf. Cottons, gunpowder, basket-work, vinegar, and dyes. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 6,000.

KIUSHIU, or XIMO, ki'-oo-shi-ou, the most southern and western of the large islands of Japan, separated from Niphon by a narrow strait, and from Shikoku by a channel 9 miles wide. It is 240 miles long and 60 broad, and is traversed throughout its length by a lofty chain of mountains, many of them volcanoes. Except on the east coast, the soil is fertile, and well cultivated. There are several streams, the most important being the Kusnayava. The island is divided into nine provinces, and the chief town is NAGASAKI. Area, 17,200 square miles. Pop. Unascertained.

KIUNG-CHAU, ke-ung-cho', a seaport of China, chief city of the island of Hainan. There is a large trade with Macao and Canton. Lat. 20° N. Lon. 110° 22′ E. Pop. 30,000.

KIZIL-IRMAK, ke'-zil-er-mak', a large river in Asia Minor, rising by several heads in the centre of that peninsula, and, after a course of 500 miles, falling into the Black Sea. Lat. 41° 40′ N. Lon. 36° 10′ E.

KIZIL-OUZEN, kiz'-il-oo'-zen, a river of Persia, rising near Senna, and, after a course of 300 miles, falling into the Caspian Sea, 35 miles E. of Reshd.

KIZLIAR, kiz-li-ar', a town of Asiatic Russia, district of Terek. There are extensive vineyards in the vicinity, and a school for instruction in wine-making has been established. There are also tanneries, and the silk-worm is reared. A large trade in wine, brandy, and fish, is carried on. Pop. 7,800. Lat. 40° 55′ N. Lon. 46° 43′ E.

KJOBENHAVN. (See COPENHAGEN.)

KJÖGE, ke-oah'-geh, a seaport of Denmark, on the eastern side of Seeland, on a bay of the same name, 20 miles S.W. of Copenhagen. The harbour admits vessels drawing 10 feet of water, and there is good anchorage in the bay. Pop. 2,800.

The prince-bishop of Gurk has his residence here, and there is a very large library. Manf. Woollen, silk, and cotton goods, and white lead. A brisk transit trade is carried on. Pop. 15,400.

KLAMATH, kla'-math, a county of California, United States. Area, 2,000 square miles. Pop. 1,700, one-third being Chinese. The capital is Orleans Bar.

KLAMATH, a river of California, United States, rising in the south part of Oregon and entering the Pacific, after a course of 250 miles, about lat. 41° 30′ N.

KLAPKA, GYORGY, klap'-ka, a distinguished Hungarian general. He was the son of the Burgomaster of Temesvar, and acquired a knowledge of the art of war in the military college of Vienna, and served, in various grades, with the Austrian army; but, on the outbreak of the Hungarian revolution, in 1848, he offered his sword to his countrymen. In 1849 he distinguished himself in the Hungarian defence of the fortress of Comorn, before which the Austrian army was defeated, with the loss of 30 pieces of artillery, 3,000 muskets, large stores of ammunition, and 2,000 head of cattle. General Klapka communicated the news of his victory to Kossuth and Görgei, but the latter had by that time capitulated, while the former had fled into Turkey. He, however, made terms with Haynau, the Austrian general, by which all the gallant defenders received a safe-conduct to go whither they pleased. He went first to England, and afterwards to Genoa. He published, in 1850, "Memoirs of the War of Independence in Hungary." On the outbreak of the Crimean war, Klapka went to the East; and on his return, after the taking of Sebastopol, he produced a work, entitled, "The War in the East, from the Year 1853 to July 1855." In 1873 he was intrusted with the re-organization of the Turkish army, and specially reported on its condition at the end of 1876, when war with Russia appeared imminent.

Born at Temesvar, 1820.

KLAPROTH, MARTIN HEINRICH, klap'-rot, an eminent German chemist. He greatly advanced the science of mineralogy by his discoveries; and, for his distinguished services as an analytical chemist, was, in 1788, elected member of the Berlin Academy of Sciences; he had previously been appointed professor of chemistry in the Royal Mining Institute. In addition to 207 treatises on mineralogy and chemistry, he published a Chemical Dictionary, in conjunction with Professor Wolff.

Born at Wernigerode, Upper Saxony, 1743; died at Berlin, 1817.

KLAPROTH, HEINRICH JULIUS, von, a distinguished German Oriental scholar. He was son of the preceding, who desired to educate him for his own profession; but he evinced little inclination for chemistry, or, indeed, for any science. When about 15, he was examined with his fellow-pupils of the college of Berlin; he was found so backward in his studies, that one of the professors cried out, "Why, you know nothing at all!" "Beg your pardon," he answered, "I know Chinese." It was subsequently discovered that he had learnt Chinese without any assistance whatever; and his father becoming reconciled to his son's pursuing his favourite studies, he was sent, in 1801, to the university of Halle to acquire the classical languages. His fame as an Oriental scholar led to his being employed by the emperor Alexander of Russia. He went to St. Petersburg in 1805, and, after receiving several marks of favour, was sent, as interpreter, in the suite of the ambassador to China. The embassy had not proceeded more than 200 miles across the Chinese frontier, when they were detained, and finally informed, by messengers from Pekin, that the court did not wish to see them. Klaproth did not return direct to the Russian capital with the other members of the embassy, but travelled alone through Southern Siberia. In 1807 he arrived at St. Petersburg, and was soon afterwards sent to the Caucasian provinces on a scientific mission. He came back, with a large store of knowledge, in 1809. He went to Berlin in 1811, avowedly for the purpose of superintending the casting of types for the printing of his Chinese books; but it was generally known at the time, that he had incurred the displeasure of the czar. The following year he resigned his Russian appointments. After wandering about Germany for some time, he visited Napoleon, for whom he had great admiration, in exile at Elba. The emperor promised him an appointment, which he afterwards forgot to fulfil. Klaproth was after this reduced to straitened circumstances, but, through the influence of Wilhelm von Humboldt, he became royal professor of Oriental languages and literature to the king of Prussia, a post which was accompanied by a liberal pension. Klaproth was, moreover, allowed to live in Paris: there he commenced the publication of a long list of works on Oriental learning and history (especially Chinese) of the greatest possible value, which it is said would fill more than thirty volumes. At his death he left behind, "A Geographical, Statistical, and Historical Description of the Empire of China," which was to have been published in French and English, but has not yet appeared. Klaproth was one of the greatest linguists that ever existed, but possessed none of the characteristics of a literary recluse, having the keenest enjoyment of the pleasures of Parisian life.

Born at Berlin, 1783; died at Paris, 1835.

KLATTAU, klat'-tou, a town of Bohemia, 68 miles S.W. of Prague. Manf. Woollen cloth and leather. Pop. 8,200.

KLAUSENBURG. (See CLAUSENBERG.)

KLAUSTHAL. (See CLAUSTHAL.)

KLEBER, JEAN BAPTISTE, klai'-bair, a French general. He was the son of a working gardener, but was educated as an architect, and sent to Paris for improvement in his profession. Being in a coffee-house where some strangers were in sulted, he took their part with so much spirit, that they prevailed on him to accompany them to Munich, where Kaunitz, son of the Austrian minister, gave him a lieutenancy in his regiment. After eight years' service, he returned to his own country, and became inspector of public buildings in Upper Alsace. The revolution in France rekindled his military ardour, and he obtained a commission in that service. He displayed great skill and bravery at the siege of Mayence, after which he was employed in La Vendée; but the sanguinary scenes enacted there so disgusted him, that he obtained his recall, and was engaged in the north, where he defeated the Austrians, took Mons, and drove the enemy from Louvain; he also captured Maestricht, and contributed to the taking of Dusseldorf and Frankfort, and to the victory of Butzbach. Discontented with the Directory, he left the army, and returned to Paris, where he led a private life, writing his Military Memoirs, till Bonaparte, being appointed general of the army of Egypt, chose Kleber as general of division. At the siege of Alexandria he was wounded in the head, while scaling the ramparts, but did not retire till he received a second wound. He defeated the Turks in several actions, and Bonaparte, on quitting Egypt, left Kleber in the chief command. Soon afterwards he signed the treaty of El-Arish with Sir Sydney Smith, by which the French agreed to leave Egypt; but it was annulled by the British government, and hostilities were renewed. Kleber, though greatly reduced, opposed to his unfavourable circumstances a determined mind, and defeated the Turks at Heliopolis. He next took Cairo by storm, and formed an alliance with Murat Bey; but was assassinated by a Turkish fanatic at Cairo.

Born at Strasburg, 1754; died 1800.

KLEIN, JOHN THEODORE, kline, a German naturalist, who published a "Natural History of Fishes and of Birds." He was also secretary of the senate of Dantzic.

Born at Königsberg, 1685; died 1759.

KLEIST, EWALD CHRISTIAN DE, kliste, a Prussian officer and poet. He served under Frederick II.; and although he only cultivated literature during the leisure allowed by his military employments, he acquired a great poetical reputation. He published, in 1756, a collected edition of his poems. He likewise wrote some reflections on the art of war, which appeared in 1759. He was shortly afterwards killed at the battle of Kunaersdorff.

Born at Zeblin, Pomerania, 1715; died 1759.

KLEIST, HENRY, a German dramatic author, who served for some time in the Prussian army, but was afterwards employed at Berlin in a civil capacity. His most celebrated play is "Catherine of Heilbronn;" he also wrote poems and a collection of stories.

Born 1777; d. 1811.

KLENZE, LEO, Chevalier von, klaint-tse(r), a distinguished German architect. He studied his profession at Berlin, and afterwards went on a tour to France and Italy. While at Genoa he became acquainted with a distinguished lover of art, who introduced him to Jerome, king of Westphalia, whose court architect he became. In 1813 he went to Munich, and there attracted the notice of Ludwig, crown prince, and afterwards king, of Bavaria, who invited him to stay in that city, and appointed him court architect, and commissioned him to prepare designs for the Walhalla, or Hall of Heroes, and for the Glyptothek. The Glyptothek was finished in the year 1830, the Walhalla being commenced immediately afterwards. He was about the same time appointed president of the council for buildings, a privy councillor, and raised to noble rank. He subsequently built the War-Office, the Odeon, the palace of Prince Maximilian, and two new wings to the palace of the king, the street in Munich called "Linden-strasse," and many edifices, public and private. He was likewise the architect of the New Imperial Museum at St. Petersburg. In 1834 he was invited to Athens to improve King Othe's capital. On his return he published a series of designs of Greek architecture. He was a member of almost every artistic academy in Europe.

Born at Hildesheim, 1784; died 1864.

KLEVE. (See CLEVES.)

KLIAZMA, kle-as'-ma, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Moscow, and, after a course of 327 miles, joining the Oka at Gorbatov. It is navigable for about 150 miles, and is a commercially important river.

KLIKITAT, klik'-i-tat, a county of Washington Territory, United States. Area, 3,000 square miles. Pop. 400. The chief place is Rockland.

KLIN, a town of Russia, on both sides of the Lestra, 50 miles N.W. of Moscow. There is an imperial palace, built of wood. Manf. Earthenware, candles, and tiles. Pop. 4,500.

KLINGENSTIERNA, SAMUEL, kling'-enste-air'-na, a Swedish mathematician, who was intended for the profession of the law, but abandoned that pursuit for mathematics. He made a tour of study in Germany and France, between the years 1727 and 1730, and, soon after his return, was appointed professor of mathematics, and tutor to the prince-royal of Sweden. In 1762 was published, at St. Petersburg, a treatise on the means of correcting the aberration of light in achromatic telescopes. He afterwards made a number of experiments on the same subject, transmitting an account of them to England. These papers enabled Mr. Dollond to discover a combination of flint and crown-glass lenses, of great value in correcting the aberration of light in chromatic telescopes. He published an edition of Euclid's "Elements," a Swedish translation of Muschenbroeck's "Treatise on Physics," and two scientific discourses. He was a member of the Royal Societies of Upsal, of Stockholm, and of London.

Born at Tolifors, near Linkoping, 1689; died at Stockholm, 1785.

KLINGENTHAL, kling-en-tal', a town of Saxony, in the circle of Zwickau, 15 miles S.E. of Plauen. There is a beautiful church. Manf. Musical instruments and strings. Pop. 3,300.

KLISSURA, or PERSIDEN-DERVENT, kis-soo'-ra, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, district of Tatar-Bazardjik. Manf. Attar of roses. Pop. 6,000.—The inhabitants of this town suffered revolting barbarities from the Turkish irregular troops in the suppression of a slight insurrection in 1876.

KLOPSTOCK, FREDERICK GOTTLIEB, klop'-stok, a distinguished German poet. He received a classical education at Naumburg, and studied theology at Jena, in 1745. Three years afterwards, he commenced his well-known epic poem, the subject being "The Messiah." He at first published only three cantos of the work, which were universally read, the author being regarded by some as a modern type of the old prophet, and by the rest as an irreverent and presumptuous writer upon a sacred subject. In 1750 he went to Switzerland, where he was received as a great poet. The Danish minister Bernstorff, having read the three cantos of Klopstock's poem, invited the poet to Copenhagen, offering him a pension of 400 dollars, in consideration of his residing in that city and there finishing his epic. In 1751 he set out for Copenhagen, and was received with the greatest respect; subsequently he accompanied the king, Frederick V., on his travels. In 1754 he settled in Hamburg, where he married. He resided in several parts of Germany during the remaining years of his life, and completed his "Messiah" at Hamburgh, in 1771. Besides that epic poem, he wrote odes, dramas, and other poetical pieces; but his writings are not now held in that extraordinary estimation which was formerly the case.

Born at Quedlinburg, 1724: died 1803.

KLOSTERNEUBERG, klos-ter-noy'-bairg, a town of the Austrian empire, on the right bank of the Danube, at the confluence with the Kuling, 6 miles N. of Vienna. It consists of a high and low town, is surrounded by dilapidated walls, and has the ruins of an old fortress. Manf. Lace, morocco leather, sugar, and chemicals. On the hill above the town are a noble abbey, with a church in which is kept the archducal crown of Austria. Pop. 4,800.

KLUNDERT, kloon-dairt', a town of the Netherlands, province of North Brabant, 12 miles N.W. of Breda. Two annual horse and cattle fairs are held. Pop. 3,000.

KMETY, GEORGE, met'-e, a Hungarian general. He studied at the Protestant college of Presburg; but, by a mistake, lost a German scholarship it had been his ambition to obtain. Thereupon he entered the Austrian army as a private soldier; but when the Hungarian revolution broke forth in 1848, he had attained the grade of commissioned officer. Throughout the great struggle maintained by his countrymen in their efforts to gain independence, he figured as a brave and scientific officer; but when Görgei surrendered, with the entire corps under his command, he fled into Turkey, where he became a Mussulman, and adopted the name and title of Ismail Pacha. At the memorable defence of Kars he commanded the Turkish army; and his bravery and skilful dispositions contributed in a great measure to the repulse which the Russian army at first sustained.

Born in Hungary, 1810.

KNARESBOROUGH, nairs'-bur-o, a parliamentary borough and market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Nidd, 17 miles N.W. of York. Its principal public buildings are, a parish church, and other places of worship, a market-house, court-house, a public library; and it has several schools. In the environs are the remains of a famous castle, built in the 12th century, and a famous "dripping well" by the banks of the river, the waters of which have a so-called petrifying quality. Knaresborough Forest extends from the above town 20 miles, and has a breadth of 8. It has, from the time of Edward III., belonged to the duchy of Lancaster. Pop. 5,205.—A station on the North Eastern railway.

KNELLER, SIR GODFREY, nel'-ler, an eminent portrait painter, was educated at Leyden for the military profession, but having a strong inclination to drawing, he resolved to apply himself to painting. He studied first under Rembrandt, and afterwards went to Rome, at which place he greatly improved himself, and then visited England, where he soon acquired unrivalled distinction as an artist, becoming court painter to Charles II. and James II. He visited France, and painted portraits of Louis XIV. and royal family. William III. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and the university of Oxford the degree of LL.D. He painted a great number of portraits of illustrious personages, and to a striking likeness he always added grace and elegance in his subjects. In 1715 he was created a baronet by George I., and the emperor Leopold gave him a patent of nobility. There is a monument to him with an epitaph by Pope, in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Lubeck, 1648; died in London, 1785.

KNIGHT, SAMUEL, nite, a learned English divine, who was educated at St. Paul's School, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge. He obtained several church preferments, and was chaplain to George II. He wrote the lives of Dr. Colet and Erasmus.

Born 1675; died 1746.

KNIGHT, CHARLES, a modern English author and publisher, distinguished for his services as a projector and producer of cheap and valuable literature. His father had for many years conducted business as a bookseller at Windsor, and on his death Charles Knight succeeded him. He for some time published the "Etonian," a periodical which contained the contributions of the best scholars educated in the great public school of that town. The success of this work encouraged Mr. Knight to establish in the metropolis a magazine on a more ambitious plan. This was the origin of "Knight's Quarterly Magazine," commenced in 1823, to which Macaulay, then a young man fresh from college, contributed. Mr. Knight next published the "Penny Magazine," "Penny Cyclopædia," in 1827, and many other works of a like value; such as the "Pictorial History of England," the "Pictorial Bible," the "Pictorial Shakspere," and the "Cyclopædia of London," the "English Cyclopædia," based upon the "Penny Cyclopædia," "Old England, a Pictorial Museum of National Antiquities," &c., &c. Lord Brougham, Mr. Lane, Professor Long, and many other eminent men, wrote treatises, &c., for "Knight's Shilling Volumes," which, for some time, appeared weekly. Mr. Knight was himself an agreeable writer, and reprinted his contributions to various periodicals, under the title of "Once upon a Time," "The Old Printer and the Modern Press," &c. His "Life of Shakspere" was a valuable contribution to English literature; while the notes to his edition of the same poet are generally distinguished for their good sense and learning. Mr. Knight's best and latest work was his "Popular History of England," in eight volumes, a history of and for the people.

Born at Windsor, about 1790; died 1873.

KNIGHT, RICHARD PAYNE, an English philologist and writer on art. He visited Italy, where he imbibed a strong taste for the fine arts. On the death of his grandfather, he inherited a considerable estate near Ludlow. In 1780 he was sent to Parliament as member for the borough of Leominster, and in 1784 was returned for Ludlow. He became a trustee of the British Museum in 1814; ten years afterwards he bequeathed his magnificent collection of antique art, estimated to be worth £50,000, to the Museum. Mr. Knight wrote many works on Greek literature, some of which were devoted to the task of proving that the Homeric poems are the production of a single individual. He also published "An Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste," and a great number of volumes on fine-art subjects.

Born at Wormesley Grange, Hereford, 1750; died 1824.

KNIGHTSBRIDGE. (See LONDON.)

KNIPPERDOLLING, BERNARD, nip'-per-dol'-ling, a leader of the Anabaptists, at Munster, of which town he was appointed governor under John of Leyden. He was executed with horrible tortures.

Died 1536.

KNOLLER, MARTIN VON, nol'-ler, a distinguished German artist, was the son of a painter, but in a very humble position. He continued to assist his father, practise his art, and aid in household duties till about 20 years of age, when the painter, Paul Troger, happened to see some of his performances, and took him with him to Vienna. His progress was very rapid, and in 1753 he obtained the prize of the Austrian Academy for historical painting. He visited Rome in 1755, where he spent three years, and greatly improved his style. He then went to Naples, where he was employed by the Austrian ambassador in decorating his palaces there and at Milan. Knoller paid several other visits to Rome and contracted a close intimacy with Winckelmann and Mengs; but he finally settled at Milan, where he married, and had a large family. He was ennobled at Vienna, by Maria Theresa. His works are very numerous, and are to be found in most of the leading towns in Germany, the Tyrol, and Austrian Italy. He was gay in colouring, correct in design, and his works are distinguished for their dramatic and effective composition, strong expression, and vigorous and uncommon attitudes. He painted historical and sacred subjects, portraits, &c., and worked both in oil and fresco.

Born 1725; died 1804.

KNOLLES, RICHARD, nols, an English historian. In 1564 he became fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and afterwards master of the grammar-school at Sandwich, in Kent. He wrote the "History of the Turks." Of this book there have been several editions and continuations, particularly by Ricaut. Knolles also wrote the "Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings," a "Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish Empire," and a "Compendium of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Grammar."

Born 1540; died in Kent, 1610.

KNOLLES, SIR ROBERT, an English commander in the reign of Edward III., was of low origin in Cheshire, but being of an enterprising disposition, obtained the rank of general and the order of knighthood. His name was formidable in France, where he took several places. He was made grand-seneschal of Guienne, and by his prudence quelled an insurrection in that province. At the close of life he retired to his estate in Kent, where he built Rochester bridge.

Born 1317; died 1407.

KNOLLYS, FRANCIS, nol'-lis, an English statesman. After receiving a university education, he went to court, and became a zealous partisan of the Reformation in the reign of Edward VI., at whose death he went abroad. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned, and was made a privy counsellor, and vice-chamberlain of the household. He was also employed in several important matters of state. He was one of the commissioners who sat in judgment on Mary queen of Scots; was appointed treasurer of the royal household, and knight of the Garter. He wrote a "Treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops."

Born 1530; died 1596.

KNOTT, EDWARD, not, an English Jesuit, whose real name was Mathias Wilson, entered the order of Jesuits in 1606. He taught divinity in the English College at Rome, and afterwards became provincial of his order in England. Knott was the antagonist of Chillingworth, and it was in reply to him that the latter wrote his "Religion of Protestants."

Born in Northumberland, 1580; died in London, 1656.

KNOTTINGLY, not'-ting-le, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the right bank of the Aire, 3 miles N.E. of Pontefract. Lime for agricultural purposes is prepared extensively, and river and small coasting vessels are built. Pop. 9,869.—A station on the Great Northern, and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways.

KNOWLES, JAMES SHERIDAN, nolz, a modern English dramatist. His first effort at dramatic composition was made at the early age of 12 years. Two years afterwards he wrote an opera entitled the "Chevalier de Grillon," and a ballad called the "Welsh Harper." A tragedy and a drama quickly succeeded the preceding. In 1809 he was engaged as an actor and vocalist in the Waterford theatre, and Edmund Kean having joined the company, Knowles wrote a play called "Leo the Gipsy," in which Kean enacted the principal part. He published, about the same time, a volume of poetical "Fugitive Pieces." He next became a teacher of elocution at Belfast, and there produced a play called "Brian Boroihme," which was very successful. "Caius Gracchus" was also played at the same theatre, and with the greatest success. His tragedy of "Virginius" was first produced at Glasgow, and, on being performed at Covent-Garden theatre, in 1829, its author became an established writer for the stage. During the succeeding twenty years he continued to write tragedies, dramas, and comedies with great industry, and enjoyed the very highest reputation as a dramatist. The best of these plays were the "Hunchback," the "Wife, a tale of Mantua," the "Love-Chase," "Love," and the "Rose of Aragon." About 1845 he abandoned the stage under the influence of religious convictions. Two years later he produced a novel called "Fortescue," and subsequently "George Lovel;" these are generally regarded as very inferior to his dramatic works. In 1849 the government granted him a pension of £200 a year. Mr. Knowles subsequently became a Baptist minister, and wrote several sermons and a couple of controversial works, called the "Rock of Rome, or the Arch-heresy," and the "Idol demolished by its own Priest."

Born at Cork, 1784; died 1862.

KNOX, JOHN, the celebrated Scotch reformer, received his education first at the grammar school of Haddington, afterwards at the university of St. Andrew's, and entered into priest's orders before he had attained his 25th year; but an examination of the writings of SS. Augustine and Jerome is said to have occasioned his renunciation of popery, about 1543, for which he was degraded from his orders. On the martyrdom of Wishart, who was burned by order of Cardinal Beaton, Knox was persuaded, with some difficulty, to withdraw into retirement for a time, and devoted himself to the education of his pupils, the sons of the lairds of Longniddry and Ormiston. After the murder of Cardinal Beaton he again entered into public life, and commenced his career as preacher of the Reformed faith. This, however, was soon interrupted by the appearance, in 1547, of the French fleet, with a considerable body of troops, before St. Andrew's. Knox and the other reformers who had defended the place were made prisoners, and Knox was afterwards condemned to the galleys at Rouen, and remained there nineteen months. After his liberation, he went to England, where he was well received and made chaplain to Edward VI., who offered him a bishopric, which he declined, being averse to episcopacy and the common prayer. In the reign of Mary he went to Frankfort, where he preached the new doctrines of the English exiles. Being accused to the emperor as a seditious person, he retired to Geneva, where he was greatly esteemed by Calvin, to whose doctrines he was zealously attached. He there wrote his "Blast of a Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women." In 1559 he returned to his native country, and commenced his ministerial office at Edinburgh by denouncing the acts of the queen and clergy. His sermons produced a general commotion, and the Roman Catholic cathedrals and parish churches were not only deprived of their ornaments, but reduced almost to ruins.

Born probably at Gifford, East Lothian, 1505; died at Edinburgh, 1572.

KNOX, REV. VICESIMUS, an English writer. He pursued a brilliant career at St. John's College, Oxford, after which he became master of Tunbridge school, in Kent. He was an admired preacher in his day, and was esteemed as a pastor. He published—"Moral and Literary Essays," in 1777; "Liberal Education; or, a Practical Treatise on the Methods of acquiring Useful and Polite Learning," in 1781; and "Elegant Extracts in Prose and Verse," the latter enjoying great popularity, but being marked by a lamentable want of taste. In the poetical extracts choice gems of literature are mingled with school addresses and stories which would now be excluded from any decent collection. He was likewise the author of several volumes of sermons and theological essays, and was an elegant and correct writer.

Born in London, 1752; died at Tunbridge, 1821.

KNOX, HENRY, American general, who began business life as a bookseller at Boston. He held a colonel's commission and took part in the battle of Bunker's Hill. His skill as an engineer attracted the attention of Washington, and he greatly distinguished himself in the American army. Congress made him a major-general, and he arranged the terms of the surrender of New York. In 1785 he was appointed secretary of war, a position he retained for 10 years, when he retired from public life.

Born at Boston, 1750; died 1806.

KOBELL, FRANZ VON, ko'-bel, German mineralogist and poet. After completing his education at the university of Munich, he was appointed, at the age of 23, assistant professor of mineralogy in that learned establishment. In 1831 he completed his work on the "Characteristics of Minerals," and afterwards produced a succession of valuable treatises on the same science. For his eminent scientific services, he was appointed member of the Academy of Sciences of Bavaria, and chief conservator of the Munich mineralogical collection. His poetical efforts consist of a volume of lyrics in pure German, and several others in the Bavarian idiom, and in the patois of the Palatinate.

Born at Munich, 1803.

KOBILJAKI, ko-bil-ya'-ke, a town of Russia, on the left bank of the Worskla, 33 miles S.W. of Poltawa. There are 10 churches. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 7,000.

KOBLENTZ. (See COBLENTZ.)

KOCH, CHRISTOPHE GUILLAUME, kok, professor of public jurisprudence at Strasburg, who chiefly occupied himself with genealogy, canon law, and history. He was interrupted in his studies for a time by the French revolution, for, having been elected a member of the Legislative Assembly, he opposed the Jacobins, which caused him to be imprisoned; on the fall of Robespierre, however, he was liberated, and resumed his old pursuits. He was the author of various works, among which may be mentioned his "View of the Revolutions of Europe."

Born in Alsace, 1737; died 1813.

KOCH, JOSEPH ANTON, German landscape painter, the son of poor parents, living in the valley of the Lech, in the south of Germany, was sent by bishop Umgelder, vicar-general of Augs-berg, to the Carls Academy at Stuttgart, where he spent seven years. He then went to Rome, where he settled and married, and enjoyed a great reputation for nearly half a century, being long regarded as the Nestor of German artists in that city. Although specially distinguished in landscape, Koch also painted other subjects, among which may be mentioned illustrations of Dante, "Hofer's Liberation of the Tyrol," "The Flight of Laban," &c.

Born 1768; died 1839.

KOCH, KARL HEINRICH EMMANUEL, German naturalist and traveller, who studied at Würzberg and Jena, and in 1836 traversed Southern Russia in pursuit of science, the result of which appeared in a work entitled "A Journey across Russia to the Isthmus of the Caucasus." In 1839 he was appointed professor of botany in the university of Jena. He afterwards set out to explore Turkey, Armenia, the Pontus, the Caspian Sea, and the Caucasus, where he collected material for the work entitled "Wanderings in the East," published 1846-7, and a subsequent one, entitled "The Crimea and Odessa," which appeared on the eve of the Crimean war. He is the author of other works in the department of natural history, and has published an excellent map of the Caucasian Isthmus and Armenian, accompanied with explanatory notes on the political, the ethnographical, the botanical, and the geognostic state of the country.

Born at Weimar, 1809.

KOCK, CHARLES PAUL DE, kok, a French comic novelist, the son of a Dutch banker, who was guillotined at the time of the great Revolution. He was originally educated for commerce, and placed in a French banker's establishment. While thus engaged he commenced writing, "he knew not why." He produced a great number of vaudevilles, operas, and melodramas, and afterwards wrote a novel, which being successful, the author went on writing similar works, displaying great fertility of invention in the task, but defaced by loose morality.

Born at Passy, 1794; died 1871.

KOENIG, DANIEL, ke(r)'-neeg, a Swiss, who translated Arbuthnot's Tables of coins into Latin, printed at Utrecht, in 1756. He died of the ill-usage he received from the populace of Franeker, who mistook him for a French spy.

Lived in the 18th century.

KOENIG, SAMUEL, brother of the preceding, was professor of philosophy and law at Francker, and librarian to the Prince of Orange. He was a great mathematician, and had a dispute with Maupertuis.

Born 1712; died 1757.

KOERTEN-BLOCK, JOANNA, ker'-ten, an ingenious Dutch lady. She had a taste for drawing in water-colours and embroidery. She also modelled in wax, and made artificial ornaments and flowers; but her principal excellence was in cutting figures out of paper with scissors, and her portraits and landscapes executed in this way became so celebrated, that foreigners visited Amsterdam to see them; among the rest, Peter the Great of Russia. She made a magnificent work for the consort of the Emperor Leopold I., consisting of trees, arms, eagles, and crowns, for which she received about 4,000 guilders. She also executed the portrait of that emperor.

Born at Amsterdam, 1650; died 1715.

Chief Towns.—KÖNIGSBERG, MEMEL, and BRAUNSBERG.

KÖNIGSBERG, a fortified city and seaport of Prussia, and the capital of the above circle, on both banks of the Pregel, 4 miles from its mouth in the Frisches-Haff. A part of it, the Kneiphos, is built on an island formed by the Pregel. The houses have their foundations on piles, as at Venice and Amsterdam. Opposite to this island (which communicates with the other quarters by seven wooden bridges), and on the north bank of the river, stands the rest of the city, consisting of the old town and a quarter to the eastward called Löbenicht. Many of the houses are of great height and with gabled roofs, and the lower stories project like terraces. Among the principal buildings are the cathedral, an ancient Gothic structure, which, besides its architecture and ornaments, is remarkable for its organ, erected in 1721, and containing 5,000 pipes; the large palace, for many years the residence of the grand master of the Teutonic order, is now the government house, and associated with which are many interesting historical reminiscences; and the university, founded in 1544, which has connected with it a library, botanic garden, and an astronomical observatory. There are, besides, many excellent schools in the city. Owing to a bar at the mouth of the Pregel, large vessels are unable to reach the town, but unload at Pillau. Manf. Woollens, leather, gloves, lace, soap, refined sugar, tobacco, starch, and sealing-wax; there are breweries and distilleries on a large scale. Pop. 140,909.—The city was founded in 1257, and was the head-quarters of the famous Teutonic Knights; in 1365 it became a branch of the Hanse League. The town suffered much in the Seven Years' War, and from the French in 1807.

KÖNIGSMARCK, PHILIP CHRISTOPH, Count, ke(r)'-neezh-mark, a Swedish adventurer. He was descended from an ancient noble family of Brandenburg, a branch of which had passed into Sweden, where it had produced many distinguished soldiers. Philip went to Hanover, where the elector Ernest Augustus appointed him colonel of a regiment of dragoons. The electoral prince, George Louis, afterwards George I., king of Great Britain, had married his cousin Sophia-Dorothea, a beautiful, witty, and accomplished princess. This princess did not love her husband, whose cold, brutal nature repelled her, but bestowed her affections upon the handsome Swede. The pair were about to fly together to France, when Königsmarck was assassinated, and his body burned. The princess was afterwards consigned to the castle of Ahlden, where she was confined for 32 years.

Born 1650; died 1694.

KÖNIGSMARCK, MARIE-AURORA, Countess of, was sister of the above, and celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Despoiled of a succession to which she had a claim, she went to Dresden to enlist the services of Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony. That prince became inspired with a lively passion for her, to which she responded, and became the mother of the celebrated Marshal Saxe. On being abandoned soon afterwards, she retired into privacy, and exclusively occupied herself with the education of her son.

Born about 1673; died 1725.

KÖNIGSTEIN, ke(r)'-neezh-stine, a town of Saxony, 18 miles S.E. of Dresden. There is a fortress on a rock nearly 800 feet high, and one of the few in Europe never yet taken. In it the royal treasures have usually, during war, been deposited. Pop. 2,800.

KONRAD VON WÜRZBURG, verts'-bairg, a poet of the middle ages, author of numerous narrative poems, amongst which are "Engelhard," "Otto mit dem Bart," "Der welt Lohn," &c., &c., and an unfinished poem of the "Trojan War."

Died at Basel, 1287.

KONRADIN OF SWABIA, the last descendant of the house of Hohenstaufen, was two years of age when his father, Konrad IV., died. On the plea that the son of a prince who dies excommunicated has no hereditary rights, pope Innocent IV. declared the throne vacant, and in spite of the efforts of the infant prince's protectors, the crown of the Two Sicilies was seized upon by Charles of Anjou. On arriving at the age of 16 Konradin made an attempt to regain his possessions, but was finally defeated and with his relative Frederick of Austria put to death. At the place of execution Konradin threw his glove into the crowd as a gage of vengeance to be carried to his heir, Peter of Aragon, which was done by the Chevalier de Walburg.

Born 1252; died 1268.

At the age of 17 he was sent to the School of Mines at Freiburg; subsequently completing his studies at Leipzig and Berlin. His health giving way, he was sent to Vienna, where, on his recovery, he engaged in poetical composition. He then wrote two plays for the Vienna stage—"The Bride" and the "Green Domino," which, meeting with some success, he produced two tragedies, one of which had for its subject the story of the English "Fair Rosamond." In 1813 he joined the celebrated volunteer corps of Major Lützow, organised to resist the French, and was severely wounded at the battle of Kitzen. In a subsequent engagement he was shot on the road between Gadebusch and Schwerin, and buried under an oak-tree, on the trunk of which his name was engraved by his comrades. He is chiefly famous for his collection of warlike songs, called the "Lyre and Sword," mostly composed in the interval of battle, or by the bivouac fire. His songs, "Männe und Buben" (Men and Cowards), and his "Schwert lied" (Sword-Song) were, and are still, extremely popular with his countrymen.

KOSCIUSKO, TADEUSZ (Thaddeus), kos'-ke-us'-ko, the Polish patriot, studied for the military profession, first at Warsaw, and afterwards at Paris; he accompanied Lafayette to America, and fought against England, on the side of the American colonists. On the conclusion of the war he returned to Poland, and was created major-general, and the courageous manner in which he defended Dubjenka against the Russians, established his reputation for military skill and courage. In 1794 he was put at the head of the Polish army, when his countrymen attempted to gain their independence. In the same year he defeated the Russians at Raclawice; but was himself beaten by the combined Russians and Prussians, in an engagement near Warsaw, shortly afterwards. On the arrival of fresh Russian troops from the interior, under Suwarrow, he marched forth to meet them at the head of 21,000 men. The Russians numbered about 60,000 men. The Poles were defeated, after a desperate battle; Kosciusko being wounded and taken prisoner, exclaiming "Finis Poloniæ." (Campbell writes, "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell.") Warsaw was taken by storm shortly afterwards, and the Poles were completely subdued. The patriot was conducted to St. Petersburg, but was subsequently released by the emperor Paul, who gave him an estate, which he afterwards returned. In 1798 he went to France, and was repeatedly solicited by Napoleon to join his standard; but he would not consent to leave his retirement. On the establishment of the new kingdom of Poland, in 1815, he wrote to the emperor Alexander, thanking him for his generosity. In 1816, he settled in Switzerland, and applied himself to the pursuits of agriculture. He was accidentally killed by his horse falling over a precipice.

KOSSUTH, LAJOS (Louis), kos'-suth (kos-shoot'), the late provisional governor of Hungary. He was son of a small land proprietor in northern Hungary, and was educated at the Protestant college of Sarospatak. In 1819 he began to study the law at the local court of Eperies, and the royal court of Pesth. Three years afterwards, having completed his legal education, he went to Monok, where he obtained a good practice. He left that place for Pesth in 1831, and was sent the following year as representative of a magnate, to the Hungarian diet or parliament, in whose deliberations he was allowed to participate by speech, but without voting. The debates of the diet were soon afterwards circulated by Kossuth in manuscript, and were eagerly sought after; so popular, indeed, did they become, that he set up a lithographic printing-press, to multiply copies of the speeches to meet the demand for them. This proceeding soon became distasteful to the Austrian government, and Kossuth was compelled to abandon his lithographic printing; but he still continued to circulate manuscript reports. In 1836 a number of young men were imprisoned for alleged political conspiracy: Kossuth warmly defended them, and charged the prosecution with illegal procedure and injustice. For this he was himself arrested, brought to trial, and thrown into prison at Buda, remaining therein three years, from 1837 until 1840. His release was obtained in the latter year, through the Hungarian diet's refusal to grant the supplies until he was set free by the Austrian government. With the commencement of the year 1841 Kossuth brought out the first number of the "Pesti Hirlap" (Pesth Journal), which, at starting, was issued four times a week, and, soon after, daily. The success of the new journal was very great, the circulation at one period reaching the number of 10,000. About this time Kossuth married. Throughout the ensuing six years the "Pesth Journal" was a bold and unceasing opponent of the Austrian design of substituting for the constitutional government of Hungary, one based on the imperialist principles. In the diet, the liberal opposition, headed by Count Louis Batthyany, was likewise very decided. In 1847 Kossuth became the representative of the city of Pesth in the diet, and in March, 1848, he proposed that a deputation should be sent to the king of Hungary (the emperor of Austria), asking that a new ministry, composed of Hungarians, together with certain constitutional reforms, should be granted. Kossuth was a member of this deputation, which reached Vienna soon after the minister, Prince Metternich, had quitted it, and while the city was in a most excited state. The deputation was received by the emperor, who acceded to their request, and decreed that a new and liberal ministry should be formed, with Count Louis Batthyany as president, and Kossuth as minister of finance. The Servians and Croats were, at the outset, greatly pleased with the new concessions, but were soon afterwards led to believe, by Austrian agents, that Hungary sought to enslave them, and to destroy their religion and nationality. Accordingly, in June, 1848, they rose against the Hungarians, and several desperate encounters took place on the frontiers, and many villages were laid waste. Kossuth roused his countrymen into fierce activity; ten battalions of Honveds, or defenders of home, were organised, and these, with some regiments of hussars and of the line, formed the nucleus of what was subsequently the great Hungarian army. Three months afterwards, Jellachich, ban of Croatia, invaded Hungary at the head of 30,000 Servians and Croats. (See JELLACHICH.) He was met by the Hungarians, under Guyon and other leaders, and defeated. About the same time, Field-Marshal Count Lamberg was sent from Vienna as commander-in-chief of the Hungarian army. He went to Pesth to assume his post; but the infuriated populace murdered him on the Buda-Pesth bridge. The rupture between Hungary and Austria was now complete, the parliament of the former addressing the nation in a "Remonstrance," which roused the entire population. In October, the Hungarian army crossed the frontier, and advanced to within a short distance of Vienna, but was then defeated. The Hungarian parliament retired from Pesth to Debreczin, where they proclaimed the deposition of the house of Hapsburg, and the independence of Hungary. Kossuth was nominated by the parliament provisional governor of Hungary. Meantime, the Austrians, under Prince Windischgratz, invaded Hungary. The Austrians were defeated in several engagements; but, in May, 1849, a Russian army entered Hungary, and closely pursued Görgei to Arad. In the south, the Hungarians were defeated by the Austrian army, under General Haynau, in August, 1849. On receiving news of this disaster, Kossuth resigned his civil and military power as dictator, to Görgei, who, on the 14th of the same month, surrendered himself and his whole army to the Russians. The Hungarian struggle was thus terminated. Kossuth fled into Turkey, and was detained a prisoner at Schumla, being subsequently sent to Kutahiyeh, in Asia Minor. He remained in prison about two years, during which he, with the aid of Shakspere and of Johnson's Dictionary, mastered the English language. In August, 1851, the ambassadors of the English and American governments obtained his release, despite the threats of Austria. He embarked at Smyrna in an American vessel, and arrived in England in October. He was received in London and the provincial towns with the utmost enthusium; his eloquent speeches, delivered in stirring English, exciting the greatest admiration. He sailed for the United States in November of the same year, but returned to England in 1852. During the Crimean war, he spoke at Sheffield, Nottingham, and other places; but has since led a retired and private life, residing chiefly at Turin. In January, 1877, he was solicited to offer himself as a candidate for the Hungarian parliament, but declined. In 1880 he published a volume of political reminiscences.

Born at Monok, Hungary, 1802.

KOTZEBUE, AUGUST FRIEDRICH FERDINAND VON, kots'-boo, a German writer and dramatist. After completing his studies for the legal profession at the university of Jena, he went to Russia, where he became secretary to a general, and after filling several posts under the government, was appointed by Catherine II. civil governor of Revel, in Esthonia. He resigned this office after a few years, and, resolved to devote himself to dramatic literature, accepted the directorship of the theatre of Vienna. After a short period spent there, he returned, in 1800, to Russia; but had scarcely crossed the frontiers of that country, when he was arrested by order of Paul I., and conveyed to Siberia. He was accused of having written a pamphlet against the czar. About a year afterwards Paul witnessed a play by Kotzebue, translated into Russian, and was so delighted with it that he recalled the author, and appointed him director of the German theatre at St. Petersburg. After the death of Paul, he went to Weimar, but, quarrelling with Goethe, he removed to Berlin, where he established a satirical journal. In 1813 he became the emperor Alexander's political secretary; in 1814 he was appointed Russian consul-general at Königsberg. After having again visited Russia, in 1817, he was sent to Germany, with a large salary, to watch the state of literature and political opinion, and communicate thereon to the Russian government. About this time he established a weekly paper, in which, as in all his previous works, he derided every aspiration for freedom and constitutional government. It was this scoffing at liberal institutions which caused him to be assassinated by a German student and political enthusiast, named Sand. From his earliest years he had been an industrious writer for the stage; at his death, he had composed nearly one hundred dramas. The best of these, with one exception, have been adapted to the English stage; among them "The Stranger," "Lovers' Vows," and "Pizarro," are best known.

Born at Weimar, 1761; died 1819.

KRUDENER, JULIANA, Baroness Von, kroo'-de-ner, a celebrated German mystic. She was the daughter of the governor of Riga, and was married, at the age of 14, to the Baron von Krudener, a nobleman of Livonia, from whom she was, a few years afterwards, divorced. She then went to Berlin, and became a close friend of Queen Louisa, the death of whom greatly affected her; and, coming under the influence of the visionary Jung Stelling, she suddenly retired from the world, and gave herself up to an exaltation of devotion. Imagining she had a mission from heaven to regenerate Christianity, she travelled over Germany, visiting prisons, preaching in the open air, distributing alms lavishly; being followed throughout her progress by some thousands of disciples. In 1814 she had several interviews with the allied princes, who had entered Paris, and greatly impressed the emperor Alexander, to whom it is said she predicted the return of Napoleon from the isle of Elba, and his approaching fall. From Paris she visited Switzerland, and afterwards Germany, where she recommenced prophesying; but her great influence being feared, she was banished. About 1822 she retired to the Crimea, in order to found a refuge for criminals. She published at Paris, in 1803, a romance entitled "Valerie," which was, to a considerable extent, founded on the early part of her own career.

Born at Riga, 1766; died in the Crimea, 1824.

KRUILOV, IVAN ANDREEVICH, kroo'-e-lof, a celebrated Russian fabulist. He was the son of an officer in the Russian line infantry. He wrote an opera called the "Kafeinitza; or, Fortune-Teller by Coffee," when only 15 years of age. On his mother removing to St. Petersburg, soon afterwards, he took his opera to a German bookseller, who offered him sixty roubles for the manuscript. Young Kruilov took out the money in books, selecting Racine, Molière, and Boileau. Three years afterwards, he wrote a play, entitled "Philomela," but could not get it produced on the stage. He obtained a post in a government office, and continued, during his hours of leisure, to write essays and dramas, till the year 1801, when he became secretary to Prince Galitzin, governor of Riga, with whom he grew into great favour. The prince invited him to his country house, where he spent three years. He subsequently produced half a dozen plays, which obtained some popularity. At 40 years of age he accidentally discovered where his real powers lay. He translated several of La Fontaine's fables, and was advised by Dmitriev, the Russian poet, to persevere. He accordingly wrote some original fables, which rapidly attained the utmost degree of popularity. He continued to produce fables in verse, and, during several subsequent years, his lines were quoted by every class in Russia, from peasant to noble. He wrote 197 fables, 160 of which were original. In 1812 he obtained an appointment in the imperial library at St. Petersburg, and received many marks of favour from the emperors Alexander and Nicholas.

Born at Moscow, 1768; died at St. Petersburg, 1844.

It was formerly a portion of the kingdom of Illyria. The surface is mountainous, but the climate is pleasant, and the soil fertile. Cattle breeding is extensively carried on. Area, 3,048 square miles. Pop. 647,934. The principal town is TRIESTE.

KUSTER, LUDOLPH, koos'-ter, a German literary critic. He studied at Berlin, and afterwards travelled on the continent, and visited England, where he completed his edition of Suidas, printed at Cambridge in 1705, and for which that university conferred on him a doctor's degree. Thence he went to Berlin, where he became professor and librarian to the king. He did not, however, long retain these honours, but went to Amsterdam, where he published Iamblichus's "Life of Pythagoras," the works of Aristophanes, and an edition of Mill's Greek Testament. In 1713 he went to Paris, abjured the Protestant religion, and obtained a pension. Besides the above, he published "Historia Critica Homeri," and other works.

Born at Blomberg, Westphalia, 1670; died at Paris, 1716.

KUTAIEH, or KUTAYA, koo-ti'-a, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Anatolia, on the Pursuk, a tributary of the Sokaria. It occupies the site of the ancient Cotiæum. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 50,000.

KYNASTON, JOHN, ki-na'-ton, an English divine, was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, of which he was chosen fellow in 1751. He wrote "De Impietate C. Cornelio Tacito falso objectata;" "Oratio habita in Sacello Collegii Ænei Nasi."

Born at Chester, 1728; died 1783.

KYNETON, kine'-ton, a town of Victoria, Australia, on the Campaspe river, 52 miles N.W. of Melbourne. There are good public buildings, and weekly grain markets are held. It is salubriously situated 1,750 feet above the sea level. Pop. 3,500.

KYNWELMARSH, FRANCIS, kin'-wel-marsh, an English poet and translator. He was a friend of Gascoigne, whom he assisted in translating Euripides' tragedy of "Jocasta." He and his brother Anthony wrote a collection of poetical pieces, some of which are to be found in the collection called the "Paradise of Dainty Devices," 1576.

Lived in the 16th century.

KYPARISSIA, or CYPARISSIA, a town of Greece, in the Morea, on a bay of the same name, 44 miles S.W. of Tripolitza. It is guarded by a fortress on a height. There is a large trade in oil, corn, pigs, and dairy produce.

KYRLE, JOHN, kirl, a benevolent Englishman. Though he had only an estate of £500 a year, he bestowed large sums, in the course of his life, in charity, and built a church; but towards this last good work he obtained subscriptions from other pious and charitable persons. On all accounts, however, he deserved the fine eulogium bestowed upon him by Pope, who emphatically calls him "the Man of Ross."

Born at Ross, Herefordshire, 1664; died 1754.

KYR-SCHEHR, kir-sheer', a town of Turkey in Asia, 310 miles S. of Constantinople. It is beautifully situated in a fertile valley. The principal public building is a handsome medresseh, or college, part of which is now used as a military magazine. There is a large and well frequented public market.

KYTHUL, ki-tool', a town of India, and the capital of a district of the same name. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 29° 49' N. Lon. 76° 28' E. The district fell into the possession of the British in 1843, from the failure of heirs to the last rajah. It then comprised 516 villages.

L.

LAALAND, or LOLLAND, lol'-land, an island of Denmark, in the Baltic Sea, at the southern entrance to the Great Belt, fertile and level, producing good crops of corn, hops, hemp, and apples. The forests yield excellent beech and oak. The chief town is NAKSKOV. Area, 452 square miles. Pop. 91,000. Lat. 54° 38' N. Lon. 11° 50' E.

LAARAT, la'-rat, an island of the Malay Archipelago, lying to the N. of Timor-land. Ext. 30 miles long, by about the same in breadth. Pop. Unascertained.

LABADIE, JOHN, la'-ba-de, a French religious impostor. He received his education among the Jesuits, and was admitted a member of that order, which, however, he quitted, to become an itinerant preacher. He pretended to have received visions, declared himself a second John Baptist, and prophesied the second coming of the Messiah. The austerity of his manners, his zeal, and affected piety, procured him many followers, particularly at Amiens, where he obtained a canonry, but, being detected in some criminal intrigues, the bishop ordered him to be put under arrest. Labadie, however, escaped to Toulouse, and became director of a convent of nuns, among whom he introduced a new rule, and the notions of the Quietists, with some additions of his own; viz., that the Scriptures are not necessary to salvation; that outward worship is of no use, but that all prayer should be mental; and that there are two churches, that of Christians in degeneracy, and the other regenerate, or "Labadists," as his followers were called. He renounced the Romish religion at Montauban, in 1650, and, after exercising the ministry there some time, he went to Geneva; being expelled whence, he removed to Middleburg, where he obtained many followers, among whom was the famous Anna Maria Schurman. Labadie sent disciples to propagate his doctrines, and to gather contributions, in different parts of Holland; on which account he was obliged to withdraw to Erfurt, and thence to Altona. His works, which are full of mysticism, are now disregarded.

Born at Bourg, Guienne, 1610; died at Altona, 1674.

LABÉ, LOUISA-CHARLY, la'-bai, a French poetess, surnamed the "fair rope-maker," on account of her marriage with a manufacturer of cables at Lyons, who left her, at his death, a large fortune. Her first passion was that of arms, and she distinguished herself, in a masculine dress, at the siege of Perpignan. She had a taste for literature, and her library was enriched with the best writers, French, Italian, and Spanish; but her fine qualities were tarnished by a libertinism which equalled that of Lais.

Born at Lyons, 1526; died at the same place, 1566.

LABE, la'-be, a town of Western Africa, in Senegambia, 230 miles N.E. of Sierra Leone. Manf. Cloth, and articles of iron, silver, wood, and leather. Pop. 5,000.

LA BEAUMELLE, LAURENT DE, bo'-mel, a French writer, who, in 1751, became professor of French literature in Denmark. He subsequently went to the court of Frederick the Great, but his quarrels with Voltaire caused him to leave Prussia. He returned to Paris, and obtained an appointment in the Bibliothèque Royale. He wrote "Memoirs of the History of Madame de Maintenon," and other works.

Born 1726; died 1773.

LABEDIYÈRE, CHARLES ANGELIQUE HUCHET, Count de, la-bai-do-yaire', French general. He entered the army at an early age, and distinguished himself in Spain and Germany. In 1814, after Napoleon returned to Elba, he received the command of a regiment in the army of the Bourbons, but on the return of his old master joined him, and was made a lieutenant-general and peer of France. He fought at Waterloo, and, afterwards, at Paris, spoke with great energy in the Chamber of Peers against the Bourbons. After the capitulation of Paris, he was arrested and shot.

LABER, la'-ber, a town of Prussia, province of Pomerania, on the left bank of the Rega, 43 miles N.E. of Stettin. Manf. Woollens, cloth, and serge. Pop. 5,100.

LABERIUS, DECIMUS, lai-beer'-e-us, a Roman knight, who wrote mimes or satirical productions for the stage. Cæsar obliged him to perform one of his own mimes against his will; on which occasion Laberius spoke a satirical prologue against Cæsar, which is preserved in Aulus Gellius. Fragments of his other works are also extant.

Died 44 B.C.

LABETTE, la-bet', a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 22,735. The capital is Oswego.

LABIAN, la'-be-on, a town of Prussia, province of East Prussia, on the Deine and Curische-Haff, 26 miles N.E. of Königsberg. Manf. Linen, and leather. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 4,500.

LABISCHIN, la'-bi'-shen, a town of Prussia, province of Posen, on an island in the Netze, 14 miles S.W. of Bromberg. Manf. Linen and woollen cloth. There is a trade in wood and cattle.

LABLACHE, LUIGI, la-blash', a celebrated Italian singer. At 12 years of age he commenced studying for his profession at the Conservatoire of Naples. About the age of 16 he made his first appearance on the Neapolitan stage as a bass singer. He reputation as a vocalist dated from his engagement at La Scala, of Milan, in 1817. For more than a quarter of a century he was an established favourite at the Italian Operas of London and Paris. He excelled alike in tragic and comic opera. His voice was of the noblest quality, and almost preternatural power. His grandeur of style in dignified parts gained him the sobriquet of "Jupiter Lablache," and his spontaneous and rich humour, in such characters as Dulcamara and Don Pasquale, were unrivalled.

Born at Naples, 1794; died 1858.

LA BLETTERIE, RENÉ DE, blet'-tre, an eminent French professor of rhetoric. He studied ecclesiastical history at the seminary of St. Magloire, and subsequently became professor of rhetoric at the College of France, and was admitted a member of the Academy of Belles Lettres, in 1742. He wrote a "Life of the Emperor Julian," in 1735; a "History of Jovianus," in 1748. He likewise translated Cæsar and Tacitus.

Born at Rennes, 1696; died at Paris, 1772.

LA BORDE, JEAN BENJAMIN DE, la-bord', groom of the chamber and favourite of Louis XV. After the death of that king, he devoted himself to literature, and produced several splendidly-printed volumes; among them were, "Essay on Music, Ancient and Modern," "Pictorial Tours in France," and an essay on "Chronological History." He also wrote some plays, which were brought out at the French theatres, and, possessing great musical talent, composed several operas. He was guillotined at Paris at the time of the Revolution.

Born 1734; died 1794.

LA BORDE, JEAN JOSEPH, Marquis de, French financier, who rendered important service to the king, and was the trusted friend of Voltaire. At the time of the Revolution he was charged with being implicated in Royalist plots, and condemned to the guillotine.

Born at Jaca, in Spain, 1724; died 1794.

LA BORDE, ALEXANDRE LOUIS JOSEPH, Count de, a French author. In early life he fought, as an officer, in the Austrian army, against his native country; but, in 1797, went to France, and devoted himself to literature. He was aide-de-camp to Louis Philippe, general of brigade of the National Guard, and prefect of the Seine, or first magistrate of Paris. He was the editor of many splendid illustrated works of travel.

Born at Paris, 1773; died 1842.

LA BORDE, LEON EMMANUEL SIMON JOSEPH, Count de, son of the preceding, a modern French writer. In 1830 he became secretary of legation to the French embassy in London, and was subsequently appointed conservator of the collection of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance in the Museum of the Louvre. He is a distinguished archæologist, and, like his father, produced many magnificent pictorial works descriptive of foreign countries.

Born at Paris, 1807; died 1869.

In addition to the above-mentioned works, he produced the "Souvenirs d'un Voyageur," published in 1857.

Born at Paris, 1811.

LA BOURDONNAIS, BERTRAND FRANCIS MAHÉ DE, boor'-don-nai, a French general. He entered the service of the French East-India Company at an early age, and signalised himself on several occasions, particularly at the capture of Mahé, which name he was henceforth permitted to bear. In 1734 he became governor-general of the Isles of France and Bourbon, both of which were much benefited by his discreet administration. In the war of 1743, between France and England, he went to the succour of Dupleix at Pondicherry. He besieged the English at Madras, and compelled them to capitulate, in 1746. Dupleix, however, disregarded the terms that La Bourdonnais had entered into with the English, and the latter was sent in disgrace to the Isle of France. He returned to France in 1748, in order to defend his conduct against his accusers. He had no sooner landed than he was incarcerated in the Bastille, where he remained during several years. His innocence being at length established, he was released in 1752, but he died of a broken heart shortly afterwards. He left behind some "Memoirs," in which his misfortunes were vividly depicted, and which were first published in 1760.

Born at Saint Malo, 1699; died 1753.

LABRADOR, lab'-ra-dor', the north-eastern portion of a large peninsula of British North America, bounded S. by Canada and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. by Hudson's Straits, and W. by Hudson's Bay. It is generally barren, and of dreary aspect, with a mountainous and uneven surface, covered with large stones, and a poor soil, spread with coarse plants, adapted only for deer and goats and other wild animals. The climate (subject to severe vicissitudes) is so severe, that neither corn nor any of the hardy kitchen vegetables are raised. It is strange that Portuguese navigators should have given the name "terra labarador," or cultivable land, to this desolate territory. The shore is generally precipitous, rising in some parts to an elevation of 1,500 feet. The fisheries employ the greater number of the industrious portion of the inhabitants. There are several Moravian and other missionary stations, at some of which trade is carried on. The principal stations are Okak, Hebron, and Hopenthal.

Pop.—5,000, consisting of Esquimaux and a few Europeans.

Lat.—51° to 65° N. Lon. 55° W.

History.—In 1496 this country was discovered by Cabot, and, in 1610 re-discovered by Hudson.

...IS DE, kail, ...omer. He was ...having attained ...d himself entirely ... with Cassini and ... those astronomers in the verification of the arc of the meridian. The result of his labours was the demonstration of the gradual increase of the degree going from the equator to the pole. This, although long known, had never been verified by actual measurement. At the age of 25 he was nominated professor of mathematics at the Mazarin College, in which capacity he highly distinguished himself, and published for the use of his pupils treatises on geometry, optics, mechanics, and astronomy. In 1751 he went to the Cape of Good Hope to observe the astral system of the southern heavens. He remained there four years, and compiled during his stay a catalogue of stars, which has not been superseded, even at the present day. On his return to Paris, he collected his scientific works, published new editions of some, and laboured incessantly at astronomy. His devotion to science at length cost him his life; for he contracted a fever by passing his nights on cold stones, observing the heavens.

Born at Rumigny, 1713; died 1762.

LACANTUN, la-kan-toon', a river of Central America, rising in Guatemala, and, after a course of about 430 miles, falling into the Gulf of Mexico at Lake Terminos.

LACCADIVES, lak'-ka-dives, an archipelago of low islands, lying off the Malabar or W. coast of India about 150 miles. There are 17, besides numerous islets and reefs of coral formation. The largest, Underoot, is about 7 miles in length and 2½ in breadth. Pro. Rice, sweet potatoes, cocoa, and betel-nuts. There are also some small cattle. Pop. 7,000, of Arabian origin, and known as Moplay. Lat. 10° 12′ N. Lon. 72° 74′ E.—These islands were discovered by Vasco de Gama, in 1499, and ceded to the British in 1792.

LACEDÆMON, las'-e-dé'-mon, in Greek legend, a son of Jupiter and Taygeta, the daughter of Atlas, who married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas. He was the fifth king of Sparta, and from him and his wife the capital of Laconia was called Lacedæmon and Sparta.

LACEDÆMON, a noble city of ancient Greece, in Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, called also Sparta, and at the present time Mistra. It was severally known by the name of Lelegia, Œbalia, and Hecatompolis. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon are illustrious in Grecian history for their courage, their love of liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury.

LA CERDA, FERDINAND DE (so-called), thair'-da, infanta of Spain, was the eldest son of Alphonso X., king of Castile and Leon, and, dying before his father, left children, who were deprived of the succession to the Spanish throne by their uncle Sancho IV.

Born 1254; died 1275.

LA CERDA, BERNARDA, Donna, a Portuguese lady, who distinguished herself by her poetical talents, and was invited to the court of Spain by Philip III., where she taught Latin to the royal children. She wrote several comedies and poetical pieces.

Born at Oporto, 1595; died 1644.

LA CHAISE, FRANÇOIS D'AIX, shaise, surnamed Father, a celebrated French Jesuit, who was, for some time, professor of philosophy at Lyons, and became provincial of his order. In 1675, Louis XIV. chose him for his confessor, an office which the father filled till his death, 34 years afterwards. He was actively engaged in all the intrigues of the court; his interest was sought by Madame de Montespan and Madame de Maintenon. In religious questions, he took part in the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685; in the condemnation of Fénélon. He was an energetic opponent of the Jansenists; and, on every occasion, endeavoured to advance the interests of his order. Although a man of only slender abilities, his adroitness and insinuating manner enabled him to gain a great ascendency over the king. He was the author of several works, particularly "A Course of Philosophy," composed in Latin, and published at Lyons in 1662. LACLOS, PIERRE AMBROISE FRANÇOIS CHODERLOS DE, la-klo', French writer and soldier. He served in the corps of engineers, and became secretary to the Duke of Orleans, in whose favour he intrigued against the king, Louis XVI. When the Revolution broke out, he became a prominent member of the Jacobin club, and assisted to draw up the petition for the deposition of the king, which led to the massacre in the Champ de Mars, in July, 1791. He afterwards served in the army of the north, and then commanded the artillery in the army of the Rhine. He was appointed inspector-general of the army of Southern Italy, and held that position at the time of his death.

Born at Amiens, 1741; died at Taranto, 1813.

LA COLONIE, JOHN MARTIN DE, kol'-o-ne, a field-marshal in the Austrian service, who published his military memoirs at Frankfort, in 1730. He was also the author of the "History of Bordeaux."

Born at Perigord, 1674; died at Bordeaux, 1759.

LA COMBE, FRANCIS, a French miscellaneous writer, who translated into the French language, Orrery's "Life of Swift," and Shaftesbury's "Letters on Enthusiasm." He also edited "The Letters of Christina, of Sweden," and afterwards added a continuation, entitled "The Secret Letters of Queen Christina," but which has since been pronounced a literary forgery.

Born 1733; died at Montpellier, about 1795.

LA CONDAMINE, CHARLES MARIE DE, kond'-da-mene, a celebrated French traveller. He travelled over almost the whole world, and studied nearly every science. In 1736 he was selected, with Bouguer, to make a voyage to the equator, for the purpose of determining the dimensions and the figure of the earth. In this expedition, he travelled over nearly the whole of South America, and was absent from France for ten years, during which he experienced the utmost fatigue and hardship. On his return he published his "Travels in South America," and "The Figure of the Earth, as determined by the Observations of Messieurs De la Condamine and Bouguer." He also produced several works in English and Spanish; contributed to the scientific memoirs of Paris and Berlin; and maintained a correspondence upon scientific subjects with the distinguished in every European city. He was an amiable, learned, and witty man, a member of the Paris Academy of Sciences, of the Académie Française, and of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Paris, 1701; died 1774.

LACORDAIRE, JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI, la'-kor-dair, a celebrated French preacher. Until the age of 22, he diligently pursued his studies for the profession of the law, and up to that period was strongly tinctured with the scepticism of Voltaire. Suddenly, in 1824, he entered the college of St. Sulpice, and, after an interval of three years, was ordained a priest. During the revolution of 1830, Lacordaire, in conjunction with M. de Montalembert, commenced the publication of "L'Avenir," giving to the new paper the motto "God and Liberty." The task they set themselves to accomplish by the aid of their journal was, religious, civil, and political liberty. The strong language and bold opinions of this new religious paper brought Lacordaire before the Court of Assize in the following year. Here he defended himself with the utmost eloquence, and was triumphantly acquitted. He had endeavoured, a few months previously, to join to his priestly function the title of advocate; but the council of that body refused to inscribe his name on their rolls. Not long afterwards, he, with Messrs. Montalembert and De Choux, opened, without authority, a "Free School." In France, such a proceeding was in direct opposition to the law; accordingly, he, and his coadjutors were ordered to close the establishment. This demand was unheeded, and it was not until force had been employed, that the heads of the school could be induced to leave the place. Lacordaire, Montalembert, and De Choux, were cited before the Chamber of Peers. Condemned to pay the minimum fine, 100 francs, the bold innovators were admitted to have gained the victory. The French clergy were strongly moved by the burning eloquence of Lacordaire and his fellow reformers. Gregory XVI., in 1832, put forth his "Encyclical Letter," in which he declared that "'the regeneration of the Church' was an absurdity, 'liberty of conscience' a mad dream, and 'liberty of the press' a fatal delusion." If Lacordaire, and the other chiefs of "L'Avenir," had given so much uneasiness to the head of the established religion of their country, their submission was most sudden and complete. The three journalists went to Rome: of Lacordaire it is said, "He prostrated himself on the tomb of St. Peter, and rose submissive and transformed." On his return to Paris he devoted himself to preaching. In 1835 he commenced his pulpit orations at the cathedral of Notre Dame, and gathered about him, says one of his French critics, "the worldly crowd by other attractions besides the sacred word. He held forth as to every topic: under the pretext of religion, he discoursed of the present generation, of every-day emotions and interests, of nationality, of liberty, of political economy, of railroads, and of Napoleon. The brilliancy of his language, the energetic audacity of his movements, captivated his hearers." In 1836 he made a second journey to Rome, where he was well received, and soon afterwards composed a complete retractation of his former opinions as expressed in "L'Avenir." In 1840 he assumed the habit of a Dominican friar, and wrote his "Life of St. Dominic," wherein he justifies, with more poetical power than historical truth, the Inquisition. During the revolution of 1848 he revived his old republican ideas, and took his seat among the "Mountain" party in the Constituent Assembly. His parliamentary efforts were not very successful, however, and he soon resigned his seat. Subsequently, his voice growing very weak, he became director of the college of Sorèze. In 1860 he was elected to the Academy. He published several theological works, some sermons, and funeral orations; among others, one upon Daniel O'Connell.

Born in France, 1802; died 1861.

LAC QUI PARLE, lak'-ke-parl', a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 1,054 square miles. Pop. 4,891.

LACRETELLE, PIERRE LOUIS, la'-kre-tel, usually called Lacretelle the Elder, a French writer. He was a parliamentary advocate during the French revolution, and afterwards sat in the Legislative Assembly, and acted as a member of the Legislative Corps. During the Empire and the Restoration he remained unemployed, his republican principles not permitting him to serve under those governments. He was a profound and voluminous author. A complete edition of his works was commenced in 1823, and included treatises on Eloquence and Philosophy, as well as dramatic pieces, &c. He was, for some time, one of the editors of the "Minerva," a famous paper, whose politics were in opposition to the Empire and the Restoration. He also compiled the articles "Logic," "Metaphysics," and "Moral Philosophy," for the "Encyclopédie Méthodique."

Born at Metz, 1751; died 1824.

LACRETELLE, JEAN CHARLES DOMINIQUE DE, a distinguished French historian, was brother of the preceding, and is generally styled the Younger. He wrote a "History of France in the Eighteenth Century," and was in 1809 appointed professor of history at Paris.

Born 1766; died 1846.

LACROIX, LOUIS ANTOINE NICOLE DE, la-krwaw', French geographer, who adopted an ecclesiastical life, but devoted himself to the pursuit of geographical knowledge. His Géographie Moderne" was produced in 1747, and has been several times reprinted, remaining a standard work in his own country.

Born at Paris, 1704; died 1760.

LACROIX, PAUL, a modern French littérateur, generally known under the pseudonyme of the "Bibliophile Jacob." He has been a voluminous writer and compiler, and has produced some scores of novels, dramas, historical, philosophical, and bibliographical works.

Born at Paris 1806.

LA CROSSE, la-kross', a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 27,000. The capital is La Crosse.

LA CROSSE, capital of the above county, on the E. bank of the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Black and La Crosse rivers. It is beautifully situated, and has many fine buildings. Manf. Saddlery, harness, agricultural implements, machinery, and joinery. Pop. 14,000.

LACTACUNGA, or LATACUNGA, la-ta-kun'-ga, a town of Ecuador, Central America, on the left bank of the San Felipe, 50 miles S. of Quito. It stands on the east ridge of the Andes, 9,520 feet above the sea level. Earthquakes are frequent and destructive, and most of the houses are built of light spongy pumice stone. Pop. 10,000.

LACTANTIUS, LUCIUS COELIUS FIRMIANUS, lak-tan'-she-us, an eloquent father of the Church, was, according to some, an African, and, to others, a native of Fermo, in Italy. He studied under Arnobius, and became so famous as a rhetorician, that Constantine appointed him preceptor to his son Crispus. He formed his style upon the model of Cicero; but though he wrote with great purity and force, particularly in confuting the pagan errors and follies, he was more of a rhetorician than a theologian. He blended philosophy with divinity, and thereby involved the truths of religion in considerable obscurity.
Died 325.

LACY, JOHN, lai'-se, an English actor and dramatic writer in the reign of Charles II., with whom he was a great favourite. He also wrote for the stage, and produced "The Dumb Lady," "The Old Troop; or, Monsieur Ragout," "Sir Hercules Buffoon."
Died 1681.

LACYDAS, la-si'-das, a Greek philosopher of Cyrene, and disciple of Arcesilaus, whom he succeeded as master of the second academy. Attalus gave him a garden in which to read his lectures. He foolishly mourned the loss of a favourite goose, which he caused to be buried magnificently. He died of intemperance.
Died B.C. 212.

LADAKH, or MIDDLE TIBET, la-dak', a country of Central Asia, a province of Cashmere, separated by the Himalayas from Cashmere, and from Chinese Turkestan by the Kara-korum Mountains. On the E. it is bounded by Great Tibet, and on the N.W. by Little Tibet. The country is generally a table land, about 11,000 feet above the sea level, mountainous, with some narrow valleys; unfertile, with a severe and variable climate. The cultivation of the soil, however, is eagerly attended to, and crops of average quality of wheat, barley, and buckwheat are raised. Apples, apricots, and rhubarb, are also abundantly produced. The chief city is LE.

Minerals.—Iron, lead, copper, gold, and sulphur.
Manf.—Woollens. A considerable transit trade.
Area.—30,000 square miles.
Pop.—125,000, mostly of Mongolian descent, but with an admixture of Cashmerians. They profess Lamaism, a form of Buddhism.
Lat.—32°—36° N. Lon. 76°—79° E.

LADANY (JASZ), la-da'-ne, a village of Hungary, on a branch of the Theiss, 9 miles from Jasz-Bereny. It is protected from inundation by an embankment. There is a large Roman Catholic church. There is a trade in grain. Pop. 6,900.

LADANG (KÖRÖS), a village of Hungary, 5 miles N.W. of Gyula. Pop. 3,500.

LADANY (PÜSÖPK) a village of Hungary, 7 miles S.W. of Nadudvar, in a marshy but fertile district. There are two churches. Pop. 5,300.

LADISLAUS, or VLADISLAS, la'-dis-laus, king of Hungary, the son of Bela I., succeeded his brother Geiza in 1077. He added to his dominions Dalmatia and Croatia, reduced the Bohemians, who had revolted, expelled the Huns, and conquered part of Bulgaria and Russia. He also defeated the Tartars, and was as distinguished for his piety as his valour. He was canonized in 1198.
Born 1041; died 1095.

LADISLAUS II., son of Bela II. He only reigned for a few months, and some historians, considering him as having been irregularly crowned, omit him from the list of kings.
Born 1134; died 1162.

LADISLAUS III. (or II.), succeeded his father Emerie, 1204.
Born 1185; died 1205.

LADISLAUS III., succeeded Stephen V., his father, in 1272. He was a debauched prince, and divorced his lawful wife. He also ill-used the clergy, and, rendering himself an object of universal hatred, was assassinated.
Born 1250; died 1290.

LADISLAUS IV., called also Wladislas, was grand-duke of Lithuania and king of Poland, and elected to the throne of Hungary in 1440. He declared war against the Turks, and employed as his general John Hunniades, who was very successful. Ladislaus, however, made peace, which gave such dissatisfaction to the pope and other Christian princes, that he was induced to break it; but he was very unfortunate afterwards, and lost his life in the battle of Varna.
Born 1400; died 1444.

LADISLAUS V., son of Albert of Austria, was made king on the death of Ladislaus IV., under the guardianship of John Hunniades. He was very zealous against the Hussites. He put his own son to death, and was compelled to fly the country.

LADISLAUS VI., was the son of Casimir IV., king of Poland and king of Bohemia in 1476, and elected king of Hungary, on the death of Matthias Corvinus, in 1490, in opposition to his own brother, Albert, and to John, the natural son of his predecessor, and to Maximilian of Austria. His reign was very turbulent, being constantly at war with the Turks and other neighbouring powers.
Born 1450: died 1516.

LADISLAUS, or LANCELOT, king of Naples, called the Liberal and Victorious, succeeded his father, Charles Duras, in 1386. He was previously count of Provence and obtained the crown of Hungary in 1403, holding it during the imprisonment of Sigismund, who compelled him to return to Italy. On the death of his father, he was opposed by Louis II., duke of Anjou, which occasioned some bloody wars. Pope John XXIII. at first espoused the cause of Louis, but afterwards took the part of Ladislaus, who, however, marched against Rome, and having taken it, turned his arms on the Florentines, whom he compelled to sue for peace, in 1413. It is suspected that his death was caused by poison.
Born 1376; died at Naples, 1414.

LADISLAUS I., duke of Poland, succeeded his brother, Boleslaus II., in 1081. He defeated the armies of Russia and Pomerania.
Born 1034; died 1102.

LADISLAUS II., duke of Poland, succeeded his father, Boleslaus III., in 1138. He made war against his brothers on frivolous pretences, and, after several battles, was driven from his throne; but Boleslaus IV., his successor gave him Silesia at the request of Frederic Barbarossa.
Born 1104; died 1159.

LADISLAUS III., king of Poland, elected 1203; attempted to reform the church, and abdicated.
Born 1168; died 1231.

LADISLAUS IV., king of Poland, came to the throne in 1296. He pillaged his subjects and seized the goods of the clergy, for which he was expelled, and the crown given to Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia. Ladislaus retired to Rome, but on the death of Wenceslaus he was recalled to Poland, where he governed with moderation and wisdom. Pomerania having revolted, he called to his aid the Teutonic knights, who repaid themselves by seizing Dantzic and other places; but Ladislaus marched against the knights, and defeated them.
Born 1260; died 1333.

LADISLAUS V., or WLADISLAS. (See JAGELLONS.)

LADISLAUS SIGISMUND VII., king of Poland, was elected grand duke of Russia, 1610; succeeded Sigismund III., his father, as king of Poland, in 1632. Before his advancement to the throne, he signalized himself against the Turks, whom he defeated in several actions. He also repulsed the Russians and forced them to make peace.
Died 1649.

LADOGA, or LADOSKA, la-do'-ga, a lake in the north of European Russia, lying between the Baltic and Lake Onega, and surrounded by the governments of Petersburg, Wiburg, and Olonetz. It is the largest lake in Europe, 120 miles long and 70 broad. The shores are generally low. The depth varies from 12 to 1,000 feet, and there are several islands, the principal being the Valaam and Konevetz, on which are monasteries much resorted to by pilgrims. The surplus waters are discharged by the Neva into the Gulf of Finland. Seventy rivers, the chief of which are the Wolkhof, the Sias, and the Svir, fall into the lake. Several canals form a line of navigation all round its S. and S.E. sides, and with the rivers afford communication with the lake and the White Sea, and the Caspian. Area, 6,804 square miles.

LADOGA (NOVAIAI, or NEW), a town of European Russia, on the Valkhov, near lake Ladoga. Pop. 3,100.

LADOGA (STAROI, or OLD), a town of European Russia, government of St. Petersburg, near the south-eastern end of Lake Ladoga, 75 miles E. of St. Petersburg. It was formerly a large city, and was the residence of Rurik, the first Russian sovereign. Pop. 3,000.

LADRONES, or MARIANA ISLANDS, la-drones', or "thieves' islands," a cluster of islands, belonging to Spain, in the North Pacific Ocean, stretching 450 miles from N. to S. They consist of about 20 islands, and only five are inhabited. The largest is GUAM, or GUAJAN, on which is the capital, San Ignacio de Agana. They are densely wooded and fertile, enjoying throughout most part of the year a serene and temperate climate, the heat of the sun being tempered by regular breezes from the sea. The bread-fruit tree, banana, cocoa-nut and other trees are abundant, and rice, maize, cotton, and indigo are cultivated. Pop. 8,668; formerly the islands were much more densely inhabited. Lat. 13°—21° N. Lon. 145°—147° E. This group was discovered by Magellan, in 1521, who gave the name they now bear, having had experience of the dishonest practices of the inhabitants. They have been also named the Lazarus and Mariana islands.

LADRONES ISLES, a cluster of small islands off the southern extremity of China, 12 miles E. of Macao. Lat. 21° 57′ N. Lon. 113° 44′ E.

LADRONES, three small islands in the Pacific Ocean, off the coast of Ecuador, 8 miles S.E. of Cape Boruca. Lat. 7° 50′ N. Lon. 82° 35′ W.

LADVOCAT, JEAN BAPTISTE, lad'-vo-ca, a learned French writer, who became doctor, librarian, and professor of the Sorbonne. The duke of Orleans, having founded a Hebrew professorship in the Sorbonne, appointed Ladvocat to it in 1752. His works are, a Geographical Dictionary, an Historical Dictionary, which has since been repeatedly enlarged, a Hebrew Grammar, &c.
Born at Vaucouleurs, 1709; died at Paris, 1765.

LAEKEN, la'-ken, a town of Belgium, province of Brabant, about 2 miles N. of Brussels. There is a magnificent royal palace, with a park and garden nearly 250 acres. The church is handsome and richly adorned. Pop. 9,300.

LÆLIUS, CAIUS SAPIENS, le'-li-us, consul of Rome. He distinguished himself as a soldier in Spain, and was no less celebrated for his eloquence and poetical genius. He was the intimate friend of Scipio Africanus the younger, and is said to have assisted Terence in his comedies.
Born 185 B.C.; died 115 B.C.

LAENNEC, RENÉ THÉOPHILE HYACYNTHE, lan'-nek, a distinguished French physician, inventor of the stethoscope and of the art of "mediate auscultation." He studied medicine at Paris and obtained the degree of doctor of medicine in 1814. His literary acquirements were extensive, and he rapidly grew into fame as a lecturer and writer on medicine. In 1816 he became chief physician at the Hôpital Necker, and soon afterwards made known his important discovery in his "Treatise on Mediate Auscultation." His health, which had been always delicate, now grew so infirm that he was compelled to resign his large private practice and his official appointments to repair into Brittany. In 1821 he returned, with restored health, to Paris, and was appointed professor of medicine in the College of France. Five years later his health again gave way; and it was found, by means of the system he had himself invented, that he was attacked with consumption. He retired to Brittany, and soon afterwards died. Besides his great work, he also produced a number of excellent treatises on medicine.
Born at Quimper, Brittany, 1781: died 1827.

LA FARINA, GUISEPPE, fa-re'-na, Italian author and politician. At the age of 18, the university of Catania conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws, but three years afterwards having taken part in a revolutionary movement in Sicily, he was compelled to leave the country; but returned in 1859, and practised as an advocate. Several political journals which he started were suppressed, and he removed to Florence. He was actively engaged in the political movement in Tuscany, in 1848, and edited a democratic journal. He was afterwards chosen member of the council of war, and member of the Sicilian parliament, and on the deposition of the king was employed diplomatically by the provisional government, and was subsequently minister of public instruction, of public works, and of the interior (combining the duties of each office), at Palermo; but after the capture of Messina by the royal troops, accepted office as minister of war under the king a proceeding which estranged him from the party of liberty, and led to his banishment for a second time. He afterwards returned with the expedition of Garibaldi, but quarrelled with him, and was expelled in 1861.

Born at Messina, 1815; died 1863.

LA FAYETTE, LOUISE MOTIER, Mademoiselle de, a French lady, celebrated for her beauty and wit. She was maid of honour to Anne of Austria. Louis XIII. became inspired with a lively passion for her, but she resisted his entreaties, and sought, in 1637, the retirement of a cloister, where she assumed the name of Sister Angelica.—Madame de Genlis made her the heroine of a romance, first published in 1812; entitled "Mademoiselle de la Fayette."

Born 1616; died 1665.

LA FAYETTE, Countess de. (See FAYETTE.)

LA FAYETTE, MARIE JEAN PAUL ROCH YVES GILBERT MOTIER, Marquis de, French soldier and patriot. He came of a noble family in Auvergne, and, at the age of 20 years, fitted out a frigate at his own expense, and sailed for America, to fight in the ranks of the insurgents against British domination. Returning to France at the end of two years, he again sailed for America, with reinforcements of ships, men, and money, and distinguished himself in Virginia and at the siege of York-town. His energy and ability greatly contributed to the foundation of the republic of the United States. The renown he had acquired in America caused him to be elected, in 1787, member of the Assembly of Notables, and in 1789 deputy in the National Assembly. In this capacity he warmly defended the republican ideas then in vogue, and proposed the first declaration of the rights of man, which ultimately formed the basis of the constitution. In July, 1789, he was appointed commandant of the national guard, upon which occasion he caused his soldiers to assume a tri-coloured cockade,—blue and red, the colours of the commune of Paris, and white, the colour of the French lily,—this being the origin of what afterwards became the national colours. He protected the royal family on the 5th and 6th October, and when the people broke out into insurrection, in July, 1791, he defeated them with his national guards on the Champ de Mars. On being appointed to command the army of the north, he defeated the allies at Philippeville and Maubergе. In August, 1792, he was outlawed for having arrested the commissioners of the National Assembly sent to watch him at his camp at Compiègne, where it is said he had previously invited the king to seek an asylum. Upon this, he, with a few friends crossed the frontier, intending to take up his residence in a neutral country, but was arrested by the Austrians, and confined in the fortress of Olmütz, in Moravia. He remained there during five years, but was released by a special article in the treaty of Campo-Formio. Strongly opposed to Napoleon's ambition, La Fayette took no part in public affairs during the Consulate and the Empire. On Napoleon's return from Elba in 1815, La Fayette was returned to the House of Representatives. As a member of the Chamber of Deputies under the Restoration, he was the untiring advocate of constitutional liberty. In 1825 he visited the United States, where his journey was a perpetual ovation. During the revolution of 1830, he was nominated for the second time chief of the national guard, and was one of the first to propose Louis Philippe as king of the French. La Fayette left behind his "Memoirs," which were published by his family.

Born at Chevagnac, in the department of the Haute-Loire, 1757; died at Paris, 1834.

LAFAYETTE, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 1,260 square miles. Pop. 5,730, of whom half are coloured. The capital is Lewisville.

It is a thriving place, at the intersection of four lines of railway. Manf. Machinery, ornamental iron work, and agricultural implements. Pop. 14,860.

LA FERE, la-fair', a town of France, department Aisne, at the confluence of the Serre and Oise, 13 miles N.W. of Laon. It is strongly fortified, has a school of artillery, an arsenal and barracks. It was successfully bombarded by the Germans in 1870. Pop. 3,100.

LAFFITTE, JACQUES, laf'-feet, the chief banker of France during the Empire and the Restoration. He was the son of a poor carpenter at Bayonne, and in 1787 walked to Paris, where he obtained the situation of assistant clerk in the banking-house of Perregaux; in 1809 he succeeded to the business, and thenceforth carried it on in his name. His eminently profound and practical talents for finance procured for him the posts of regent of the Bank of France, and president of the Paris Chamber of Commerce. During a monetary crisis, in 1815, Lafitte lent the government the sum of 2,000,000 francs. In the same year, Louis XVIII., on his departure for Ghent, deposited with the banker a very considerable sum, which Napoleon I. respected. Four months afterwards, the emperor himself, when leaving Paris for the last time, lodged in the same hands the sum of 5,000,000 francs. After the restoration of the Bourbons, he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and became a mark of the opposition. In 1830 he was said to be possessed of a private fortune of upwards of £2,000,000 sterling, but in the following year the great European monetary panic took place, and the house of Laffitte fell, along with those whose creditor it was. At this juncture Lafitte sold off the whole of his private property, amounting to 10,000,000 of francs, and subsequently, after the full discharge of his liabilities, he was ascertained to have a surplus of 8,000,000 francs. He then founded a new discount bank; was again elected to the Chamber of Deputies, of which, in 1843, he was chosen president. At his death, his remains were attended to the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise by the most eminent personages of Paris, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Arago.

Born at Bayonne, 1767; died at Paris, 1844.

LAFITTE, la-feet', French privateer, who went to Cartagena, in Central America, and fitted out expeditions against Spanish and British merchant vessels. There is considerable obscurity about his early history, but in 1813 he was the leader of an organised and formidable band in Barataria Bay, and his name was a terror to the owners of trading vessels. A British force, under Commodore Patterson, stormed his headquarters at Grand Terre, but he and his comrades escaped into the swamps of the interior, where they remained in safety until the British retired, when they returned and resumed operations. Lafitte was afterwards invited to assist the British in the expedition to New Orleans, the command of a fine ship and a large sum of money being offered as a bribe. He pretended to accept the offer, but privately communicated with the American governor of New Orleans, and offered his services on condition of receiving a free pardon for himself and followers. This was promised, and he rendered efficient service in fortifying Barataria Bay, and in conflicts with the British. The remainder of his life is involved in obscurity. He was of colossal stature, handsome, of polished manner, and exercised an irresistible influence over his followers. He may be described as the last of the "romantic pirates."

Born in France, 1780.

LA FLECHE. (See FLÉCHE, LA.)

LA FOURCHE, la-foorsh', a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 1,100 square miles. Pop. 19,000, more than one-third coloured. The capital is Thibadeaux.

LA FONTAINE. (See FONTAINE, LA.)

LA GALISSONNIÈRE, Marquis de, ga'-less-eon'-ne-air, a French admiral, who, in 1745, was appointed governor-general of Canada, and became one of the most esteemed of the French viceroys of that colony. In 1756 Louis XV. confided to his charge the fleet destined to act against the English in the Mediterranean. He was opposed to Admiral Byng at Minorca, and co-operated at the taking of Mahon.

Born at Rochefort, 1693; died 1756.

LAGNY, THOMAS FANTET, Sieur de, lan'-ye, a French mathematician. He was designed for the bar, but preferred geometry to jurisprudence, and was educated accordingly at Paris, by the liberality of the duke de Noailles. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and Louis XIV. appointed him royal hydrographer at Rochefort; but sixteen years afterwards, he was recalled to Paris, and made librarian to the king, with a considerable pension. He wrote "New Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots;" "Elements of Arithmetic and Algebra;" "The Cubature of the Sphere;" "A General Analysis or Method of Resolving Problems;" and several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Lyons, 1660; died at Paris, 1734.

LAGNY, lahn'-ye, a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, on the left bank of the Marne, 15 miles E. of Paris. The town owes its origin to an abbey founded in the 7th century. There is a fine church. A good trade is carried on in cheese, corn, poultry, wood, and hemp. Alabaster and gypsum are worked in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,900.

LAGOSTINI, la-gos-tē'-ne, a group of 30 islands, off the coast of Dalmatia, in the Adriatic. There are some good harbours. Pop. 1,200, chiefly engaged in fishing.

LA GRANGE, la-granj', a county of the United States, in Indiana. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 15,000.

LAGRANGE, JOSEPH LOUIS, Compte, la-granj, a celebrated mathematician. He was of French descent, and a grandson of Descartes. At the age of 18 years he took rank among the most learned men of his time, by addressing to Euler some answers relative to the isoperimetrical problems which had engaged his attention since his tenth year. In his nineteenth year he became professor of mathematics in the School of Artillery at Turin, and soon afterwards, in conjunction with a few friends, founded the Royal Academy of the same city. In 1759 Frederick the Great appointed him director of the Academy of Berlin, in succession to Euler. After the death of Frederick, he went to reside at Paris, where Louis XVI. had provided apartments for his use in the Louvre, and gave him a pension of £6,000. He passed unscathed through the revolutionary period, and was appointed professor at the Polytechnic School. Napoleon I. gave him a seat in the Senate, bestowed on him the grand cross of the legion of honour and elevated him to the rank of count. In 1791 he was chosen a foreign member of the Royal Society of London. Of the works of this luminary of mathematical science we have space only to enumerate the most important: these are, "Analytical Mechanics," the second edition published in Paris 1811-15; "Theory of Analytical Functions," second edition published 1813; "Resolution of Numerical Equations," 1826; "Lessons on the Calculus of Functions." In addition to a crowd of highly important contributions to the Transactions of the learned societies of Turin, Berlin, and Paris, he produced treatises "On the Origin of Comets," "On the Calculation of Eclipses," and on the "Method of determining the Orbit of a Comet from Observations."

Born at Turin, 1736; died at Paris, 1813.

LAGRASSE, la'-grass, a town and parish of France, in the department of Aude, 20 miles from Carcassone. Pop. 1,500, mostly engaged in some iron-works in the neighbourhood.

LA GUAYRA. (See GUAYRA, LA.)

LA GUERONNIÈRE, LOUIS ETIENNE ARTHUR DUBREUIL HELION, Viscount de, ger-ron'-e-air, French politician and journalist. Until the year 1848 he had only appeared as a writer by contributing articles to provincial newspapers. His political predilections were then in favour of the "Legitimist" party. M. de Lamartine, who evinced the warmest friendship towards him, appointed him chief editor of his new journal, the "Pays," in 1850. Shortly afterwards, he abandoned all his former political friends, as well as suffered a total change of opinion. After the coup d'état of the 2nd of December, 1851, he became one of its stoutest defenders. In 1853 he entered the Council of State, and shortly afterwards became an officer of the Legion of Honour. He has since contributed to the "Moniteur," and in 1862 began a new journal called "La France." He was ambassador to Brussels in 1868, and afterwards to Constantinople.

Born at Poitiers, 1816.

LAGUNA, ANDREW, la-goo'-na, a Spanish physician. He was a favourite with Charles V., at whose court he resided. He published "Annotations on Dioscorides," an epitome of the works of Galen, and a treatise on Weights and Measures.

Born at Segovia, in 1490; died 1560.

LAGUNA, or ST. CHRISTOBAL DE LA LAGUNA, the capital of Teneriffe, the principal of the Canary islands, situate on a basaltic hill, 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, surrounded by gardens. There are a cathedral and another church, two colleges, and other good buildings. Manf. Woollen, silk, and linen goods, bricks, tiles, and pottery. There is a trade in fruit and agricultural produce. Pop. 6,600.—In the neighbourhood are a great number of windmills. Lat. 28° 28′ N. Lon. 16° 20′ W.

LAGUNA, a province in the south-eastern part of Luzon, one of the Philippine Islands. There are finely wooded mountains, and fertile districts. Nearly half of the district is occupied by Lake Bay, 36 miles long, which gives a name to the province. Pop. 132,504.

LAGUS, lai'-gus, a Macedonian of mean extraction, married Arsinoë, daughter of Meleager, who, according to some accounts, was then pregnant by King Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. According to the legend, an eagle preserved the life of the infant, and fed him with her prey. This uncommon preservation induced Lagus to adopt the child, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. The first of the Ptolemies was called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the appellation of Lagides to all other appellations. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra.

LA HADJ, la-haj', a town of Arabia, in Yeman, 18 miles N.W. of Aden. There are a castle and a bazaar, and the town is surrounded by gardens and plantations of date and other fruit trees. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 13° 2′ N. Lon. 45° E.

LA HARPE. (See HARPE, LA.)

LAHAJAN, la-haj-an', a trading town of Persia, in the province of Ghilan. It is situated 30 miles S.E. of Reshd, and near the southern shore of the Caspian Sea. Pop. 7,000.

LAHIJAN, la-hi-jan', a town of Persia, province of Azerbijan, on the frontiers of Koordestan. Pop. 7,000.

LAHIRE, PHILIPPE DE, la'-here, a French mathematician, who was professor of astronomy and mathematics in the College of France, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences, in 1678. He was employed in many important public works; among the rest, one for the determination of the water-levels, preparatory to the construction of the aqueduct for supplying Paris. His chief works were treatises "On Conical and Cylindrical Sections," "On Surveying," and "On Mechanics."

Born at Paris, 1640; died at the same city, 1719.

LAHN, lahn, a river of Germany, rising on the north frontier of Nassau, and joining the right bank of the Rhine, three miles above Coblenz, after a course of 110 miles, 20 miles being navigable.

LA HOGUE. (See CAPE LA HAGUE.)

LAHORE, la-hor', a chief city of the Punjab, in British India, on the left bank of the Ravee. It was formerly a great city, the occasional residence of the Great Moguls, all of whom expended considerable sums on palaces, gardens, &c. The town is surrounded by fortifications seven miles in circuit. There are a citadel, military school, university, museum, and an educational establishment, in which European knowledge is taught through the vernacular language. There are many fine mosques with minarets and domes (some of which, however, have been applied to other uses), and Hindoo temples. The shah Dura, a mausoleum of the Emperor Jehangeer, is on the opposite side of the river, about 3 miles N. of the town. Pop. 149,369. It is the capital of a division and district of the same name. Pop. of the division, 2,191,517; of the district, 924,106.

LAHOUL, la-hool', a district of the Punjab, in British India. It is encompassed by lofty mountains, two of the passes of which respectively attain an elevation of 13,300 and 16,500 feet above the level of the sea. The general height of the whole country is considerable, whilst it is traversed by numerous torrents. Good grain crops are produced. Manf. Woollens for domestic use Area, 2,000 square miles. Lat. 32° 35′—33° 20′ N. Lon. 76° 30′—77° 30′ E.—The inhabitants are a Tartar race, and followers of Lamaism.

LAHR, lar, a town of Baden, on the Shutter, an affluent of the Rhine, 18 miles S. of Strasburg. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, ribbons, tobacco, and leather. Pop. 7,800.

LAIBACH. (See LAYBACH.)

LAICHEV, lai'-chef, a town of Russia, government of Kasan, on the right bank of the Kama, 30 miles S.E. of Kasan. There are large magazines where salt is stored. Pop. 2,500.

LAIGLE, laigl, a town and parish of France, in the department of Orne, 18 miles from Mortagne. Manf. Needles, pins, and steel goods. Pop. 6,000.

LAINEZ, JAMES, lai-naith', a Spaniard, and one of the companions of Loyola, whom he succeeded in the generalship of the Jesuits, in 1558. He assisted at the council of Trent, where he supported the papal authority to an extravagant degree. He obtained from Paul IV. the perpetual generalship of the order, and extraordinary privileges. He refused a cardinalship.

Born in Castile, 1512; died at Rome, 1565.

LAING, MALCOLM, laing, a Scottish historian, who studied at the university of Edinburgh. He was subsequently called to the Scottish bar; but, although he displayed high forensic abilities, he never succeeded in obtaining much practice. In 1793 he commenced his literary career by editing Henry's "History of Britain." Five years later, he produced "The History of Scotland, from the Union of the Crowns, on the Accession of James VI., to the Union of the Kingdoms in the Reign of Queen Anne." He afterwards appended to the second edition of this work a "Preliminary Dissertation on the Participation of Mary, Queen of Scots, in the Murder of Darnley." He represented Orkney for some time in parliament, and enjoyed the friendship of Fox.

Born in Orkney, 1762; died 1818.

LAIS, lai'-is, a celebrated Greek courtesan, and the mistress of Alcibiades. A native of Hyccara, in Sicily, she was brought to Greece when Nicias, the Athenian general, invaded that country. She afterwards went to Thessaly, where the women, jealous of her personal charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, stoned her to death.

Died about 340.

LAJNO, lazh'-no, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, near the source of the Lao, 16 miles N.W. of Casho Villari. Pop. 3,000.

LAK-NAGY, lak-na'-je, a market town of Hungary, on the Maros, 62 miles S.W. of Battonya. There are two Greek churches. An active trade is carried on in cattle, sheep, and swine.

LAKE, GERARD, Viscount, a distinguished English general. He entered the army at the age of 14, served in the Seven Years' War, and subsequently participated in the campaigns in America and in Holland. During the rebellion in Ireland in 1797-98, he acted as commander-in-chief of the British force. In 1800 he went out to India as commander-in-chief, and three years afterwards took the field against the Mahrattas, whom he signally defeated before the city of Delhi. On entering that city, he obtained possession of Shah Allum, the Mogul emperor, nominally the sovereign of India, but in reality the tool of the Mahrattas. He afterwards reduced Agra, and, by a series of brilliant successes, took from Scindiah all his possessions beyond the river Chumbul. He operated in 1804-5 against Holkar, whom he defeated after an obstinate resistance. For his distinguished services, he was created, on his return to England in 1807, a viscount, having been previously raised to the peerage, as Baron Lake, of Delhi and Laswaree.

Born 1744; died 1808.

LAKE, a county of California, United States. Area, 972 square miles. Pop. 7,000. The capital is Lakeport.

LAKE, a county of Colorado, United States. Area, about 3,000 square miles. Pop. 23,563. The chief place is Dayton.

LAKE, a recently formed county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 720 square miles.

LAKE, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 425 square miles. Pop. 21,000. The capital is Waukegan.

LAKE, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 468 square miles. Pop. 15,000. The capital is Crown Point.

LAKE, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 3,233. The chief place is Chase.

LAKE, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 4,500 square miles. Almost uninhabited.

LAKE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 220 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Painesville.

LAKE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 3,000. Tiptonville is the capital.

LAKE OF THE THOUSAND ISLANDS, a lake in the N.W. part of Canada, British North America, and separating Canada from the State of New York. It is formed where the river St. Lawrence emerges from Lake Ontario, and extends for 40 miles N.E. from Kingston. It is supposed to contain about 1,700 islands, the largest, Wolfe Island, being 10 miles in length and 6 in breadth.

LAKE OF THE WOODS, or DU BOIS, a lake of British North America, 70 miles long and 40 wide. It is studded with wooded islands. The river Winnipeg issues from the north-west extremity. It forms part of the boundary between the United States and British North America.

LAKSHMI, laksh-me', in Hindoo mythology the name of the wife of the god Vishnu.

LALAND. (See LAALAND.)

LALANDE, MICHAEL RICHARD DE, la'-land, a French musician. When young he became a chorister in the church of St. Germaine l'Auxerre, but on reaching manhood he lost his fine voice, and applied himself to the study of the violin, in hopes of being employed by Lulli at the opera; but, being refused, he broke his instrument, and studied the organ. The duke de Noailles recommended him to Louis XIV., who appointed him musical instructor to the court. He was also composer and chapel-master to the king.

Born at Paris, 1657; died at Versailles, 1726.

LALANDE, JOSEPH JEROME LE FRANÇAIS DE, an eminent French astronomer. He was sent to Paris for the purpose of studying jurisprudence, but his attention having been early directed to Fontenelle's "Discourses on the Plurality of Worlds," he secretly devoted himself to the pursuit of astronomical science. He attended the lectures of Lemonnier and Delille, and made such considerable progress as to be able to undertake, before he had attained his nineteenth year, a series of observations for determining the moon's distance from the earth, at the observatory of Berlin. On his return to Paris, the Royal Academy, in token of their admiration of the manner in which he had completed his task, elected him a member of their body, and he was appointed one of the astronomers royal. In 1761 he became professor of astronomy at the College of France, and filled that office during 45 years, with the greatest success. In the latter part of his life he was director of the Paris Observatory. He contributed largely to the scientific memoirs of the French Academy. His principal works were: "Treatise on Astronomy," "Reflections on Eclipses of the Sun," "Compendium of Historical and Astronomical Navigation," "Astronomy for Ladies," "Letter on Saturn's Ring," and "Astronomical Bibliography."

Born at Bourg, 1732; died at Paris, 1807.

LALITA-PATUN, la'-li-ta-pa-toon', a town of Nepaul, India, separated from Khatamandoo by the river Bogmutty. There are some handsome buildings. Manf. Cotton, copper, and brass. Pop. 24,000.

LALLEE, or LALLI, lal-lé', a town of the Punjab, 86 miles N.W. of Lahore. It is much frequented as a place of pilgrimage. Pop. 5,000.

LALLI, GIOVANNI BATISTE, lal'-le, an Italian poet, who was employed by the duke of Parma and the pope in the government of several cities. He wrote, among other works, "The Nefarious French," "Jerusalem Forlorn," and the "Æneid Travestie."

Born 1573; died at Norsino, in Umbria, 1637.

LALLY, THOMAS ARTHUR, Baron de Tollenda, lal'-le, a distinguished French general. He came of an Irish family, that had followed James II. to France. He signalized himself at the battle of Fontenoy, and was appointed brigadier in the field by Louis XV. In 1756 he was sent to the East Indies as governor of the French possessions. He took Gondalore and Fort St. David, but was defeated before Madras; on which he retired to Pondicherry, which he was obliged to surrender to the English in 1761. On his arrival in France he was accused of betraying French interests in India, and the popular clamour was so great that he was sent to the Bastille, and afterwards tried by the parliament, which condemned him to be guillotined, on the absurd charge of having sold Pondicherry to the enemy. He underwent his sentence with great fortitude.

Born in Dauphiny, 1702; died 1766.

LALLY-TOLLENDAL, TROPHIME GÉRARD, Marquis de, son of the above. In 1783 he obtained a reversal of his father's sentence, and obtained the family estates. He was an energetic defender of Louis XVI., and retired to Switzerland in 1791.

Born in Paris, 1751; died 1830.

LALSK, lalsk, a town of Russia, government of Vologda, on the Lia and Lusa, 280 miles N.E. of Vologda. There are four churches and a convent. A considerable transit trade is carried on with Archangel and Siberia. Pop. 3,000.

LAMA, la'-ma, the name of several towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 3,000.

LAMAR, la'-mar, a seaport-town of S. America. (See COBIJA.)

LAMAR, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 17,000, one-fourth coloured. The capital is Paris.

LAMARCK, JEAN BAPTISTE PIERRE ANTOINE DE MONET, Chevalier de, la'-mark, an eminent French botanist and zoologist. He served for some time under Marshal de Broglio, but having met with an accident, quitted the army, and turned his attention first to commerce, and afterwards to science. He at first devoted himself to botany, and made the acquaintance of Buffon, who greatly assisted him. In 1779 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and was despatched on a travelling tour over Europe to collect rare specimens of plants for the Jardin du Roi. In 1793 he was appointed professor of zoology to that body, a post he retained until his death. His principal works were "The Natural History of Invertebrate Animals," and the "French Flora." He also wrote botanical articles for the "Encyclopédie Méthodique." He may be said to have laid the foundation, by his daring and ingenious speculations, of the modern doctrines of development and variation of species. For the last 17 years of his life he was blind, in consequence of an attack of small-pox.

Born at Barenten, Picardy, 1744; died at Paris, 1829.

LA MARMORA, ALFONSO FERRERO, Marquis de, a Sardinian general, who first distinguished himself in the war of independence of 1848. For the eminent services he rendered, he was raised by Charles Albert to the rank of general of brigade, and in 1849 he was appointed to the command of a corps de réserve. He commanded the Sardinian forces sent to take part in the Crimean war, in 1855, and for his eminent services received the grand cross of the Legion of Honour from France, and the order of the Bath from England. Under the administration of Cavour he was minister of war, and in 1861 he succeeded general Cialdini as commander-in-chief of the troops of the king of Italy. In September, 1864, he was entrusted to form a cabinet, and, with the title of president of the council, he held the portfolio of foreign affairs. In December, 1865, he resigned, but soon after was induced to form a new ministry. The following year he took part in the campaign against Austria. He has since been engaged in several diplomatic missions.

Born 1804; died 1878.

LAMARQUE, MAXIMILIEN, Comte de, la'-mark, a distinguished French officer and statesman, entered the army as a private, and soon became captain of grenadiers in a famous corps commanded by Latour d'Auvergne, first grenadier of France. He served in the wars of the republic, and in the campaigns of Austerlitz, the Tyrol, Naples, and Wagram; rendered himself eminently conspicuous in Italy, especially by the capture of Caprea; and was afterwards sent to Spain, where he added to his military reputation. On the return of Bonaparte from Elba, he conferred on Lamarque the command of Paris, and afterwards nominated him general-in-chief of the army of La Vendée. He was proscribed in 1815; but returned to France in 1818, and wrote numerous articles for the opposition journals, chiefly relating to foreign politics. In 1826 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and, after, consulate. In 1815 he visited England; and collected much information concerning its finances, commerce, and public institutions.

Born 1770; died 1832.

LAMARTINE, ALPHONSE, la'-mar-teen, French poet and statesman. His family name was Du Prat, but he assumed that of Lamartine from a maternal uncle. He received his education principally at Belley, with the "Pères de la Foi." After a short sojourn at Lyons, he made his first visit to Italy; and, towards the close of the Empire, repaired to Paris, where he devoted himself to study, to the composition of verse, and to social enjoyment. On the exile of Napoleon to Elba, he took military service under Louis XVIII.; but after the Hundred Days, he left the military for a literary career. He visited Italy for the second time in 1818. In 1820 his fame suddenly and unexpectedly commenced; in that year he produced a small and modest volume, for which he could hardly find a publisher; this was entitled "Méditations Poétiques." It was received with universal admiration; 45,000 copies of the volume were sold in the period of four years, and its author was hailed as a great French poet, worthy to take rank with Beranger; the latter being the poet of Imperialism and the Revolution, the former that of Religion and Royalty. A diplomatic career next opened to the popular poet; he was appointed to a post at the French embassy at Florence, and afterwards became secretary of embassy at Naples and at London, where he married a young and beautiful English lady, who was possessed of a large fortune. About this time his maternal uncle made him his heir, on condition that he should assume the name of Lamartine. He was next chargé-d'affaires in Tuscany, when some remarks made by him in his last canto of "Childe Harold," derogatory to Italian national character, led to a duel between himself and Colonel Pepé, afterwards celebrated as an Italian patriot general, wherein the poet was dangerously wounded. He composed several poetical works while sojourning in Italy; among the rest, his "Nouvelles Méditations," first published in 1823; the "Mort de Socrate," and the "Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses." In all these a strong religious sentiment and a spirit of loyalty for the Bourbons, as well as a bitter feeling towards the Empire and the Revolution, were displayed. He was recalled to France in 1829, and was elected a member of the Académie Française. On the outburst of the French revolution of 1830, he was about to proceed to Greece, as minister plenipotentiary of Charles X. The new monarch, Louis Philippe, offered to retain him in his appointment, but Lamartine declined. As a politician and a prose writer, he resolved to spend the remainder of his life. He sought to obtain a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, and successively presented himself as candidate for the suffrages of Toulon and Dunkirk, but without success. Prevented for the time from taking an active part in political affairs, he resolved to repair to the land of his aspirations and his dreams, the East. In 1832 he set sail for Marseilles, with his wife and daughter, on board a vessel which he had himself equipped, carrying with him a collection of princely presents for the chiefs of the lands he was about to visit. He travelled in oriental countries for sixteen months, but was recalled, just as he had reached Jerusalem, by the news that he had been elected as deputy by the Legitimist constituency of Bergues. He was now actively engaged in politics, and soon became a leader of the "Progressive Conservative" party; but, in 1845, he openly expressed his dislike for the government of Louis Philippe and his minister Guizot, and became an influential member of the opposition party. In 1835 he published his celebrated "Souvenirs, Impressions, Pensées, et Paysages pendant un voyage en Orient," which was almost as popular in an English translation,—"Pictures of the East," as in its original language. His great effort, however, during the last years of Louis Philippe's reign, was the "History of the Girondins," which had an immense weight in producing the fall of the minister Guizot, and in bringing about the revolution of 1848. During that eventful period, Lamartine became one of the most prominent, if not the most prominent man of the day. It was owing to his eloquence that the Chamber of Deputies refused a compromise between the revolution and the Orleans family. He risked his life in withstanding the demands of the leaders of the insurgents and their followers, that the red flag should be the colours of the new republic. He became a member of the provisional government, and the foreign minister of the Republic. He did good service to his country in that capacity, by preventing a general war of revolutionary interference, which the more violent revolutionists desired. His popularity during several months was immense; he was the particular idol of the middle classes, who beheld in him a bulwark between themselves and anarchy. Curiously enough, after a few months, his countrymen grew so indifferent towards him, that it was with difficulty he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. When he stood with Louis Napoleon, Ledru Rollin, and Cavaignac, for the office of president, he obtained by far the fewest votes of the four. After the coup d'état of December, 1851, he retired from politics, and devoted himself exclusively to literature. Indeed his means had become so straitened that a most strenuous effort had to be made by him to ward off total pecuniary ruin, and he became one of the most industrious authors in France. To particularise a few of his most important productions, there are "The History of the Revolution of 1848," "Raphael," "Les Confidences," "Nouvelles Confidences;" these three being autobiographical; "History of the Restoration," "History of Turkey," "History of Russia," and "Fresh Travels in the East." Most of these have been translated into English and the other European languages. He was the proprietor and director of two newspapers, the "Bien Public," published at Maçon, and the "Pays," published at Paris. In 1867 the French government granted him a pension.

Born at Maçon, 1792; died 1869.

LAMB, CHARLES, lam, a distinguished English essayist and humorist. He was the son of a clerk in the Inner Temple. He was sent at an early age to Christ's Hospital, where Coleridge was his schoolfellow. In 1792, he became a clerk in the India House, a post he retained during 33 years. With the exception of one terrible circumstance his life was very uneventful. In 1796, his sister, worn out by constant toil at her needle, as well as weakened in nerves by confinement, took her mother's life in an uncontrollable fit of frenzy. Her insanity being established, she was allowed to remain in the charge of her brother, a duty which Lamb religiously fulfilled to the end of his life. She subsequently recovered her reason, and her brother, who was never married, passed his days with her, both evincing the utmost affection and devotedness to each other. The brother and sister wrote conjointly "Tales from Shakespeare." He first appeared as an author in a small book of poems, published in conjunction with Coleridge and Lloyd. Although this was severely handled by the "Anti-Jacobin," Lamb was not deterred from authorship; for, some time afterwards, he produced a drama, entitled "John Woodvill." His delightful "Essays of Elia," upon which his fame mainly rests, were first printed in the "London Magazine." He was highly esteemed by a large intellectual circle, among whom may be named his life-long friend Coleridge, Leigh Hunt, Southey, Rogers, and Talfourd. The last gentleman published "Lamb's Letters," and "Final Memorials," in 1848. In 1825 he was superannuated from the Indian House, and retired to Edmonton. His death was the consequence of what was thought but a slight accident. For quaint, genial, and unconventional humour, Lamb has, perhaps, never been excelled. He was one of the first to elucidate the beauty of the dramatic poets of the Elizabethan period.

Born in London, 1775; died at Edmonton, 1834.

LAMBALLE, MARIE THERESE LOUISE, of Savoy-Carignan, Princess de, lam'-bal. She was married to the prince of Lamballe, but became a widow in the flower of youth and beauty. Being appointed, in 1774, superintendent of the household to Marie Antoinette, queen of France, she became the particular favourite of that unfortunate princess. On the flight of Louis XVI. and his family, she came to England; her attachment, however, to the queen was so great that she returned to France, and entered the prison of the Temple with her royal friend. She was dragged thence to La Force, and lastly brought before a ferocious tribunal, where she was butchered with sabres, her head and breasts cut off, and her heart taken out. These, borne on pikes, were carried about in savage triumph, and inhumanly taken to the king and his family.

Born at Turin, 1749; died 1792.

LAMBALLE, a town of France, department Côtes-du-Nord, on the Couessant, 127 miles S.W. of St. Malo. There is a fine Gothic church, originally the chapel of the castle. Manf. Woollens, serges, worsted, leather, and earthenware. A brisk trade is carried on. Pop. 4,000.

LAMBARDE, WILLIAM, lam'-bard, an English lawyer and antiquary. He published a collection and translation of the Anglo-Saxon laws; and, in 1574, established an hospital for the poor of Greenwich. In 1579 he became justice of the peace for the county of Kent, and subsequently produced a work on the duties of his office, entitled, "Eirenarchia." He also wrote "Archeion; or, a Discourse upon the High Courts of Justice in England," and collected materials for another work on Great Britain; but on finding that Camden was engaged upon a similar task, he abandoned his intention of publishing it. It was subsequently issued under the title of "Dictionarium Angliæ Topographicum et Historicum."

Born 1536; died 1601.

LAMBAYAQUE, lam-ba-ya'-ke, a town of Peru, about 5 miles from the sea, near the mouth of a small river of the same name, 120 miles N.W. of Truxillo. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 8,000.

LAMBERT, lam'-bert, of Aschaffenburg, a celebrated German Benedictine, who, in 1058, made a journey to Jerusalem, and, on his return to Europe, composed a "Universal History, from the Creation of the World to the year 1050;" the greatest part of it, however, is a history of Germany. It was printed at Basil in 1660.

LAMBERT, emperor and king of Italy. He reigned conjointly with his father till 894, but afterwards became sole monarch. He was constantly at war with Berenger and Arnoul. He is said to have been assassinated while hunting, in 898.

LAMBERT, son of Adalbert II., duke of Tuscany, reigned in Tuscany 929—931. He contributed to place on the throne Hugh of Provence, his half-brother; but the latter ungratefully declared him to be a pretender, and, seizing his person, deprived him of sight.

Died 931.

LAMBERT, JOHN, major-general in the parliamentary army in the reign of Charles I. He is stated to have been a student of the law on the breaking out of the struggle between the king and the parliament; but, joining the popular standard, he became a colonel, distinguished himself at the battles of Naseby and Fife, and assisted Cromwell in his advancement to the Protectorate, but opposed his taking the title of king. For this, Cromwell deprived him of his commission, but, from prudential motives, granted him a pension of £2,000 a year. Being divested of all employment, he withdrew into private life, but, on the death of the Protector, he was chosen by the Rump parliament to repress the royalist insurrection. A short time previously he took an active part in deposing Richard Cromwell; for his services he was appointed one of the council of state, and colonel of a regiment of horse. The parliament, however, growing jealous of his influence with the army, directed him to resign his commission; this he absolutely refused, and, marching to London, dispersed the parliament by force, in October, 1659. He was then appointed major-general of the army, and sent to command the forces in the north; but General Monk having defeated him, and restored the parliament, he was deserted by his army, submitted, and was committed prisoner to the Tower. At the Restoration he was tried and condemned with Sir Harry Vane; but was pardoned, and banished to Guernsey, where he remained during upwards of 30 years.

Born at Kirkby-Malhamdale, 1619; died at Guernsey, 1692.

LAMBERT, JOHANN HEINRICH, an eminent German mathematician. Frederick the Great summoned him to Berlin in 1764, and made him a member of the Council of Architecture and of the Academy of Sciences. He wrote a "Treatise on the Orbits of Comets," a "Treatise on the Properties of Light," and other works. He was an estimable man, and profoundly versed in the mathematical and natural sciences, as known during his time. He was the first to suggest the proper method of measuring the velocity of light.

Born at Mulhausen, Upper Alsatia, 1728; died at Berlin, 1777.

LAMBERT, MICHAEL, lam'-bair, a French composer of high reputation during the reign of Louis XIV., but was, in old age, surpassed by Lully, his son-in-law. His works were collected and published in 1666. Boileau, in his third satire, alludes to him.

Born at Vivonne, near Poitiers, about 1610; died at Paris, 1696.

LAMBESC, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE LORRAINE, Prince of, lam'-besk, was a relative of Marie-Antoinette, whom he accompanied to France, and became colonel-proprietor of the Royal German regiment. A determined enemy of the revolution, he charged the mob assembled at the Tuileries, in July, 1789, and wounded several persons with his own hand. He was afterwards tried for the act, but obtained an acquittal. Upon this he left France, served in the Austrian army, and reached the grade of lieut.-field-marshal. He left no issue, and was the last representative of one branch of the house of Lorraine.

Born 1754; died at Vienna, 1825.

LAMBESC, a town of France, department Bouches-du-Rhone, 25 miles N.W. of Marseilles. There are a fine hospital, a bell-tower, and handsome fountains. Manf. Vermicelli, soda, soap, and oil. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 3,300.

LAMBETH, a metropolitan borough. (See LONDON.)

LAMBEZELLEC, lam-baze'-a-yek, a village of France, department of Finisterre, 2 miles from Brest. There are large foundries and other works. Pop. 12,200.

LAMBOANGA. (See SAMBOANGA.)

LAMBTON, a south-western county of Ontario province, Canada. It contains extensive petroleum wells. Area, 1,083 square miles. Pop. 42,000, more than one-fourth being Irish, and nearly as many Scotch.

LAMEGO, la'-mai-go, a town of Portugal, in the province of Beira, on a tributary of the Douro, 46 miles E. of Oporto. Its principal edifices are a bishop's palace and a Gothic cathedral. There are Roman and Moorish remains. Pop. 9,000.

LAMENNAIS, HUGUES FÉLICITÉ ROBERT, Abbé de, la'-men-nai, a French divine. He was the son of a shipowner at St. Malo, and was intended by his father to follow a mercantile pursuit; but an unconquerable love of learning led him to acquire, almost unassisted, a considerable store of knowledge. In 1807 he became teacher of mathematics in the college of St. Malo, and, in the following year, produced his first work, entitled "Reflections on the State of the Church in France." In 1811 he took the preliminary vows of his church; in 1814 he went to Paris, where he wrote a pamphlet against Napoleon I., then in exile, at Elba, for which he was forced to make his escape from the capital during the Hundred Days. He went to England, where he resided for some time as usher at a school in the vicinity of London. In 1816 he returned to France, and was ordained a priest. His remarkable "Essay on Indifference in matters of Religion" appeared the following year, and produced a profound impression. He visited Rome several years afterwards, and was offered a cardinal's hat by Leo XII., but declined the honour. During the French revolution of 1830 he warmly embraced the democratic cause, declaimed against the temporal abuses of the church, and in "L'Avenir," with Lacordaire and Montalembert while he defended the interests of the Roman Catholic Church, desired that religion should be "regenerated" by being brought home to the bosoms of the lower classes, since the educated people had grown indifferent to its truths. He advocated the separation of the temporal from the spiritual power of the Church. These views evoked a remonstrance from the Holy See; upon which the journal was suppressed. In 1834, he produced his "Words of a Believer," a work which completely shut him out from the ranks of the Roman Catholic clergy. The pope condemned the book, but the republican party accepted its author as an apostle of civil and religious liberty. In 1840, for the "Country and the Government," he was sentenced to undergo a year's imprisonment. He subsequently wrote other works, especially "Sketch of Philosophy," all expressing his views with the old earnestness and eloquence. Before his death, every effort was made to cause him to retract, but without avail; and he died without receiving any religious ministrations whatever, and directed that no religious ceremony should be observed at his funeral. He left some papers, which the clergy for a time prevented from being published; but a lawsuit resulting, they were overruled, and the documents were ordered to be printed according to the author's last wishes.

Born at St. Malo, 1782; died 1854.

LAMETTRIE, JULIEN OFFRAY DE, la'-met-tree', French physician and atheistical writer. He was the son of a rich merchant, and originally intended for the church, but preferred medicine, which he studied at Leyden, under Boerhaave. He then served as a physician in the French army, an appointment he lost in consequence of publishing a work denying the immortality of the soul. A satirical attack on his medical colleagues made it necessary for him to fly to Holland, where, in 1748, he published his most notorious work, "The Man-Machine," which was publicly burned by order of the authorities of Leyden, and the author expelled the country. Frederick the Great invited him to Berlin, and there he lived on terms of familiarity with the king, and published several other works of a similar character. He died from indigestion, and Frederick, who seems to have entertained a high opinion of him, wrote his eulogy.

Born at St. Malo, 1709; died at Berlin, 1751.

LAMI, GIOVANNI, la'-me, an Italian writer, who wrote in defence of the Nicene creed, against Leclerc and others. In 1732 he became librarian of the Ricciardi collection, and professor of ecclesiastical history at the Florence Lyceum. In 1740 he commenced the publication of a literary journal called "Nouvelle Litterarie." He likewise made a selection of the inedited works contained in the Ricciardi Library, and published them under the title of "Delicia Eruditorum," in eighteen volumes. He had projected a History of the Eastern Churches from the Council of Florence, in 1439, but his death interrupted the plan. He was throughout life a warm opponent of the Jesuits.

Born at Santa Croce, Tuscany, 1697; died at Florence, 1770.

LAMIA, lai'-mia, a Greek courtesan, who became concubine to Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, with whom she was taken prisoner by Demetrius Poliorcetes, who made her his mistress. The Athenians erected a temple to her, under the name of Venus Lamia.

LAMIA, a city of ancient Thessaly.

LAMMERMUIR, or LAMMERMOOR, lam'-mer-moor, a ridge of moorish hills in Scotland, extending for 30 or 40 miles through the counties of Haddington and Berwick to the North Sea. The highest summits are Lammer Law, 1728 feet, and Spartleton, 1534 feet.

LAMO, or LAMOO, la-moo', a town on an island on the east coast of Africa, at Zanzibar. It stands on a ridge of sand hills forming the southern boundary of the harbour, and is guarded by a fort. There are several mosques. The harbour is secure for small vessels. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 2° 15′ S. Lon. 41° E.

LAMOILLE, la-mwoil', a county of Vermont, United States. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 12,500. The capital is Hyde Park.

LAMORICIÈRE, CHRISTOPHE LOUIS LEON JUCHAULT DE, la'-mo-riss'-e-air, a celebrated French general. He was educated for his profession at the Polytechnic School, between the years 1824-26, after which he passed to the school of Metz. In 1830 he had reached the grade of lieutenant, and subsequently rose rapidly and highly distinguished himself in Algeria, where, in 1847, he surrounded Abd-el-Kader, and caused him to surrender himself prisoner to the Duc d'Aumale. During the revolution of 1848, he rode amongst the insurgents in the costume of a colonel of the National Guard, proclaimed the abdication of Louis Philippe, and the regency of the duchess of Orleans; but his horse was killed and himself wounded, and he narrowly escaped death at the hands of the mob. The provisional government offered him the office of minister of war, which he refused. In the insurrection of June, he acted under Cavaignac, and fought against the insurgents at the Bastille, and elsewhere. In 1849, on the Russian intervention in Hungary, he was dispatched on an extraordinary mission to the court of Russia, but did not arrive until after the Hungarians had been subdued. On again taking his seat in the Legislative Assembly, he became a strenuous opponent of the president and his party. On the coup d'état of December, 1851, he was arrested and at first conducted to Ham, but afterwards released, and conducted as far as Cologne by the agents of the police. He then took up his residence at Brussels, where he usually continued to live up to the year 1860, when Monsignor Merode, one of the pope's household, induced him to take the command of the papal troops. He was, however, defeated by Cialdini, at Castelfidardo, in September in the same year, and he then relinquished his command.

Born at Nantes, 1806; died 1865.

LAMOTTE, ANTOINE HOUDAR DE, la-mot', a French author. He was the son of a hatter, and was educated for the legal profession; but having a love for dramatic composition, he resolved to devote himself entirely to the theatre. In 1693 he produced his first drama, — "Les Originaux," which was unsuccessful. He subsequently wrote a number of comedies and tragedies, which obtained some success; only one of them, however, keeping possession of the stage,—the tragedy of "Inez de Castro," praised by Voltaire. Lamotte became a member of the French Academy, and was appointed dramatic censor. But he is chiefly remarkable for his attempt to translate the Iliad of Homer, without any knowledge of Greek. By way of improving that poem, he abridged it to twelve cantos, and added to it a discourse, in which he stated that the admiration for Homer and other ancient writers was only a prejudice of his time. About the age of 40 he became blind, and lost the use of his limbs.

Born at Paris, 1672; died 1731.

LAMOTTE, JEANNE DE LUZ, Countess de, a lady, who, becoming aware of the ridiculous passion of Cardinal Rohan for Queen Marie-Antoinette, suggested to the prelate the idea of purchasing for that princess a magnificent diamond necklace. She engaged herself to deliver the present to the queen, and to procure for the cardinal an interview with her. She was, however, associated with swindlers, who raised money on the necklace. For this she was, in 1785, convicted of imposture and swindling, and was condemned to make honourable amends with a cord about her neck, to be whipped and branded, and to be confined in La Salpetrière. She found means of making her escape, and took refuge in England where she printed a book containing reflections on Queen Marie-Antoinette's moral character. "The Diamond Necklace" episode in French history has attracted the attention of several distinguished writers.

Died in England, 1791.

LAMOTTE-FOUQUÉ. (See FOUQUÉ.)

LAMOURE, la-moor', a recently formed county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 1,850 square miles.

LAMOUROUX, J. V. FELIX, la'-moo-roo, a French naturalist, who devoted himself to the study of marine productions, animal and vegetable, and was professor of natural history at Caen. In 1817 he described a new variety of wheat, which was afterwards cultivated with success in the northern provinces of France, under the name of blé lamma.

Born at Agen, France, 1779; died at Caen, 1825.

LAMOV (NIJNI), la-mof', a town of Russia, government of Penza, 68 miles N.W. of the town of that name. There are three churches and a monastery. A large annual fair is attended by traders from all parts of the empire. Pop. 7,000.

LAMOV (VERKNI), a town of Russia, 9 miles S.W. of the preceding. There are seven churches. Pop. 4,300.

LAMPASAS, lam-pa'-sas, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 833 square miles. Pop. 5,500. The chief place is Lampasas.

LAMPEDUSA, lam'-pai-doo'-sa, an island of the Mediterranean Sea, 140 miles S.E. of Sicily, of which it is a dependency. It has a circumference of about 13 miles, and, in 1843, was taken possession of by the king of Naples as a place of banishment. There are many creeks, the largest of which is called the harbour. Lat. 35° 29′ N. Lon. 12° 35′ E.

LAMPERTHEIM, lam'-pairt-hime, a market town of the grand duchy of Hesse Darmstadt, on the right bank of the Rhine, 9 miles S.W. of Heppenheim. There are two churches. Manf. Tobacco. Pop. 4,800.

LAMPETER, lam-pe'-ter, a market town and parliamentary borough in the county of Cardigan, South Wales, on the right bank of the Teify, 25 miles N.E. of Cardigan (with which it is united in returning a member to parliament). There are a handsome parish church, several chapels, and grammar and other schools. Pop. 1,000.—A station on the Great Western railway.

LAMPETO, or LAMPEDO, lam'-pe-to, in Greek legend a queen of the Amazons, who boasted of being the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded several cities. She was afterwards surprised and destroyed, with her female attendants, by a band of barbarians.

LAMPION, lam'-pe-on, (the ancient Scolia), one of the Pelagie islands, 8 miles N.W. of Lampedusa. It is not more than half a mile long, and contains vestiges of ancient buildings.

LAMPLUGH, THOMAS, lamp'-lu, an English prelate. He complied with the Presbyterians in the civil war, but conformed at the Restoration, and became D.D., principal of Alban Hall, and vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1676 he was ordained bishop of Exeter. When the prince of Orange landed, the bishop made a speech to the clergy and gentry, exhorting them to be loyal to James, who gave him the archbishopric of York. Notwithstanding this, he took the oaths to William and Mary.

Born in Yorkshire, 1615; died at Thorp Castle, 1691.

LAMPONG DISTRICTS, lam-pong', a province at the south-eastern extremity of the island of Sumatra. Two very large bays, Lampong and Samangka, are on the southern coast, near which are a range of volcanic mountains. Between the range and the east coast are low districts, subject to inundations in the wet season. There are forests of rattan, pine, caoutchouc, and various trees yielding gums and resins. Rice, pepper, tobacco, cotton, and coffee are cultivated and exported. The wild animals are the elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, hippopotamus, and tapir. Area, 12,926 square miles. Pop. 119,158. In appearance the inhabitants resemble the Chinese, but by speech a Malay dialect, and are Mahomedans. They are ferocious and revengeful.

LAMPORECHIO, lam-po-rach'-e-o, a town of northern Italy, on the west side of Mount Albano, 8 miles from Pistoja. There are a church and the remains of an old castle. Pop. 7,600.

LAMPRIDIUS, ÆLIUS, lam-prid'-e-us, a Roman historian. He wrote the lives of the emperors Commodus, Antonius, Diadumenius, Heliogabalus, and Alexander Severus, which were included in the "Historiæ Augustinæ."

Lived in the 4th century.

LANA, FRANCIS DE, la'-na, an Italian mathematician, who is stated to have been the first to conceive the idea of aërostation, and to have described the subject in a work called "Magisterium Naturæ Artis," published at Brescia, in 1684. A particular dissertation on the subject, entitled "Navis Volans," tending to abate the claims of Montgolfier to this discovery was published, from Lana's work, at Naples, in 1784.

Born at Brescia, 1637.

LANARK, a parliamentary and municipal borough and market town, and the county town of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 30 miles S.W. of Edinburgh. It consists of several streets and lanes, standing on a slope within half a mile of the Clyde, in the midst of beautiful scenery. In a niche on the outside of the church is a colossal statue of the patriot Wallace, some of whose daring exploits were performed in this town. Manf. Muslins, and other cotton goods. Pop. 7,580. In the vicinity are the celebrated "Falls of Clyde."

LANARK, NEW, a well-built village, about a mile to the S. of the above. It owes its origin to an extensive establishment for the manufacture of cotton yarn, begun by Mr. David Dale in 1784. Great attention was paid to the morals of the children, and to their education, by the late Mr. Robert Owen, whose first attempts to establish a new system of social organisation were made here. Pop. 2,000.

LANARK, a maritime county of West Australia, bounded by the Pacific Ocean on the S. and W., between lat 35° and 36° S., and lon. 116° E.

LANARK, a north-eastern county of Ontario province, Canada. Area, 1,197 square miles. Pop. 34,000, half Irish, and one-third Scotch. The capital is Perth.

LANARKSHIRE, lan'-ark-sheer, sometimes called CLYDESDALE, from the river Clyde, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N. and N.W. by the counties of Renfrew, Dumbarton, and Stirling; N.E. by the counties of Linlithgow and Edinburgh; E. by Peebles-shire; S. by Dumfries-shire; and S.W. by Ayrshire. It is subdivided into three inferior divisions, called wards. The upper ward, which is nearly two-thirds of the whole county, is mostly mountainous, or at least hilly and moorish. In this ward is the village of Leadhills, 1,323 feet above the sea level, the highest inhabited place in Scotland. At the S. extremity of the county, where it is bounded by Dumfries, there is a very elevated range of ground, known as the Lowthers, rising, in some parts, to 3,100 feet and others between 2,500 and 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. In proceeding down the Clyde, the prospect opens; the hills stand at a greater distance from one another, the ascents are less abrupt, and the mixture of hill and dale forms a scene at once simple and sublime. Towards the lower part of the upper ward, though the soil is in general less fertile, the country becomes more interesting.

Rivers and Canals.—The Clyde is the principal river. The others, which are tributary to the Clyde, are the Daer, the Coulter, the Methvens, the Douglas, the Mouse, the Nethan, the Avon, Calders (North and South), Rotten Calder, Kelvin, Cart, and Loven. There are three canals,—the Forth and Clyde Canal, which connects, by means of the friths of Forth and Clyde, the German and Atlantic Oceans; the Monkland Canal, which connects the city of Glasgow with the extensive coal-fields in the parishes of Old and New Monkland; and the Ardrossan Canal.

Pro.—The soil and climate seem to be much disposed to the growth of wood; and spontaneous copses everywhere fringe the hanging banks of the rivers. Orchards (for which the district has been famous for nearly a thousand years), embosomed in woods, stand all along the Clyde, by the foot of the rising slopes, and excellent crops of wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, and turnips are raised. The pastures are extensive, and the breed of draught horses is among the best in Scotland.

Minerals.—Abundant; consisting of freestone, limestone, ironstone, coal and granite. It is calculated that the coal stretches through this county, in one solid mass, over nearly 110 square miles, and that its average thickness cannot be less than five yards. Among the mountains, near the S. extremity of the county, are lead-mines, which have been wrought for nearly two centuries. In the same district, gold is sometimes found among the mountains, in veins of quartz, or worked down into the sand of rivulets.

Manf.—Important. At an early period, some manufactures of coarse woollen cloth were established in Lanarkshire; also fine linen and checks, cottons, muslins, the printing of calicoes, the dyeing of Turkey red, and the preparation of various dyes, and other necessary ingredients. Glass and crystal manufactures are carried on to a great extent; the pottery-manufacture, the brewing of ale and porter, and the distilling of spirituous liquors, as well as various others, are also actively pursued.

Area.—880 square miles.

Pop.—904,405.

Principal Towns.—LANARK, the county town; GLASGOW, AIRDRIE, COATBRIDGE, HAMILTON, Motherwell, RUTHERGLEN, and WISHAW.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, 3 for Glasgow, and 1 for Glasgow and Aberdeen universities.

LANCASHIRE, lan'-ka-sheer, a maritime county of England, bounded on the W. by the Irish Sea, E. by Yorkshire, N. by Cumberland and Westmoreland, and S. by Cheshire, from which it is separated by the river MERSEY. The country is divided into two distinct portions by a portion of Westmoreland, including the estuary of the river Kent and a narrow tract on each side of that river. The northern and smaller part is the peninsula of Furness, an irregularly shaped projection into the Irish Sea. The peninsula is 27 miles long, from Amble-side, at the head of Lake Windermere, to the western extremity of Morecambe Bay, and the greatest breadth, from the Duddon to the Winster, is 13 miles. The larger portion of the county measures, from the junction of Yorkshire, Westmoreland, and Lancashire, at the north-eastern angle of the county to the Mersey, is 65 miles, and the greatest breadth, from the Yorkshire boundary to Formby Point on the west coast, is 46 miles. The coast line is very irregular, extending from the Duddon, on the north, to the Mersey, on the south. Except near Blackpool, where are clay cliffs about 100 feet high, the shore is low and sandy. In Morecambe Bay are extensive sands, in which are narrow and intricate channels, through which the waters of the rivers Crake, Leven, Winster, Kent, and Keer flow into the sea. At the head of the bay is a road, available at low-water, connecting the two portions of the county. The Lune discharges by a large and irregularly shaped estuary, nearly two miles wide in some parts, into Lancaster Sound, or Bay, south of Morecambe Bay. The coast-line then runs westward for about six miles to the mouth of the Wyre, at Fleetwood, and for two miles beyond that point to Rossall Point, where it turns abruptly to the south for 13 miles, and then forms for 10 miles the northern shore of the broad estuary of the Ribble, seven miles wide, between Lytham and Southport. Farther south the coast forms a bold curve, round Formby Point, to Liverpool, the point of discharge of the Mersey. This portion of the coast, between Formby and Southport, consists chiefly of low sandhills and extensive rabbit-warrens. Walney Island, 8 miles long, and in no part more than a mile in breadth, is off the south coast of the peninsula of Furness, from which it is separated by sands, intersected by narrow channels, and by several small islands. The northern and eastern portions of the county are mountainous, and include elevated moors or "fells" among them, Furness and Cartmel Fells; in the south and west are low lying level tracts, with extensive peat moors. These "mosses," or bogs, consist of decayed vegetables, and in some parts are putrid, being there known as "black mosses." Less than one-half of the county is under cultivation. The most fertile district is the Fylde, or "field," an extensive plain of about 800 square miles, between the Ribble and the Wyre, and extending inland from the coast for 10 miles. Here grain is cultivated. The vale of Warrington, part of the valley of the Mersey, is also a fertile district. More potatoes are grown in Lancashire than in any other English county. Grazing and dairy farming are attended to, and there are large crops of hay. The climate is mild and salubrious, although the rainfall is heavy.

Mountains and Moors.—The northern portion of Furness includes various offshoots of the Cumbrian mountain system, with summits nearly 3000 feet above the sea-level, divided by narrow valleys, watered by small streams, and containing tarns, or mountain lakes. This part of Furness is generally known as Furness Fells. The "Old Man," a mountain about two miles to the west of Coniston, has an altitude of 2,649 feet above the sea-level. Cartmel Fells are to the west of Windermere, between that lake and Westmoreland. The eastern side of the county, towards Yorkshire, is traversed by hills and moorlands, outlying portions of the great Pennine chain of mountains. Bleasdale Forest, or Moor, an extensive tract about five miles east of Garstang, and near the eastern border, has an average elevation of 1,710 feet; Pendle Hill, near Clitheroe, 1,831 feet; Boulsworth Hill, seven miles north-east of Burnley, 1,700 feet; Rivington Pike, near Bolton, 1,548 feet; and Whittle Pike, near Bury, 1,616 feet. A large part of this elevated district consists of waste moorlands, locally known as "cloughs" and "goyts."

Rivers.—The principal are the MERSEY, the Irwell, which receives the Medlock at Manchester, and, after a course of 40 miles, joins the Mersey near Barton-upon-Irwell; the Ribble, which rises in Yorkshire, and for about 7 miles forms a part of the county boundary, and then flows in a south-westerly direction past Preston, and discharges by a broad estuary into the Irish Sea; the Wyre, formed by the union of a number of small streams rising in the eastern moorlands, and also discharging into the Irish Sea by an estuary known as Wyre Water; the Lune, which has its source in Westmoreland near Kirkby-Lonsdale, and flows through picturesque scenery, and studded with many islands, past Lancaster, below which it expands into a broad sheet of water, and then discharges, by a narrow channel between Cockerham Sands and extensive sands known as Sunderland Shoulder, to the south of Morecambe Bay.

Lakes.—These are all in the north-western portion of the county. The greater portion of Windermere, or Winander Mere (mere, lake), the largest lake in England, is within it, and the northern half forms the boundary between Lancashire and Westmoreland. It is 11 miles long, but scarcely more than a mile wide in any part, and 200 feet deep in some parts. The elevation above the sea-level is 108 feet. The scenery which surrounds the lake is very beautiful. Coniston Water is a narrow lake, at an elevation of 187 feet above the sea, about six miles long, parallel to Windermere, at a distance of five miles. The greatest depth is 240 feet. There are two small islands in the lake. It communicates with Morecambe Bay by the river Crake. The lake was formerly known as Thurston Water. Esthwaite Water, between Windermere and Coniston; Gailes Water, Leven Water, Low Water, and Seathwaite Tarn, are small lakes in the Coniston district.

Minerals.—In Furness, south of Coniston, iron ore is more abundant than in any part, of equal area, of Great Britain. It consists chiefly of hæmatite (bloodstone), a per-oxide of iron, commonly known as "kidney ore." In this district there are 22 mines, yielding an annual average of 670,000 tons of ore, more than half of which is pure iron. In the same district copper is also worked. There are several mines in the neighbourhood of Coniston, and about 150 tons of fine copper are annually produced. A moderate amount of lead is worked on the north-eastern border of the county, near the river Hodder. The coalfields of Lancashire are among the most extensive and productive in England. There are three separate fields, the Lancashire, Manchester, and Burnley, having a united area of 217 square miles, about one-ninth of the entire surface of the county. In the neighbourhood of Wigan, "cannel" coal (hard, and resembling jet) is extensively worked.

Manf.—The staple manufacture of the county is cotton, the various processes of which give employment to about 316,000 persons. The spinning trade is extensive, large quantities of yarn being annually exported. Weaving by power looms, cotton printing, dyeing, and bleaching, are carried on in nearly all the large towns. Cotton prints, calicoes, shirtings, velvets, fustians, dimities, checks, tickings, jeans, diapers, and muslins, are among the chief goods manufactured and exported. The immense amount of machinery employed, the abundance of coal in the county, and the large yield of iron in the Furness district, have given rise to numerous and extensive foundries and machine factories, which form an important element in the manufactures of the county.

Railways and Canals.—The county is traversed by portions of the London and North-Western, the Great Northern, and Midland systems, the Lancashire and Yorkshire, the East Lancashire, and by various branch railways. The Leeds and Lancashire Canal enters the county near Colne, runs past Burnley, Blackburn, Chorley, and Wigan; thence into the estuary of the Ribble. The Sankey Canal connects St. Helen's with the Mersey. The Lancaster Canal unites Preston, Lancaster, and Kendal (or Westmoreland). The Ashton Canal connects Ashton, Manchester, Oldham, Dukinfield, and the Huddersfield Canal. The Rochdale Canal connects Manchester, Middleton, Rochdale, and Todmorden, with the Calder navigation in Yorkshire. A portion of the Bridgewater Canal runs from Manchester to Ashton, sending off branches to Leigh and Worsley. At Ashton it crosses the Mersey into Chester. At Manchester, the canal is connected with the Rochdale and the Bolton, Bury, and Manchester canals.

Chief Towns.—There are 13 boroughs, with mayors and corporate bodies: Lancaster, Liverpool, Manchester, Salford, Preston, Bolton, Oldham, Blackburn, Rochdale, Wigan, Ashton-under-Lyne, Warrington, and Clitheroe. Accrington, Bacup, Barrow-in-Furness, Burn ley, Bury, Chorley, Colne, Farnworth, Heywood, Over Darwen, Prescot, St. Helen's, Todmorden, and Ulverston, are all manufacturing towns, and so also are Ardwick, Broughton, Cheetham, Chorlton-on-Medlock, and Hulme, which adjoin Manchester, and may almost be considered as suburbs of that city. Broughton-in-Furness, Garstang, Haslingden, Hawkshead, Kirkham, Middleton, and Ormskirk are market towns, less prominently connected with manufactures. There are several attractive watering-places, which are much resorted to; the principal are Blackpool, Fleetwood, Lytham, Morecambe, and Southport. (See the various headings.)

Abbeys, Castles, and other Antiquities.—Furness Abbey, of which there are extensive and beautiful remains, 2 miles S. of Dalton-in-Furness, Whalley Abbey, near Clitheroe, of which there are now only fragments; the octagonal chapel of Cockersand Abbey, 6 miles S.W. of Lancaster; some remains of Piel, or Peel Castle, on a small island, south of Furness; the modernised castle at Clitheroe, and some remains of strongholds in various parts of the county. In Furness, there are traces of British fortifications and Druidical circles.

Parliamentary Representation.—Eight members are returned for the four divisions of the county, and 22 for the various boroughs.

Area.—1,905 square miles. In size it is the sixth among the English counties.

Pop.—3,454,225.

History.—Lancashire is not mentioned as a separate shire in Domesday Book, but that portion of it between the Mersey and the Ribble is included in Cheshire, and the northern part in Yorkshire. Roger de Poitou, the first Norman baron of the Honour of Lancaster, forfeited his possessions to the crown, and, after some changes, the land between the Ribble and the Mersey came into the possession of William, earl of Ferrers, who took the title of earl of Derby, and was made the principal baron of the whole county. In 1265, his descendant forfeited his titles and lands by having taken part in the insurrection of the barons headed by Simon de Montford. The "Honour of Lancaster" was conferred, with the forfeited estates, by Henry III., on his youngest son, Edmund, surnamed Crouchback, who also possessed the title of the king of Sicily. His descendant, Henry, was created duke of Lancaster by Edward III.; and his daughter married John of Gaunt, or Ghent, fourth son of the monarch. On the death of the duke of Lancaster, Prince John succeeded to the ducal titles; and from that time the duchy of Lancaster has been associated with the royal family of England. The present queen is also duchess of Lancaster. As an additional favour to the first duke, Lancashire was raised to the dignity of a county palatine. Henry Bolingbroke, duke of Lancaster, the son of John of Gaunt, on his accession to the throne as Henry IV., procured an act of parliament, ordering that the duchy, with all its privileges, should remain to him and to his heirs for ever. But on the accession of Edward IV., the representative of the rival house of York, the duchy was declared to be forfeited to the crown, and was vested in the sovereign of England and his heirs. Henry VIII. considerably diminished the privileges of the county palatine.

LANCASTER, lan'-kas-ter, a municipal and parliamentary borough and seaport, the county town of Lancashire, on the Lune, over which there is a bridge of five arches, and an aqueduct for carrying a canal. Nearly the whole town is built from quarries of excellent freestone in the neighbourhood. Of the public buildings, the castle, wholly occupied as the county gaol, is the most important and interesting, and is still admired for its extent, and the peculiar character of its architecture. The walls of the keep are of amazing thickness, and the apartments of uncommon dimensions. The keep is ascribed to the Saxons; but the principal part of the building was erected by Edward III. and his son John o' Gaunt, whom he created duke of Lancaster. A little to the west of the keep are the shire-hall and county-courts. Contiguous to the castle is the parish church, a spacious structure, in the later English style, dedicated to St. Mary. There are two new and elegant churches, a Roman Catholic convent, with church and schools, the Ripley Hospital for the education of 150 boys and as many girls, a splendid Gothic building, erected in 1864; and the County Asylum for Idiots, in the early Gothic style, with grounds of 40 acres. There are, besides, other places of worship, a town-hall, custom-house, assembly-rooms, mechanics' institute various schools and charitable institutions. There is a cemetery of 21 acres on Lancaster Moor. Manf. Consisting of sail-cloth, cotton, silk, linen, tabletaize, and furniture. There is a considerable coasting trade in connexion with the port. Pop. 20,724. —A station on the London and North-Western, Midland, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways.

LANCASTER, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 160 square miles. Pop. 5,500, two-thirds of them coloured. Lancaster Court House is the capital.

LANCASTER, DUKE OF. (See JOHN OF GAUNT.)

LANCASTER, SIR JAMES, an English navigator, who, in 1591, sailed as commander of a squadron to the East Indies, where he touched at Ceylon and Sumatra, and, after taking several vessels and losing some of his own, shaped his course for England; but in the voyage, meeting with adverse winds, he was driven on the coast of America. He landed on a small island, and the crew, taking advantage of his absence, cut the cable and sailed for England. He afterwards obtained a passage on board a French ship, and arrived at Rye in 1594. He went out again with another fleet, with which he committed many depredations on the coast of Brazil, and took the town of Pernambuco, where he obtained immense treasure, which he brought to England in 1595. He next commanded the fleet sent out by the newly-established East India Company, and obtained the grant of a settlement at Acheen, and also at Bantam, after which he returned to England. He maintained the existence of a north-west passage, and encouraged many attempts to discover it during his lifetime. One of the expeditions, commanded by Baffin, reached the Sound which is named LANCASTER SOUND, in honour of Lancaster. He was created a baronet for his services.

Died 1620.

LANCASTER, JOSEPH, the founder of the Lancasterian system of education. Before he had attained his nineteenth year, he set up a school for poor children in a room lent him by his father, in the Borough-road, Southwark, and, in a short time, had ninety children under his charge. He continued his philanthropic efforts for disseminating education among the lowest classes, and the established church made him many overtures, which he, as a member of the Society of Friends, was constrained to decline. Almost unaided, he travelled over the United Kingdom, and lectured to upwards of 50,000 people on the system which he had organized: this system consisted in teaching the elements of education by mutual or monitorial instruction. Becoming insolvent, he emigrated to the United States in 1818, and pursued his educational efforts with much success in that country. He visited Canada in 1829, and obtained several grants from the parliament of Lower Canada in furtherance of his educational projects. He became embarrassed in his means once more; but his friends subscribed to purchase a small annuity for him.

Born in London, 1778; died at New York, 1838.

LANCASTER SOUND, a western inlet of Baffin's Bay, extends west from Baffin's Bay into Barrow's Strait. Lat. 74° to 75° N. Lon. 80° to 87° W.

LANCE, GEORGE, lance, a modern English painter, celebrated for his fruit pieces and still-life productions. He studied high or historical art under Haydon; but it was not until he had discovered where his true powers lay that he made any marked progress. This he did accidentally, by copying a group of fruit as a study of colour. Almost from the first moment of his bringing his skill to bear on the peculiar line of art for which he afterwards became distinguished, he proved that a great painter in an original line had appeared.

Born at Little Easton, Essex, 1802; died 1864.

LANCELOT, CLAUDE, lancé-lot, a celebrated grammarian, who became professor at Port Royal in 1638, and composed for the use of his pupils a series of excellent works. He shared in the persecutions to which the establishment of Port Royal was subjected, on account of its attachment to Jansenism. He wrote "New Method of learning the Latin Language," generally known as the "Port Royal Latin Grammar;" "Greek Grammar;" "Greek Roots;" "Italian Grammar;" and other works.

Born at Paris, 1615; died at Quimperlé, 1695.

LANCIANO, lan-che-a'-no, a town of Italy, in the province of Abruzzio Citeriore, 6 miles from the Adriatic. It is situated on three hills, two of which are connected by an ancient bridge of Roman construction. There is a fine cathedral, with valuable paintings. Manf. Linen goods, maccaroni, and iron. Pop. 16,896.—The town occupies the site of the ancient Anxia, or Ancianum.

LANCISI, GIOVANNI MARIA, lan-ché'-se, a learned Italian, who studied medicine, chemistry, botany, and geometry with equal success. He was physician to popes Innocent XI. and Clement XI., and was the author of several valuable treatises on natural history, anatomy, &c. At his death, he left to the hospital of San Spirito at Rome, a library of 20,000 volumes, on condition that it should be free to the public.

Born at Rome, 1654; died 1720.

LANDAK, lan-dak', a small state of the Dutch province on the west coast of the island of Borneo. There are valuable diamond-mines. The chief town is of the same name.

LANDAU, lan'-dou, a fortified town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, near the Quelch, 20 miles N.W. of Carlsruhe. It has a collegiate church, monasteries, an arsenal; and has often been taken and retaken. Manf. Tobacco. Pop. 7,000.—In the Thirty Years' War this town was besieged and taken eight times, the last time by the French. Vauban erected the fortifications in 1684, but, notwithstanding its supposed impregnability, it was taken by the Imperialists in 1702.

LANDAU, a town of Bavaria, province of Lower Bavaria, on the right bank of the Iser, 36 miles S.E. of Regensburg. There are four churches. Manf. Iron and agricultural implements. Pop. 2,500.

LANDER, RICHARD, lan'-der, African explorer. He was brought up as a printer, and in 1825 accompanied captain Clapperton on his expedition to the Niger; and on his return published a narrative of the expedition. In 1830 he started again with his brother, and was fatally wounded in a conflict with the natives.

Born at Truro, 1804; died at Fernando Po, 1830

LANDER, a county of Nevada, United States. Area, 10,000 square miles. Pop. 3,000. The capital is Austin.

LANDERNEAU, lan'-der-no, a seaport of France, department Finistère, on both sides of the Landerneau, or Elorn river, 13 miles N.E. of Brest. There are a Gothic church, dating from the 16th century, a convent, a communal college, barracks, and many good residences. Manf. Linen, leather, hats, and wax. There is a large trade in linen goods, thread, military equipments, cheese, and agricultural produce. The harbour admits vessels of 400 tons. Pop. 7,800.

LANDES, land, a maritime department in the south-west of France, bounded on the W. by the Bay of Biscay, and on its other sides by the departments of the Gironde, the Lot, and Garonne, the Gers, and the Lower Pyrenees. In the north it is covered with extensive heaths, from which it takes its name, and in the south it is mountainous. On the coast it has many large lagoons, communicating with the sea, besides extensive downs, upon which plantations of pine are grown. The vineyards are extensive, and about 10,000,000 gallons of wine are produced annually.

Rivers.—The Adour and the Douze.
Minerals.—Coal, iron, bitumen, and mineral waters.
Area.—3,804 square miles.
Pop.—307,143.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are three arrondissements and 33 communes; the principal towns are MONT-DE-MARSAN, the capital; ST. SEVER, and DAX.

LANDON, LETITIA ELIZABETH, lan'-don, generally known as "L. E. L.," an English poetess. At the early age of 13 she displayed a vivid and inventive imagination, and produced several small poems, and at the age of 18 some of her verses appeared in the Literary Gazette, and were received with a considerable amount of attention. Her father dying soon after, and leaving his family in reduced circumstances, Miss Landon devoted herself to literature, as a means of support for herself and assistance to her relatives. Her poems in the Literary Gazette, signed "L. E. L.," were soon eagerly looked for, and excited great admiration. She likewise wrote criticisms of poetry and works of fiction for the Gazette, and, as Mr. Jerdan, the editor, afterwards stated, her labours for the print were little less than his own. "The Fate of Adelaide, a Swiss Romantic Tale," was published in 1821. This, her first collection, was followed by "The Improvisatore," "The Troubadour," "The Golden Violet," and others. At that period the annuals were popular, and to these "L. E. L." contributed largely. She was less successful as a novelist than as a poet, for her three works of fiction, "Romance and Reality," "Francesca Carara," and "Ethel Churchill," were soon forgotten. In 1838 she was married to Mr. George Maclean, the governor of Cape-Coast Castle, Western Africa. She left England with her husband, and in a little more than a year, was found lying on the floor of her apartment, dead. In her hand was a small phial that had contained prussic acid. At the inquest, the jury discovered no cause for suspicion in her death, neither could it be thought that her end had been due to her own intentional act.

Born at Old Brompton, 1802; died 1839.

LANDOR, WALTER SAVAGE, lan'-dor, a modern English poet, essayist, and miscellaneous writer. He was the son of Walter Landor, Esq., a wealthy landed proprietor, of ancient family. He was educated at Rugby school and Trinity College, Oxford. The professions of the army and the law were successively proposed to him, and both in turn declined; he preferred to live an untrammelled life of literary ease on the income allowed him by his father. In 1802 he went to Paris, where he witnessed the accession of Bonaparte to the consulship for life. On succeeding to the family estates, by the death of his father, he began by expending vast sums in buildings and improvements thereon; but, in a few years, he suddenly sold off all his property, some of which had been in his family's possession during 700 years, and went abroad, intending to become a citizen of the world. During the struggle between the Spanish patriots and Napoleon I., he raised men, joined the former, and materially aided the Junta by gifts of money. He was appointed colonel in the Spanish service; but, at a later period, when the restored king, Ferdinand, had overthrown the constitution which the Spaniards had obtained for themselves, he resigned his commission, declaring that though "willing to aid the Spanish people in the assertion of their liberties against the antagonist of Europe, he would have nothing to do with a perjurer and a traitor." He had married Miss Thuillier, a young lady of Swiss extraction, residing at Bath, in the year 1811; and, after the fall of Napoleon, he, with his wife, took up his residence at Florence, where he purchased some estates. Here during thirty years he lived, making only a few visits to England at wide intervals. It was while a resident at Florence that he composed his most important works. In 1820 he printed his "Idyllia Heroica," in Latin, at Pisa. Between the years 1824-29 he brought out, in London, his "Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen." In 1831 he republished "Gebir," a poem, first produced in English, but translated by himself into Latin in 1813. In 1836 he published "A Satire on Satirists, and Admonition to Detractors," and in the following year, "The Pentameron and the Pentalogue." Besides these, he wrote many shorter and less important works; his dramas, "Andrew of Hungary" and "Giovanni of Naples," were first published in 1839. He was unquestionably greater as a prose than as a poetical writer. His latest productions were, "Last Fruit off an Old Tree," published in 1853, and "Letters of an American," first given to the world under the assumed name of "Pottinger," in 1854. In 1859 an action was brought against him for defaming a lady at Bath, and to avoid paying damages he quitted England for Italy.

Born at Ipsley Court, Warwickshire, 1775; died at Florence, 1864.

LANDOUR, lan-door', a sanitary station in the north-western part of British India, near the south border of the Gurhwal. It is situated at an elevation of 7,600 feet above the sea level, and enjoys a delightfully temperate climate. There are, besides barracks, a church, hospital, and other good buildings.

LANDPORT, land'-port, a large suburb of Portsmouth. (See PORTSMOUTH.)

LANDRECIES, lan-drai-cese', a town of France, department Nord, on the Sambre, 20 miles E. of Cambray. It is strongly fortified, and a large trade is carried on. Pop. 4,000.—From 1815 to 1818 this town was occupied by the Russians.

LANDSBERG, lands'-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, on the Warthe, 40 miles N.E. of Frankfort. Manf. Woollens, leather, paper, and machinery. There are important markets for corn and wool. Pop. 3,000.

LANDSEER, CHARLES, R.A., land'-seer, a modern English painter. He painted many pictures of merit, chiefly illustrative of the works of the popular poets and novelists. He was elected an academician in 1845, and six years afterwards became keeper of the Royal Academy.

Born 1799.

LANDSEER, SIR EDWIN, R.A., a distinguished English painter. He was the brother of the preceding, and son of John Landseer, an engraver of considerable merit, and a writer and lecturer on art. From his earliest years he evinced extraordinary skill in drawing, and when only 14 exhibited successful pictures of terriers, spaniels, a horse, and other small subjects. Under his father's direction he was in the habit of sketching sheep, donkeys, and other animals, on Hampstead Heath; and to this early familiarity with nature we may attribute his wonderful skill and fidelity, as exhibited in his pictures during after-life. When he was 18 he painted "The Dogs of St. Gothard," and from that time he was admitted to stand at the head of English animal-painters. Although so early successful, he never lost the habits of a student, but went on increasing in power year after year. He became a Royal Academician in 1827. He was knighted in 1850. At the French Exposition of 1855 he was the only English artist to whom was awarded the large gold medal. In 1866 he was elected president of the Royal Academy, but declined to serve. Sir Edwin's pictures are familiar to thousands of his countrymen, through the medium of scores of engravings. As a painter of animals, with a remarkable power of infusing sentiment, pathos, even humour into his pictures, without in the slightest degree over-stepping a true delineation of animal nature, he has never been equalled. His portraits and landscapes are also admirable. He modelled the large lions for the base of the Nelson monument in Trafalgar-square. For the last two or three years of his life he was mentally afflicted.

Born in London, 1803; died 1873.

LAND'S-END, lands-end', in Cornwall, the W. extremity of England, formed of granite cliffs, about 70 feet in height. (See CORNWALL.)

LANDSHUT, lant'-shoot, a town of Bavaria, province of Upper Bavaria, on the river Iser, 40 miles N.E. of Munich. The principal portion of the town consists of two long streets, which are tolerably wide and straight, and connected by a number of lanes. The chief edifices are the palace, the provincial house of assembly, the old town-house, and the hospital for decayed citizens. There are, besides, three parochial churches; one of them, called St. Martin's, a Gothic building erected in 1450, with a tower 420 feet high. Manf. Woollen cloths, hosiery, tobacco, paper, cards, leather, and watches; besides breweries and distilleries. Pop. 14,500.

LANDSHUT, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 27 miles S.E. of Liegnitz, on the right bank of the Bober, near the confluence of the Zeider. There are three churches, a convent, court-house, and hospital. Manf. Linen, flax, and tiles. Pop. 4,400.

LANDSTUHL, land'-stool, a town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, 39 miles N.W. of Spires. There is a ruined castle near the town. The Count of Sickengen, the friend of Luther, was killed in a siege, and is buried in the church. Manf. Potash; there is a trade in cattle. Pop. 2,800.

LANE, EDWARD WILLIAM, lain', Oriental scholar. He was the third son of Prebendary Lane, of Hereford cathedral, and, after an education in the grammar-schools of Bath and Hereford, went to London and studied engraving. At the age of 24 he commenced the study of oriental languages and literature, and afterwards spent many years in Egypt. He produced a new translation of the "Arabian Nights," and an "Arabic-English Lexicon," the last volumes of which were uncompleted at the time of his death. This work procured him the honour of being elected a correspondent of the Institute of France, and the university of Leyden conferred on him the doctor's degree in 1875.

Born at Hereford, 1801; died 1876.

LANE-END. (See LONGTON.)

LANFRANC, lan'-frank, archbishop of Canterbury, a member of a noble family of Pavia. His early manhood was spent as an advocate in the law-courts of that town; after which he went to France, and established a school at Avranches, which was attended by students of the highest rank. On a journey to Rouen, he was robbed and left bound in a wood. Some peasants released him, and conveyed him to the abbey of Bec, where he was so kindly treated, that he became a monk therein, and, in three years, was chosen prior. William, duke of Normandy, gave him the abbey of St. Stephen, at Caen, and, after the conquest of England, advanced him to the archbishopric of Canterbury. In 1071 he went to Rome to receive the pallium from Pope Alexander II. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded several churches and hospitals. He wrote against Berenger on the Eucharist, and other works, which were published in Paris, 1648.

Born at Pavia, 1005; died 1089.

LANGBAINE, GERARD, lang'-bain, a learned divine, who rose from servitor to be fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. He edited "Longinus," and several other learned works. In 1645 he was chosen provost of his college, which, with the office of keeper of the archives, he held to his death. He was esteemed by Selden, Usher, and other great men, his correspondence with whom has been printed.

Born in Westmoreland, about 1608; died 1657.

LANGBAINE, GERARD, son of the above, became beadle of law at Oxford, and published an "Appendix to the University Catalogue of Graduates," and "An Account of the English Dramatic Poets."

Born at Oxford, 1656; died 1692.

LANGEAIS, lange'-i, a town of France, department Indre-et-Loire, on the right bank of the Loire, 14 miles S.W. of Tours. There is a large Gothic castle of the 13th century still in good preservation. Manf. Linen, tiles, and bricks. Pop. 3,500.

LANGELAND, lang'-e-land, an island of Denmark, at the southern entrance of the Great Belt, between Zealand, Laaland, and Funen. It is 33 miles long, with an average breadth of 3, is undulating, and produces corn, flax, apples, timber, and cattle. The only town is Rudkjöbing, on the west coast. Pop. 2,800.

LANGELAND, or LONGLAND, ROBERT, lang'-land, an old English poet, and one of the first disciples of Wickliffe, who distinguished himself by a curious poem, entitled "The Visions of Piers Plowman," written in 1369, intended as a satire on almost every description of men, but especially the clergy. It is written in blank verse, with force and humour, in an alliterative measure.

Died about 1370.

LANGLE, John Maximilian de, langl, a French Protestant minister, who officiated in the reformed church at Rouen for twenty-five years. He wrote a "Defence of Charles I., king of England," two volumes of Sermons, and translated from the English the "Whole Duty of Man."

Born at Evreux, 1590; died 1674.

LANGLE, Samuel de, son of the above. He was minister of the church at Rouen, whence he removed to Charenton, where he was greatly esteemed for his learning and virtues. On the persecution breaking out against the Protestants, he removed to England, and obtained a prebend of Westminster. The university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. Bishop Stillingfleet printed a letter of his on the difference between the Church of England and the dissenters.

Born in London; died 1690.

LANGNAU, lang'-nou, a town of Switzerland, canton of Bern, on the Ilfis, 15 miles E. of the town of Bern. It is the principal mart for the cheese and linen-thread produced in the district. Pop. 6,300.

LANGON, lan-gon', a town of France, department Gironde, on the left bank of the Garonne, 24 miles S.E. of Bordeaux. Manf. Casks and leather. There is a trade in wine, brandy, and ship-timber. Pop. 4,500.

LANGRES, langr, a town of France, department Haute-Marne, situated 1,400 feet above the sea level, 20 miles S.E. of Chaumont. The cathedral was built in the 11th century. There are, besides, a Roman arch, a town-hall, a school of geometry, and several hospitals. Manf. Fine cutlery, of which it is the principal seat in France. Pop. 6,800.

LANGTOFT, Peter, lang'-toft, an old English chronicler, who translated from the Latin, into French verse, Herbert Bosenham's "Life of Thomas à Becket," and also composed a chronicle in verse, which began with the Trojans and went down to Edward I. An English metrical translation of this was made by Robert de Brunne, and published at Oxford in 1725. A manuscript of the Chronicle is preserved in the Cottonian collection of the British Museum, and another is to be found in the Arundel MSS. contained in the Heralds' College.

Lived in the 13th and 14th centuries.

LANGTON, Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, and cardinal of St. Chrysogonus. He was of English birth, studied at, and became chancellor of, the university of Paris, and was created archbishop of Canterbury by the pope, in opposition to King John and the clergy. John forbade Langton from entering his dominions, and banished the monks of Canterbury, for which the kingdom was laid under the papal interdict. The king was afterwards excommunicated, and his subjects absolved from their allegiance; on which he made his submission, by complying with the papal terms, after which he received the papal absolution from Langton, who, however, refused the pope's bull of excommunication against the barons for leaguing against John, at Runnymede, for which he was suspended in 1215. At length he purchased his pardon, and was reinstated three years afterwards. He was a stanch adherent to the cause of national liberty, and a learned writer. He is supposed to have been the first to divide the Bible into chapters.

Died 1228.

LANGUEDOC, lan'-ge-dok, an old province of France. (See France.)

LANGUET, Hubert, lan'-gai, minister of state to Augustus, elector of Saxony, was a native of France, and converted to the Protestant faith by Melancthon. He was at Paris during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, as ambassador from the elector, and narrowly escaped with his life, after saving that of Wichelus, the printer, in whose house he lodged, and also the famous De Mornay. He was employed in several other embassies; but being suspected of favouring the Zwinglians, he quitted the service of the elector, and entered into that of the prince of Orange. He wrote a letter to Sir Philip Sidney, and other pieces.

Born 1518; died at Antwerp, 1581.

LANHO, lan'-ho, a river of China, rising in Mongolia, traverses China in a south-easterly direction, and falls into the Gulf of Pechelee, after a course of 300 miles.

LANIERE, Nicholas, lan'-e-eer, a painter, engraver, and musician, who was employed to collect pictures in foreign countries for Charles I. He placed a particular mark on all which he brought to England. Pepys says, in his Diary, "that Laniere did, at the request of Mr. Hill, bring two or three of the finest prints for my wife to see that ever I did see in all my life." He was also chapel-master to Charles I.

Born 1568; died 1646.

LANJARON, lan'-ha-ron, a market-town of Spain, province of Granada, and 24 miles S.E. of the town of that name. It has mineral waters, and, on account of the coolness of its atmosphere, is much frequented in summer. Manf. Linen, ribbon, lace, soap, brandy, wine, and oil. Pop. 3,000.

LANKESTER, Edwin, M.D., lan'-kes-ter, an English writer and lecturer on natural science, who, in his youth, was apprenticed to a surgeon. After completing his term and passing the College of Surgeons and Apothecaries' Society, he went to Germany, and graduated at Heidelberg. He became a licentiate of the College of Physicians in 1841. He was the author of several volumes on natural history, and edited the botanical portion of the "English Cyclopædia." He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and professor of natural history at New College, London. He was elected one of the coroners for Middlesex in 1862.

Born in Suffolk, 1814; died 1874.

LANNES, JEAN, lan'-nes, duke of Montebello and marshal of France. Born of humble parents, he worked as a dyer in early life; but, joining a battalion of volunteers in 1792, he, by his courage, rapidly rose to the grade of major. In 1794 he attracted the notice of Bonaparte, who procured him a command in the army of Italy. At the battles of Montenotte and Millesimo he displayed considerable bravery, and became colonel in 1796. He was made general of brigade in the following year, and sustained a brilliant part at the taking of Mantua and at the battle of Arcola. He went with the French expedition to Egypt, and rose to the rank of general of division. The French victory at Aboukir was in part due to his bravery and coolness. At the siege of Acre he was severely wounded. He left Egypt with Bonaparte, and, after returning to Paris, rendered good service to his chief during the revolution of the 18th Brumaire (9th November), 1799, for which Napoleon appointed him commander of the consular guard. After various employments, he commanded the advance guard of the French army crossing the Great St. Bernard into Italy, in 1800. At the great battle of Montebello, where the Austrians were completely beaten, Lannes displayed such great skill and bravery, that Napoleon gave him the title of Montebello when he raised him to the dukedom. He was no less distinguished at the battle of Marengo. On his return from Portugal in 1804, whither he had been sent as minister-plenipotentiary of France, Napoleon created him marshal of France, and afterwards duke of Montebello. In the German campaigns of 1805-6, he commanded the advance guard, and rendered the most signal service to his master at the battles of Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, and Friedland. His last great exploit was, in 1809, the defence of the village of Essling, where, while resisting the fierce onslaught of the Austrians, a cannon-ball struck off his right leg, and the foot and ancle of the left. He was greatly esteemed by the Emperor Napoleon for his intrepidity and military skill. His young widow was afterwards lady of honour to the empress Maria Louisa.

Born at Lectoure, Guienne, 1769; died at Vienna, 1809.

LANNION, lan'-ne-one, a town and river port of France, department Côtes-du-Nord, on the Guer, about 7 miles from the mouth of that river. There is a trade in timber, wine, and colonial produce. Pop. 5,400.

LANORAIE, lan-o-rē', a town of the province of Ontario, Canada, on the right bank of the St. Lawrence, 38 miles N.E. of Montreal. There is a Roman Catholic church. A trade is carried on in flour and timber. Pop. 2,400.

LA NOUE, FRANÇOIS DE, French warrior and author. He belonged to a noble family of Brittany, and, having adopted the reformed religion, served with great distinction in the Huguenot army, under Condé. At the siege of Fontenay-le-Compte, in 1570, he lost his left arm, which was replaced by one of iron, from which he received the soubriquet of "Bras-de-Fer." On the restoration of peace he was appointed field-marshal in the service of the Netherlands, and was captured by the Spaniards and kept prisoner for five years. In 1585 he was exchanged for Philippe Egmont. He afterwards served under Henry IV. of France, and died of wounds received at the siege of Lamballe. He has been compared to the Chevalier Bayard for brilliant courage and distinguished virtues. He wrote "Political and Military Discourses," which is considered one of the finest specimens of French prose of the 16th century.

Born near Nantes, 1531; died 1591.

LANSDOWNE, HENRY PETTY FITZMAURICE, third Marquis of, lans'-doun. He was son of the Earl of Shelburne, who was prime minister in 1782. After receiving a preliminary course of education at Westminster school, he went, in 1795, to study under Dugald Stewart, at Edinburgh, where he formed the acquaintance of a small circle of young men, who formed the celebrated Speculative Society, in which Brougham, Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Horner, and others, first practised the art of debate. From Edinburgh he went to Cambridge, in 1801, and, after a continental tour, entered the House of Commons for Calne. As Lord Henry Petty he became a prominent member of the Whig party, and, on the death of Mr. Pitt, and the accession of the Whigs to power, he became chancellor of the Exchequer, and followed Pitt in the representation of the university of Cambridge. He succeeded to the peerage as marquis of Lansdowne, in 1809. In both houses of parliament he was a stanch advocate of the abolition of slavery, and some of his best oratorical efforts were made in furtherance of the repeal of the penal laws against Roman Catholics. In 1820 he proposed a measure in favour of the principle of free trade; in 1822 he sought to obtain an inquiry into the suffering condition of Ireland. After an eighteen years' retirement from office, he became secretary of state for the Home department, under the premiership of George Canning, in 1828. He was in opposition during the Wellington administration of 1829-31, but, on becoming president of the Council in the latter year, he was an active participator in the measures taken to pass the Reform Act. He was the opposition leader of the House of Lords during Sir Robert Peel's rule, which commenced in 1841, and when his own party returned to power under Lord John Russell, in 1846, he again took office as President of the Council, once more led the peers from the ministerial benches. He resigned office with Lord John Russell in 1852, but had a seat without office in the ministry of the Earl of Aberdeen, and in the first administration of Lord Palmerston. He had a great taste for literature and the arts; his high personal character ensured him friends of all parties, and for several years he was the trusted friend and adviser of the Queen.

Born in London, 1780; died at Bowood, Wiltshire, 1863.

LANSING, lan'-sing, the capital of Michigan, United States, in Ingham county, on the Grand River, 110 miles N.W. of Detroit. There are a very handsome new state-house, 12 churches, college for females, and state agricultural college with model farm. Pop. 7,500.

LANSINGBURGH, a town of New York, United States, on the left bank of the Hudson, 10 miles N.E. of Albany. Manf. Copper, iron, rifles, floorcloth, brushes, and malt. Pop. 7,000.

LANTIER, ÉTIENNE FRANÇOIS DE, lan'-tē-ai, a French author, who produced some celebrated works of fictitious travel, similar to Barthélemy's "Anacharsis," but in no way copied from it. These were entitled "The Travels of Antenor," "The Travellers in Switzerland," and "Travels in Spain." He also wrote some comedies, and other works.

Born at Marseilles, 1734; died 1826.

LANUSEI, la-noo'-sa-e, a town of the island of Sardinia, 30 miles N.E. of Cagliari. Pop. 2,300.

LANZA, GIOVANNI, lan'-za, Italian statesman. He was a member of the Sardinian chamber in 1848, minister of education in 1855, and of finance in 1858. He was afterwards several times president of the Sardinian chamber and the Italian parliament. In 1864-5 he was minister of the interior, and in 1869 he became prime minister, and the transfer of the capital to Rome took place under his administration. He resigned 1873.

Born at Vignole, 1815.

LANZAROTE, lan'-za-ro'-tai, the most N.E. of the Canary Isles. It is volcanic and fertile, yielding fine fruits, barilla, and orchil. There are several mountains, the loftiest of which, Montana Blanca, has an altitude of 2,000 feet. The volcano Temanfay has had several disastrous eruptions. Area, 324 square miles. Pop. 17,500.

LANZI, LUIGI, lan'-se, an Italian archæologist and writer on art. He entered the order of Jesuits at the age of 17, but on the suppression of the order, he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He was appointed keeper of the cabinet of medals at Florence in 1775, and thenceforth produced works on archæology and art, some of which have since been translated into every European language. His "History of the Painters" was translated by Thomas Roscoe. He composed many other works, the chief of which were "Saggio di Lingua Etrusca," and others on the ancient Etruscan vases. He was also a graceful poet.

Born near Macerata, 1732; died at Florence, 1810.

LANZO, lant'-zo, a town of Northern Italy, on the right bank of the Tesco, and the left bank of the Stura, 18 miles N.W. of Turin. There is an ancient and lofty bridge. Pop. 2,400.

LAOCOON, lai-ok'-o-on, in Greek legend, prince of the royal family of Troy, was grand-priest of Apollo. While sacrificing a bullock to Neptune, two enormous serpents issued from the sea, and attacked his two sons; and, on his attempting to defend them, the serpents seized him and squeezed him to death. This punishment was said to be inflicted for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans from allowing the wooden horse of the Greeks to enter the city, and also for hurling a javelin at its sides, as it entered within the walls. The marble group depicting the struggle with the serpents, discovered in 1506, on the side of the Esquiline Hill at Rome, and now at the Vatican, is one of the most famous pieces of sculpture in the world.

LAODICEA, lai'-o-di-se'-a, a city of ancient Phrygia, in Asia Minor. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, rebuilt by the Turks in 1255, and again destroyed in 1402. The site is now occupied by a ruinous village, Eski-Hissar. It was a place of considerable importance in connection with the early Christian Church, and councils were held there in 363 and 476.

LAOMEDON, lai-om'-e-don, in Greek legend, son of Ilus, king of Troy, and father to Priam and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, assisted by Apollo and Neptune. When the walls were finished, Laomedon refused to reward the labours of the gods, and, soon after, his territories were laid waste by the sea, and his subjects visited by a pestilence. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but nothing could appease the gods, according to the oracle, but annually to expose to a sea monster a Trojan virgin. This victim was decided by lot, and when the calamity had continued for five or six years, the lot fell upon Hesione, Laomedon's daughter; but Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this calamity, if Laomedon would reward him with a number of fine horses. The king consented; but when the monster was destroyed, he refused to give them. Hercules was obliged to besiege Troy, and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of twenty-nine years, and his son Priam placed upon the throne.

LAON, la-one', a town of France, capital of the department Aisne, 80 miles N.E. of Paris. Its cathedral is a large and stately Gothic building, with lofty towers. It has, besides, a prefecture, with a library, a town-hall, citadel, barracks, theatre, a leaning tower, college, workhouse, and various schools. The town is surrounded with walls flanked with towers. Manf. Coarse cloth, hosiery, leather, nails, and earthenware. In its neighbourhood are some vineyards. Pop. 8,600. Here, in 1814, a great battle was fought between the allies, under Blucher and Napoleon I., in which the latter was defeated.

LAOS, or LAO, la'-os, a country of South-eastern Asia, the limits of which are not accurately known, but are generally considered to be lat. 15° 24' N.; lon. 97° 47'—106° E., and bounded N. by Yunnan, S. by Siam and Tenasserim, E. by Anam, and W. by Burmah. There are extensive mountain ranges, with alluvial plains between, which are subject to inundations. The chief rivers are the Mekon, Manlon, and Mekam. Minerals.—Gold, silver, iron, copper, tin and lead, rubies and emeralds. A considerable trade is carried on with Siam, Burmah, and China. Lanchang is the capital. Pop. Unascertained.

LAOU-TZE, or LAO-TSEU, la-o-tse', a Chinese philosopher, who lived a short time before Confucius. He held the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, like Pythagoras. (See PYTHAGORAS.) He wrote a book which the Chinese place among the number of their sacred works, and founded a sect called Tao-tse, which rivals that of Confucius. The Chinese legend is that at the age of 119, he mounted to heaven on a black buffalo. M. Stanislas Julien published a complete edition of his writings at Paris, 1841.

Born 600 B.C.; died about 523 B.C.

LAPARELLI, FRANCIS, la-pa-rel'-le, an eminent Italian architect and mechanician. His knowledge of the art of military engineering recommended him to Cosmo I., grand-duke of Tuscany, and Pope Pius IV. intrusted him with the construction of the defensive works of Civita-Vecchia, which place he strongly fortified. Michael Angelo confided to him the execution of his designs for the church of St. Peter. In 1565 he was sent to fortify Malta against the attempts of Solyman, and there planned the city of Valetta. He afterwards engaged in the service of the Venetians.

Born at Crotona, 1521; died of the plague, at Candia, 1570.

LA PAZ, la-pas', the capital of Lower California, on a bay in the Gulf of California. It is well built, in a fertile valley, and has a cathedral, bishop's palace, town-house, and other good public buildings. The harbour is good, and a considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 10,000.

LA PAZ, a department of the republic of Bolivia, bordering on Peru, South America. The surface is extremely diversified, comprising some of the loftiest mountains and deepest valleys on the American continent. Various streams rising in the mountain ranges combine to form the Rio Beni, one of the principal affluents of the Amazon. The soil is very fertile, producing fine timber, cereals, tropical fruits, cotton, indigo, sugar, coffee, cacao, coca, and various species of potato. Cattle, sheep, horses, mules, and pigs are bred extensively. Alpacas and llamas are abundant. Among the wild animals are jaguars, pumas, foxes, monkeys, and the destructive Vampire bat. Minerals. Copper, of which there are important mines, gold, and silver. Area, 43,051 square miles. Pop. 447,822.

LA PAZ DE AYACUCHO, capital of the above department, situated 13,000 feet above the sea level, in a deep valley formed by the river Chuquiapo, which is crossed by nine handsome bridges. There are a very fine cathedral, 13 other churches, a monastery, a university, a very fine promenade, and a beautifully laid-out cemetery. This city is the chief commercial emporium of the republic. The principal trade consists in the traffic in coca leaves, and the export of copper. Pop. 26,000. Lat. 16° 30′ S. Lon. 68° 30′ W.—The city was founded in 1548 by Alonzo de Mendoza. The present name was given in 1825 to commemorate the great battle fought in the plain of Ayacucho, which was decisive of Bolivian independence.

LAPEER, la-peer′, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 828 square miles. Pop. 30,000. The capital is Lapeer.

LA PEROUSE, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE GALAUP, Count de, pe-roose′, a celebrated French navigator, who, after serving as captain in the French navy with much distinction, was sent by Louis XVI., in 1785, on a voyage of discovery. He sailed with two frigates from Brest, and visited the coasts of Tartary, of Japan, and of New Holland, when, in 1788, he ceased to be heard of. Several expeditions were dispatched to discover traces of him, but in vain. In 1827, however, the wreck of his vessels was observed by Captain Dillon of the Vanikoro islands. In 1828, a French captain visited the place, and discovered that La Perouse and his men had been wrecked among the reefs surrounding the island.

Born in France, 1741; died probably, 1788.

LAPIO, la′-pe-o, a town of Italy, province of Principato Ulteriore, 14 miles N.W. of St. Angelo dei Lombardi. Pop. 2,400.

LAPLACE, PIERRE SIMON, Marquis de, la-plass′, a celebrated French mathematician and astronomer. As early as his nineteenth year he taught mathematics in a military school. He obtained letters of introduction to the celebrated philosopher D'Alembert, and went to Paris with the view of seeking an interview with him; but, finding no notice taken of his letters, he wrote a short paper on some points of mechanical philosophy which immediately procured for him the attention to his claims that he desired. D'Alembert sent for him, and, about 1769, had him appointed professor of mathematics at the Paris Military School. By his treatises, memoirs, and larger works, Laplace rapidly obtained the reputation of being the greatest living mathematician since Newton. Napoleon, when first consul, appointed him minister of the interior; but, as a politician, he was very unsuccessful, and he was in a short time removed to the presidentship of the Sénat Conservateur. He was created a count by Napoleon. In 1814 he voted for the deposition of the Emperor and the restoration of the Bourbons; and, after the second restoration, was created a marquis by Louis XVIII. His principal works were the "Mécanique Céleste," "Analytical Theory of Probabilities," and an "Essay on Probabilities." He also wrote on mechanics, heat, and electricity. A complete edition of his writings was published by the French government in 1843. It is quite impossible, in any short notice of the life of Laplace, to convey a proper idea of the extent and value of the great "Mécanique Céleste." That inestimable contribution to science contained 4,000 quarto pages; and, it is said, might easily be expanded to thrice that number. The intention of the work was to deduce, from the discoveries of the great astronomers who had preceded Laplace, a complete and harmonious system, and to perfect the marvellous work commenced by Newton, in his discovery of the law of gravitation. He subsequently wrote his "Exposition du Système du Monde," as an explanation of what was abstruse in his "Mécanique."

Born at Beaumont-en-Auge, 1749; died at Paris, 1827.

LAPLAND, lap′-land, the northernmost part of Europe, occupying the north and north-eastern portions of the Scandinavian peninsula, bounded N. by the Arctic Ocean, E. by the White Sea, S. by Sweden, and W. by Norway and the Atlantic. It belongs partly to Russia and partly to Sweden and Norway. The name given by the natives is Sameanda, or Somellada. It is about 700 miles long, from Cape Orlov, on the White Sea, to the entrance of Saltersfiord, on the Atlantic; and about 550 broad. The part of Lapland lying along the N. shore of the Gulf of Bothnia, consists of an extensive plain, abounding in immense forests of birch, spruce, pine, and Scotch fir; but, at the distance of 80 miles from that sea, the ground becomes gradually elevated, till at length it rises to lofty mountains, attaining a height of from 5,500 to 6,200 feet, which, in this region, is 2,700 feet above the line of perpetual congelation. These central mountains are the highest in Lapland. In the maritime districts, the temperature approaches uniformity, and, whilst the winters are not severe, the summers are raw and foggy. In the interior, the winter is intensely cold, but the heat of summer is steady and fructifying. The mean annual temperature at the North Cape (lat. 71° 11′ 30″) is 6° higher than at Enontekis, in the interior, in lat. 68° 30′. Yet, at the latter, the thermometer rises in July to 64°, while at the Cape it seldom reaches 50°.

Rivers.—The principal are the Torneå, the Kalix, the Lulea, and the Kola. The Tana, the principal river in the N.E., and the Alten, the principal in the N.W., both run into the Northern Ocean. There are numerous lakes, particularly in its mountainous part.

Zoology.—Hares, bears, martens, gluttons, beavers, otters, ermines, squirrels, lemings or mountain rats, foxes, and wolves: hares are the most abundant. The domestic quadrupeds are oxen, cows, dogs, sheep, and goats. The reindeer is the most valuable animal in Lapland: it serves as the principal beast of burden, its milk is highly valued, and its flesh supplies the chief nourishment of the inhabitants.

Pro.—Barley or big is the most common grain. In the low ground, rye is likewise cultivated, and occasionally oats. The berry-bearing plants also are numerous.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, zinc, and arsenic.

Area.—88,400 square miles, divided as follows:—Swedish, 50,600; Norwegian, 26,500; Russian, 11,300. These estimates are approximate.

Pop.—Russian Lapland, 9,000; Norwegian, 5,560; Swedish, 4,500; total, 19,000. These numbers are only approximate, accurate information being unattainable. Many Russians, Swedes, Norwegians, and Finns, resident in the country, bring up the population to about 50,000. The Lapps, or Laplanders, or, as they name themselves, Sami, or Sahmelads, are divided into the agricultural and seafaring classes—the Soelappen and the Boelappen. They are short of stature, with low forehead, high cheek bones, and pointed chin. Though of poor physical development, they are not particularly deficient in mental capacity, and many who have received the advantage of systematic education have made great progress. They generally profess the religion of the country to which they belong — the Swedish and Norwegian Lapps nominally belonging to the Lutheran, and the Russians to the Greek church; but they retain many of the old superstitions of the race. The mountain Lapps have no fixed habitation, but wander about in quest of food for their flocks of reindeer, and lodge in tents or huts, which are usually about nine feet in height and twelve in length. Their diet consists chiefly of animal food. During winter, they carry on some traffic with the Swedes. This takes place at Tornea, and other towns on the Gulf of Bothnia, and consists in exchanging skins, furs, dried fish, venison, and gloves for flannel, cloth, hemp, copper, iron, and various utensils; but particularly for spirituous liquors, meal, salt, and tobacco.

LA PLATA. (See PLATA.)

LA PLATA, a new county of Colorado, United States. Area, 7,000 square miles. Valuable gold mines have recently been discovered. Pop. Fluctuating and unascertained. The chief place is Howardsville.

LA PORTE, la-port', a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 31,000. The capital is La Porte.

LA PORTE, capital of the above county in the north-west of Indiana, 12 miles from Lake Michigan. It is situated at the junction of several railways, and a considerable trade is carried on. There are 11 churches and a medical college. Manf. Iron and machinery. Pop. 7,000.

LAPPENBERG, JOHANN MARTIN, lap'-pen-bairg, German historian. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards law and history at Berlin and Gottingen. He was the representative of Hamburg at Berlin in 1820; and in 1850 was the chosen representative of the diet of Frankfort. In 1823 he was appointed archivist to the Hamburg Senate, and entered on the historical researches which he pursued throughout his life. He especially studied the history of England, and produced elaborate and most valuable works on the history of the country under the Anglo-Saxon and Norman kings, besides works on German history, particularly in relation to the free towns of Hamburg and Bremen.

Born at Hamburg, 1794; died 1865.

LAPRAIRIE, la-prair'-e, a county of Quebec province, Canada, to the south of the St. Lawrence river, and opposite the island of Montreal. Area, 173 square miles. Pop. 12,000, nearly all of French descent, the remainder chiefly Indians.

LA PUEBLA, otherwise PUEBLA, which see.

LAR, lar, the capital of Laristan, in Persia, now in a state of ruins, 180 miles S.E. of Shiraz. It was formerly the capital of an Arabian kingdom. The bazaar is the finest in Persia. Manf. Cotton fabrics, gunpowder, and arms. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 27° 30′ N. Lon. 53° 58′ E.

LARACHE. (See EL-ARAISCH.)

LARANJEIRAS, la-ran-hai'-ras, a town of Brazil, province Sergipe, on the left bank of the Cotindeba, 15 miles from the Atlantic. There is a harbour accessible to small vessels. Pop. 2,000.

LARCHER, PIERRE HENRY, lar'-shai, a learned French writer, chiefly remarkable for his excellent translation of the Greek historian Herodotus, with notes. He had a controversy with Voltaire respecting the "Philosophy of History," by the latter. In 1809 he was appointed professor of Greek literature at the College of France.

Born at Dijon, 1726; died at Paris, 1812.

LARDNER, NATHANIEL, DR., lard'-ner, a learned English dissenting divine. After receiving his academical education at London, he went to Utrecht, and thence to Leyden, and, in 1703, returned to England. Soon afterwards he became tutor to the son of Lady Treby, in which situation he continued until her ladyship's death, in 1721. In 1729 he became pastor of a congregation in Crutched Friars. He wrote an answer to Woolston on the Miracles, a "Letter on the Logos," and the "Credibility of the Gospel History," a work admirably executed. His writings abound in critical elucidations of the Scripture and early ecclesiastical history, evincing profound learning and intense application.

Born at Hawkhurst, Kent, 1684; died 1768.

LARDNER, DIONYSIUS, DR., a modern writer on physical science. He was the son of a Dublin attorney, and, after receiving some education at school, was placed in his father's office. Evincing, however, a decided distaste for the profession of the law, he was entered at Trinity College, Dublin, and soon began to devote himself to scientific pursuits, gaining a great number of prizes in pure astronomy, in natural philosophy, and other branches of study. In 1817 he obtained a B.A. degree, and, during the ten following years, remained at the university, publishing, at first, treatises on mathematics, and subsequently on the steam-engine. He likewise delivered a course of lectures on the latter subject at the Royal Dublin Society, for which he received the gold medal of the society. His reputation being in a great measure established, he began to contribute to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia," and the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," for which he wrote elaborate treatises on pure mathematics as well as on the applied sciences. In 1828, on the establishment of the London University, he was appointed to the chair of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy, and, removing to London, set on foot a scheme for a cabinet Cyclopædia, which he gradually perfected, obtaining the co-operation of many eminent men. Sir John Herschel wrote for the series a "Preliminary Discourse upon Natural Philosophy," and a "Treatise on Astronomy;" but most of the scientific works were due to Dr. Lardner himself. In 1840 he went to the United States, where he delivered, with considerable success, a course of lectures, which were afterwards several times reprinted. He subsequently devoted much time to railway economy, and wrote a good deal on that and other subjects. In 1854 he started his last important work, the "Museum of Science and Art." He possessed a remarkable talent for the popular exposition of science.

Born at Dublin, 1793; died at Naples, 1859.

LAREDO, la-rai'-do, a town and port of Spain, province of Santander, on the Bay of Biscay, 20 miles E. of Santander. It is fortified, has numerous churches, a town-house, custom-house, and other good public buildings. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, chocolate, casks, and fish hooks. Pop. 3,200.

LARGENTIÈRE, lar'-gen-te-aire, a town of France, department Ardèche, on the Ligne, 20 miles S.W. of Privas. There is a Gothic church of great elegance. The name of the town is derived from the silver mines formerly worked in the vicinity. Manf. Silk and leather. Pop. 3,000.

LARGS, largs, a seaport town and watering place of Ayrshire, Scotland, on the Firth of Clyde, 18 miles below Greenock. Pop. Resident, 5,149; in the summer there are many visitors.—Here, in 1263, Alexander III. gained a victory over Haco V., king of Norway.

LARIMER, la'-re-mer, a county of Colorado, United States. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 1,000. The chief town is Laporte.

LARISSA, or YENITSCHIR, la-ris'-sa, a district of Thessaly, forming part of Greece. Also the name of the capital of Thessaly, formerly described as with narrow streets, dirty and wretched houses characteristic of Turkey, with its mosques and minarets. Though diminished in population it is probably improved. Noted for fabrics dyed with Turkey red. Pop. of the district, 145,706; of the town, 13,169.

LARISTAN, la-ris-tan', a maritime province of Persia, extending along the northern coast of the Persian Gulf, and the Gulf of Oman. It is mostly a sandy waste, interspersed with salt steppes, but there are fertile tracts in the northern parts. Silk, camels, and salt, are the principal products. Pop. Unascertained, and chiefly consisting of wandering tribes.

LARKHANA, lark-ha'-na, a town of Sinde, capital of a district of its own name, 145 miles N. of Hyderabad. Manf. Silk and cotton. The largest corn market in the country is held here. Pop. 12,000.

LARNE, larn, a market-town, seaport, and watering-place of Ireland, on the northern shore of Loch Larne, 18 miles N.E. of Belfast. Vessels cannot approach within a mile of the town. Manf. Linen. There is a trade in coal, timber, and slate. Pop. 2,766.

LARNICA, or LARNACA, lar-ne'-ca, a town on the south coast of the island of Cyprus, 25 miles S.E. of Nicosia. It consists of an upper and lower town, separated by gardens and enclosures, in which are remains of the ancient Cithium. In the upper town are a cathedral and a convent. There is a small trade carried on with Egypt, Malta, and Smyrna. Pop. 10,000.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, FRANÇOIS, Duke de, rosh'-foo-kolte, a celebrated French author and statesman. He was at first known as the prince de Marillac, and signalized himself on various occasions by his courage; but was chiefly remarkable for his knowledge of mankind, and for his intriguing spirit. Smitten with the duchess de Longueville, he, to please her, joined the ranks of the Fronde, and entered into intrigues against Richelieu, but being afterwards restored to favour, was appointed, in 1661, chevalier of the king's commands, and next, governor of Poitou. He spent his old age in the society of Madame de la Fayette and Madame de Sévigné. He wrote "Memoirs of the Reign of Anne of Austria," and a book of maxims, first printed in 1665, under the title of "Reflections, or Sentences, and Moral Maxims." This little work has made the author celebrated as much by the perfection of its style as by the boldness of its paradoxes. According to it, self-love is the sole motive of all human actions, which was an opinion sufficiently natural with a man who had dwelt all his life at court. An egotist, an intriguer, and loose liver, Rochefoucauld had only too frequently given practical effect to his own maxims.

Born at Paris, 1613; died 1680.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD-LIANCOURT, FRANÇOIS ALEXANDRE FRÉDÉRIC, Duke de, was grand-master of the wardrobe to Louis XV. and Louis XVI., and in 1789 deputy to the States-general. Although attached to the king, he showed himself zealous for the well-being of the people. He took part in the recall of Necker, after the fall of the Bastille. Named military commandant at Rouen after the closing of the Assembly, he offered an asylum to Louis XVI. Deprived of his rank in 1782, he lived for some time in England in great poverty, but having recovered some of his property, visited the United States. He returned to France after the 18th Brumaire (November 9th, 1799), and devoted himself to philanthropic enterprises, established manufactures, founded a school of art and science, and materially contributed to the introduction of vaccination throughout his native country. Napoleon created him a duke in 1809. He entered the Chamber of Peers in 1814; but his liberal opinions subsequently brought him under the displeasure of Charles X., whereupon he occupied himself with his philanthropic schemes, among others the establishment of the first savings bank in France. He was long known under the name of Liancourt only, but added to it that of Rochefoucauld upon the death of his cousin. He wrote, among other works, "The Prisons of Philadelphia," and "Travels in the United States."

Born 1747; died 1827.

LA ROCHEJAQUELEIN, HENRI DE, rosh-zhak'-la, a famous Vendean chieftain (previously an officer in the guard of Louis XVI.), who commanded at the battle of Fontenay in 1793, and preserved the Vendeans from total rout at the battle of Luçon. He likewise took part in the disastrous engagement at Chollet. On the death of Lescaire, he was, although only 22 years of age, proclaimed general-in-chief. He twice combated the republican troops near Antrain, and took possession of Laval, La Flèche, and Le Mans. Driven from the last city, he crossed the Loire, and intrenched himself in the forest of Vézin. He was slain in an engagement at Nouaillé.

Born 1772; died 1794.

LA ROCHEJAQUELEIN, LOUIS DE VERGER, younger brother of the preceding. At the outbreak of the Revolution he emigrated, but returned to France in 1801; he refused to take any office under Napoleon, and in 1813 took the command of the Royalists in La Vendée. In the following year he maintained the royal cause there, supported by the British. He was killed at the battle of Pont-des-Mathis. His wife published an interesting and valuable history of the war in La Vendée.

Born 1777; died 1815.

LARREY, DOMINIQUE JEAN, Baron, lar'-rai, a celebrated French surgeon. After completing his education under his uncle, and at the hospital of Toulouse, he repaired to Paris, where he obtained employment as naval surgeon. In that capacity he visited North America; but returning to Paris at the outbreak of the Revolution, he joined the French army of the Rhine in 1792. He first attracted the notice of his superiors by his invention of "flying ambulances," which enabled the wounded to be carried off the field, even under a warm fire. He first met Napoleon at the siege of Toulon, where the future emperor was at the time acting as lieutenant of artillery. After filling, for some time, the functions of professor of military surgery, he, in 1798, went with the French expeditionary army to Egypt, and on his return published his "Historical and Surgical Account of the Army of the East in Egypt and Syria." This work was written in 1803, and from that time Larrey's rise was very rapid. In 1805 he was placed at the head of the medico-surgical department of the French army, till, in 1812, he became baron of the empire, and surgeon-in-chief. His numerous papers attest his profound theoretical knowledge, while his many bold and successful operations, conducted during Napoleon's wars, have established his fame as one of the first of modern surgeons. He was wounded and taken prisoner at Waterloo, and lost his rank and pension. The latter was restored in 1818, and he held several important medical offices. In 1842 he was appointed inspector of the military hospitals in Algeria. He was the author of various important works on surgery.

Born at Baudeau, 1766; died at Lyons, 1841.

LA RUE, la-roo', a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 182 square miles. Pop. 9,793. The capital is Hodgenville.

LA SALLE, Count de, la-sal', a gallant soldier, who began his career, with the rank of officer, at eleven years of age, under Prince Maximilian, subsequently king of Bavaria, and, from his high birth and connexions, might have risen to the most prominent position; but he preferred to owe his promotion to merit alone, and accordingly threw up his commission, enlisted as a private soldier, and at length attained, after eight years' arduous and dangerous service, the same rank he had resigned. He distinguished himself in Egypt, and defeated the Prussians on the walls of Königsberg, and finally fell, in the midst of victory, on the field of Wagram.

Born at Metz, 1775; killed, 1809.

LA SALLE, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 1,050 square miles. Pop. 70,000. The capital is Ottawa.

LA SALLE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 789.

LA SALLE, a city of Illinois, United States, 110 miles N.E. of Springfield, at the junction of several lines of railway. The Illinois river is crossed by a railway bridge of 20 arches. There are coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 8,200.

LAS ANIMAS, las-an'-e-mas, a county of Colorado, United States. Area, 9,000 square miles. Pop. 4,500, chiefly Mexicans. The capital is Trinidad.

LASCARIS, THEODORE, las-kar'-is, emperor of Nicea, was the son-in-law of the emperor Alexius Angelus. After the taking of Constantinople by the Crusaders, in 1204, he formed in Asia Minor a new kingdom, comprising Bithynia, Lydia, and Phrygia, of which Nicea was the capital. He combated simultaneously his father-in-law, Alexis, and the sultan of Iconium; but nevertheless maintained his throne until his death.

Born 1175; died 1222.

LASCARIS, CONSTANTINE, a learned Greek, descended from the imperial Greek family of that name, who went to Italy on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453. He was patronized and employed by Sforza, duke of Milan, and by Cardinal Bessarion, settled at Messina, where he taught Greek with reputation, and had a number of scholars. He wrote a Greek grammar, and other works, and left a valuable library, now in the Escurial.

Died 1493.

LASCARIS, JOHN JANUS, surnamed "Rhyndacenus," a learned Greek, of the same family as the preceding, who was employed by Lorenzo de' Medici to collect books in Greece. On his return he was invited to France by Louis XII., who appointed him ambassador to Venice. When Leo X. ascended the papal chair, Lascaris went to Rome, and became director of the Greek college, and superintendent of the Greek press. He revived the use of the capital letters of the Greek alphabet, and wrote epigrams in that language.

Born about 1445; died 1535.

LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE, las-kas'-as, Spanish missionary bishop. He studied at Salamanca, and in 1502 went to San Domingo, where he was ordained priest, and was afterwards appointed to a charge in Cuba. He exerted himself strenuously in favour of the native population, who were cruelly oppressed by the white conquerors, and induced Cardinal Ximenes to send out a commission of inquiry. He advocated the employment of negroes, instead of the western Indians, in the mines, and for that reason has been reproached unjustly as the originator of the slave trade in the West Indies. He afterwards tried to organize a system of emigration for Castilian peasants, but failed. In 1539 he returned to Spain, and published a work on the destruction of the Indian races, which attracted considerable attention. He accepted the bishopric of Chiapa, but the planters were hostile to him, on account of his advocacy of the rights of the natives, and the church supported the planters. He returned to Spain, and passed the remainder of his life in a convent at Madrid. In the course of his life he crossed the Atlantic 16 times. His best known work is a "General History of the Indies."

Born in Seville, 1474; died in Madrid, 1566.

LAS CASES, EMMANUEL AUGUSTE DIEUDONNÉ, Count, la-kas'-ai, is supposed to have been of the same family as the preceding. At the outbreak of the French Revolution, in 1789, he was a lieutenant in the navy. He then emigrated, joined the army of Condé, afterwards spent some time in England as a private teacher, and took part in the expedition to Quiberon, but returned to France after the 18th Brumaire. Having been long engaged in literary pursuits, he now published under the name of Le Sage, an "Atlas Historique, Chronologique, et Géographique," which went through several editions. In 1809 he enrolled himself as a volunteer to resist the British attack upon Flushing: and from this time attracted the attention of Bonaparte, who soon afterwards made him his chamberlain, created him a member of the council of state, and intrusted him with various confidential missions. In 1814 Las Cases refused to vote in the council of state for the dethronement of the emperor, took up arms for him after his return from Elba in 1815, and was one of the four attendants who accompanied him to St. Helena. There he lived eighteen months with the ex-emperor, enjoying his intimacy, and noting down all that he said in a journal, subsequently published under the title of "Mémorial de Sainte Hélene." Having, however, become an object of suspicion to Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor, he was seized, and conveyed first to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to England as a prisoner, and was not permitted to return to France till after Bonaparte's death. He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1830, and acted with the opposition.

Born 1766; died 1842.

LASCY, PETER, Count de, las'-se, a native of Ireland, who, after the conquest of that country by William III., entered the French service, and was subsequently an officer in the Austrian, Polish, and Russian armies, in the latter of which he rose to the rank of field-marshal, and was appointed governor of Lithuania.

Born 1678; died 1751.

LASCY, JOSEPH FRANCIS MAURICE, Count de, son of the preceding, entered the Austrian service, and obtained the rank of general, after having exhibited considerable military ability at the battles of Lowositz, Breslau, and Hochkirchen. In 1760 he penetrated to Berlin, at the head of 15,000 men; for which bold exploit he was made a commander of the order of Maria Theresa, and in 1762 received the baton of marshal. He was employed against the Turks in 1788, and remained in active service under the emperor Joseph II., during great part of the remainder of his life.

Born at St. Petersburg, 1725; died 1801.

LAS PALMAS, las-pal'-mas, an episcopal town on the east coast of the island of Gran Canaria, and chief town of the Canary Islands. It is large and well built. Pop. 17,500.

LASSA. (See H'LASSA.)

LASSAY, las-sai', a town of France, department Mayenne, 25 miles N. of Lavel. There is an old castle, which was besieged by William the Conqueror, in 1034. There is a trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,300.

LASSEN, CHRISTIAN, las'-sen, oriental scholar. He was a native of Norway, and studied at Christiania, Heidelberg, and Bonn, becoming, in 1830, professor at the latter university of ancient Indian languages and literature. He has edited a large number of Sanscrit works, and written on cuneiform inscriptions and modern dialects.

Born at Bergen, 1800.

LASSEN, a county of California, United States. Area, 4,932 square miles. Pop. 3,500. The capital is Susanville.

L'ASSOMPTION, a county of Quebec province, Canada, on the N.W. of the St. Lawrence. Area, 248 square miles. Pop. 15,500, nearly all of French descent. Capital, L'Assomption.

LASTRA, las'-tra, a town of northern Italy, on the W. bank of the Arno, 7 miles W. of Florence. It is an ancient town, and some portions of the old wall remain. Manf. Straw hats. There is a trade in wine, oil, and corn. Pop. 10,692.

LATAKIA, or LATAKIEH, la-ta-ke'-a, a seaport of Syria, in the pashalic of Tripoli, 75 miles N. of Tripoli. It consists of an old and new town, but has greatly fallen into decay. In 1822 an earthquake reduced a great part of the new town to ruins. It has a trade in tobacco grown in the vicinity, for which it is famous; cotton, wax, sponge, and scammony. Pop. 7,000. It is the ancient Laodicea ad Mare. The ruins of an aqueduct built by Herod the Great are still extant.

LATHAM, ROBERT GORDON, lai'-tham, an eminent modern philologist and ethnologist. His education was received at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where, in 1833, he took the degree of B.A. He afterwards became fellow of his college, and took the M.D. degree. He displayed, even from the outset of his career, a profound acquaintance not only with the classical but also with the European languages. On being appointed professor of English literature at University College, shortly after its establishment, he commenced the publication of a series of works which have entitled him to the foremost place as a philosophical investigator of the English language. The chief of these works is his "English Language;" but he has followed up the subject with his "History and Etymology of the English Language," and other smaller works. He has recently completed a new edition of Johnson's Dictionary. As an ethnologist he has laboured with distinguished success; the "Varieties of Mankind," "Ethnology of the British Colonies," "Ethnology of Europe," and "Man and his Migrations," having thrown immense light upon the relations between the languages and the races of mankind. Although he has ceased to fulfil the active duties of the medical profession, Dr. Latham has held many important appointments in connection therewith; he is fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and has officiated as assistant physician of Middlesex Hospital. The ethnological department of the Crystal Palace was arranged by him; and, besides being vice-president of the Ethnological Society, he is a member of many learned societies, both on the continent of Europe and in America.

Born at Billingborough, Lincolnshire, 1812.

LATIMER, HUGH, lat'-i-mer, an English prelate and martyr. He received his education at Cambridge, where, at the beginning of the Reformation, he was very zealous for popery; but, on conversing with Bilney, the martyr, he renounced the Romish tenets, and became as ardent on the other side. He now laboured earnestly in preaching the gospel, and his fame reaching Henry VIII., he sent for him, and was so pleased with his discourses as to confer on him the bishopric of Worcester. He at once strongly advocated reforms in the church. But Latimer was no time-server; on the contrary, he expostulated with the king for his cruelties. He afterwards resigned his bishopric; and, on the fall of Lord Cromwell, his patron, he was sent to the Tower, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI., who would have restored him to his diocese, but he refused. He then resided with Cranmer, whom he assisted in framing the homilies, and in completing the work of reformation. When Mary came to the throne, he was committed to the Tower, whence he was sent, with Ridley and Cranmer, to Oxford, to hold a conference with some popish divines. In that dispute he conducted himself with remarkable clearness and simplicity; and when it was over, sentence was passed upon him and Ridley, who were burnt at the same stake, 1555. Latimer, after recommending his soul to God, thus cheered his brother sufferer: "We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out." His sermons have been often printed. They are characterized by earnest piety, vigorous and homely language, courage, cheerfulness, wit, and humour.

Born at Thurcasten, 1490; died at Oxford, 1555.

LATIN EMPIRE, a name given to that portion of the Byzantine empire which, in 1204, was erected into a separate empire, with Constantinople for the capital.

LATINI, la-te'-ne, an Italian people, who, at some remote period, established themselves near the lower course of the Tiber, between the sea and the Apennines. The chief towns were Laurentum, Lavinium, and Alba Longa.

LATONA, la-to'-na, in Greek mythology, a daughter of the Titan Cœus, celebrated for the favours which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband, sent the serpent Python to persecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra refused to give her a place where she might rest and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compassion, caused the island of Delos to rise out of the Ægean Sea; Latona there gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Juno obliged her to fly from Delos. After having wandered over the greatest part of the earth, and experienced the violence of Niobe and Tityus, she at length, though exposed to the resentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and saw her children receive divine honours. Her worship was generally established where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, and other places where she had temples.

LATOOKA, la-too'-ka, a country of Eastern Africa, occupying a valley between two lofty ranges of mountains. It is about 40 miles long and 18 wide. The inhabitants are a very fine race. The men train their hair into thick masses, which serve as helmets. The chief town is Tarrangellé. Lat. 4° 25′ N. Lon. 32° 40′ E.

LATOUCHE-TREVILLE, LOUIS DE, la-toosh' tre-veel', a French admiral. He became captain in 1780, and, during the wars between the English and French, signalized himself by many acts of bravery. In 1799—1801 he commanded the flotilla collected at Boulogne, ostensibly for the invasion of England.

Born at Rochefort, 1745; died at Toulon, 1805.

LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE. (See AUVERGNE.)

LATREILLE, PIERRE ANDRÉ, la-trail', a celebrated French naturalist. He studied for the church and received ordination, but, from his earliest years, he devoted himself to entomology, and ultimately became the most distinguished professor of that department of science in his native country. During the Revolution, he was arrested and condemned to deportation, and was actually in prison at Bordeaux, but he was saved by the interposition of some eminent naturalists. In 1797 he was again proscribed, but again escaped. He contributed treatises to the "Encyclopédie Méthodique," and to the Proceedings of many learned bodies. The entomological portion of the "Animal Kingdom" was written by him, although published under the name of Cuvier. He wrote a general history of insects for an edition of Buffon; "Genera Crustaceorum et Insectorum;" and "General Considerations on the Natural Order of Animals composing the classes Crustacea, Arachnides, and Insects." He was a chevalier of the Legion of Honour, a member of the Academy of Sciences, and correspondent of the Linnean Society of London.

Born at Brive, France, 1762; died at Paris, 1833.

LATUDE, HENRI MAZERS DE, la-tood', a Frenchman, who was confined in the Bastille and other prisons during 35 years. When about the age of 24, hoping to gain the patronage of Madame de Pompadour, mistress of Louis XV., he informed her of a plot against her life; but the intelligence proving to be an invention of his own, he was mercilessly condemned to the long incarceration he endured. He was released in 1784, and left behind his memoirs, containing many interesting details.

Born in Languedoc, 1725; died at Paris, 1805.

LAUBAN, or LUBAN, lou'-ban, a Prussian town in the province of Silesia, 40 miles S.W. of Liegnitz, on the Queis. Manf. Woollen, cotton, linen. Pop. 11,000.

LAUD, WILLIAM, lawd, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier at Reading, in Berkshire. He received his early education at the grammar-school of his native town. In 1589 he entered of St. John's College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow in 1593. His first preferment was the living of Stanford in Northamptonshire. In 1608 he took the degree of D.D., and became chaplain to Neill, bishop of Rochester. In 1611 he was elected president of his college, and, in 1616, preferred to the deanery of Gloucester by the king, one of whose chaplains in ordinary he had previously become. The year following he attended King James to Scotland. In 1620 he obtained a prebend of Westminster, and, a year afterwards, was made bishop of St. David's. In 1622 he held his celebrated conference with Fisher, the Jesuit, in presence of the marquis of Buckingham and his mother. At the coronation of Charles I. he officiated as dean of Westminster. In 1628 he was made bishop of London. In 1630 he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford. He succeeded Archbishop Abbot, in 1633, in the see of Canterbury. At this time he had reached the height of power, and was generally regarded as the prime minister of Charles I. Laud's statesmanship began with a fierce persecution of the Puritans. Alexander Leighton, for having published a book, entitled "Sion's Plea," was sentenced by the Star Chamber to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, and to be publicly whipped. Similar severities were subsequently practised upon Burton, Prynne, and others, for what Laud termed "libels against the hierarchy of the Church." He enforced ritualistic observances, with great strictness, forced Dutch and Walloon congregations to use the English liturgy, and all people to attend regularly the churches of the parishes in which they resided. He also attempted, but signally failed, to force episcopacy on the Scotch Church. The end of his intolerable reign speedily arrived, however; on the breaking out of the revolution, his palace was assaulted by the mob, and, in 1640, he was impeached by the House of Commons, and sent to the Tower, but not brought to trial till three years afterwards, when he ably defended his conduct. Though no treason was proved, the House of Commons passed an act of attainder against him, which the Lords were compelled to affirm, and he was beheaded on Tower Hill. In justice to Archbishop Laud, it must be said that he was a man of personal piety, and was possessed of considerable learning; while his benefactions to the university of Oxford prove him an ardent supporter of learning.

Born at Reading, 1573; died 1645.

LAUDER, law'-der, a royal and parliamentary burgh of Berwickshire, Scotland, on the Leader, 16 miles N.W. of Kelso. It was often the place of meeting for the parliament of Scotland, and has a town-house, several libraries, and schools. Pop. 1,200.

LAUDERDALE, law'-der-dail, anciently the western district of Berwickshire.

LAUDERDALE, JOHN MAITLAND, Duke of, one of the commissioners charged by the Covenanters to treat with Charles I. He subsequently fought under the royal standard; and, when Charles I. was beheaded, entered England with Charles II., but was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and thrown into prison, where he remained during nine years. Becoming prime minister in 1670, he retained power until 1682.

Born 1616; died 1682.

LAUDERDALE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 672 square miles. Pop. 21,500, one third being coloured. The capital is Florence.

LAUDERDALE, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 21,000, nearly half coloured. The capital is Marion.

LAUDERDALE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 15,000, nearly one third being coloured. The capital is Ripley.

LAUDOHN, or LOUDON, GIDEON ERNEST, lou'-done, an eminent German general, was of a noble family, which came originally from Scotland. In 1731 he entered the Russian service; but although he behaved with great gallantry, he only obtained a lieutenancy; on this he went into the Austrian service in 1742, and obtained a captain's commission. After the peace, in 1748, he was raised to the rank of major. At the beginning of the Seven Years' War, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Croats, and displayed brilliant military talents against the king of Prussia. In 1757 he was made major-general, and the year following invested with the military order of Maria Theresa. The same year was gained the great battle of Hochkirchen, the merit of which is generally attributed to Laudohn, who also gained the battle of Kunnersdorf, for which the empress Elizabeth of Russia presented him with a magnificent sword. He afterwards defeated the Prussians at Landshut, and took the town of Glatz. At the conclusion of the war, in 1763, he was rewarded with a pension and a barony. In 1766 he was nominated a member of the aulic council of war, and, in 1778, elevated to the dignity of field-marshal. In the Turkish war he served with additional reputation, and, in 1789, added Belgrade to the imperial dominions.

Born at Tootzen, 1716; died 1790.

LAUENBURG, or SAXE-LAUENBURG, lou'-en-boorg, a duchy of Prussia, on the right bank of the Elbe, adjacent to Hamburg, and formerly included in the dominions of Denmark. It is bounded on the N. by Lubeck, on the E. by Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the W. by Holstein, and on the S. by the Elbe. It is flat and sandy in the centre. The chief rivers are the Elbe, Trave, and the Stecknitz. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 50,000.

LAUZUN, ANTONIN NOMPAR DE CAUMONT, Duke de, lo'-zu(r)n, a celebrated favourite of Louis XIV. The French king had already appointed him governor of Berri and mareschal-de-camp, and promised him the grade of grand master of artillery; but the duke having been indiscreet enough to boast of the king's favour, the latter revoked his promise. Upon this the irritated Lauzun so far forgot himself as to break his sword before the king, declaring he would no longer serve a faithless monarch. He was thereupon incarcerated in the Bastille, but was released after a few days' confinement, restored to favour, and even promised the hand of the duchess de Montpensier, granddaughter of Henry IV. A court intrigue broke off the marriage, but, according to some, it was secretly contracted. To recompense him for this disappointment, Louis XIV., in 1671, gave him the command of the French army in Flanders. Lauzun, however, soon afterwards gave offence to Madame de Montespan, then all-powerful, and was suddenly disgraced and thrown into prison, where he remained for ten years. He went to London in 1688, and was entrusted by James II. with escorting the queen of England to France. He afterwards appeared at court, but never regained his former high position.

Born in France, about 1632; died 1723.

LAVACA, la-va'-ka, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 926 square miles. Pop. 13,641, about one third being coloured. The capital is Halletsville.

LAVAL, la'-val, a town of France, capital of the department Mayenne, on the Mayenne, 40 miles E. of Rennes. The principal edifices are the Gothic church of the Trinity, the church of the Cordeliers, with pillars of red and black marble, and a painted ceiling; two other churches, the remains of an old castle, town-hall, linen-hall, theatre, college, public library, hospitals, and schools. Many of the houses are of wood, and of great antiquity. There is an extensive suburb on the opposite side of the river, connected by a handsome stone bridge. Manf. Linen, for which it has been famous for 500 years, soap, and leather. This place suffered greatly in the Vendean war, towards the close of the last century. Pop. 30,000.

LAVAL, a county of Quebec province, Canada, at the mouth of the Ottawa river. Area, 85 square miles. Pop. 9,500, of French descent. Capital, Sainte Rose.

LA VALETTE, JEAN PARISOT DE, va'-let, forty-eighth grand master of the Knights of Malta, to which dignity he was elected in 1557. Under his command, Malta withstood the attacks of a force sent against it by Solyman II., consisting of 40,000 men and 200 vessels, during four months. He subsequently built the town called after his name, and rendered the island of Malta impregnable.

Born 1494; died 1568.

LA VALETTE. (See VALETTA.)

LA VALETTE, ANTOINE MARIE CHAMANS, Count de, French politician and general. He adhered to Louis XVI. until his death, and afterwards served under Napoleon, after whose fall, in 1815, he was condemned to death, but, aided by three Englishmen, escaped, his wife taking his place in the prison. In 1822 he was permitted to return to France. His "Memoirs" were published in 1831.

Born 1769; died 1830.

LA VALLIÈRE, FRANÇOISE LOUISE DE LABAUME LEBLANC DE, val'-ie-air, a mistress of Louis XIV. She was at first maid of honour to the duchess of Orleans, who was afterwards wife of Charles I., king of England. Mdlle. de la Vallière became the French king's mistress in 1661. She was granted vast possessions, and was created duchess. She was not beautiful, and was slightly lame, but had a sweetness of manner that was very attractive. Her feeble nature had something of the religious in its composition, and in a freak of remorse she twice took refuge in a convent, whence the king each time recalled her to court. At length, after being neglected by Louis for Madame de Montespan, she, in 1674, finally took refuge in a Carmelite convent, and there passed the remainder of her life in the exercise of an austere piety. She left behind some pious reflections on the forgiveness of God.

Born at Tours, 1644; died 1710.

LAVATER, JOHANN KASPAR, la-va'-ter, the author of the celebrated works on physiognomy. He was a Swiss divine, and became pastor of the church of St. Peter, at Zurich. He cultivated letters, and produced a variety of works, religious and poetical, besides his famous writings on physiognomy. About the age of 25, Lavater began to study the faces of those whom he met, and sought to discover a corresponding resemblance between their mind and features, and, after much observation, he endeavoured to raise physiognomy to the rank of a science, by producing his works, entitled "Essays on Physiognomy," and the "Art of knowing Mankind by Physiognomy." His books have been translated and reproduced in many forms, and are popular throughout the world. At first he hailed the French revolution with enthusiasm; but after the death of Louis XVI. his mind underwent a complete change, and when the French invaded Switzerland, Lavater preached against them, in the pulpit and in the public places. Massena stormed Zurich in 1799, and Lavater, while performing kind offices for his fellow townsmen, was fatally wounded by a grenadier, or, as some assert, by an assassin whom he knew, but whose name he would never divulge. Lavater was a pious man, of brilliant talents, mingled with a considerable share of mysticism.

Born at Zurich, 1741; died 1801.

LAVAUR, la-vore', a town of France, department of Tarn, on the left bank of the Agout, 22 miles N.E. of Toulouse. Manf. Silks, damasks, serges, and hosiery. Pop. 4,500.—In the 13th century this was the stronghold of the Albigenses.

LAVELLO, la-vel'-lo, an episcopal town of Italy, 90 miles E. of Naples. There are a cathedral and two convents. Pop. 5,000.

LAVERNA, la-ver'-na, the goddess of thieves and dishonest persons with the Romans, who raised her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which, from that circumstance, was called the gate of Laverna.

LA VILLEMARQUE, THEODORE CLAUDE HENRI HERSART, Viscount de, la-veel'-mar-ke', antiquary and Celtic scholar. He published collections of the popular tales of Brittany, Celtic legends, and grammars and dictionaries of the Breton language, besides several works of history and archæology.

Born at Quimperlé, 1815.

LAVIS, la-vis', a market town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, on the Avisio, 5 miles N.W. of Trent. It marks the boundary between the German and the Italian Tyrol. Silkworms are reared, the mulberry extensively cultivated, and there is a trade in silk. Pop. 3,000.

LAVOISIER, ANTOINE-LAURENT, la-vwoi'-ze-ai, a celebrated French chemical philosopher. He was the son of a wealthy man, and was educated with the greatest care at the Collége Mazarin, and became equally versed in mathematics, botany, astronomy, and chemistry. In 1764, when only 21 years of age, he obtained the prize from the Academy for the best treatise on lighting the streets of Paris, so as to combine the several properties of economy, distinctness of vision, and facility of observation. Two years afterwards, he was chosen member of the Academy, to whose Proceedings he contributed a number of valuable scientific papers. In 1769 he became one of the farmers-general of the revenue, and was subsequently appointed superintendent of the saltpetre-works of France. He was the inventor, or rather compiler, of a new theory of chemistry, which was received with applause in Germany and France, though strenuously opposed by Dr. Priestly, whose "phlogistic" hypothesis it tended to overthrow. In 1789 he published his "Elements of Chemistry," a work of great value and importance. Besides this work, he wrote "Chemical and Philosophical Miscellanies," and a "Report of the Commissioners charged with the Examination of the Principles of Animal Magnetism." During the Reign of Terror he was, quite unjustly, accused of having mixed certain noxious ingredients with tobacco; and, notwithstanding his talents and virtues, was dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, who condemned him to death. He asked for time to complete some experiments with which he was engaged, but was informed that the republic did not want chemists, and he was sent to the guillotine.

Born at Paris, 1743; died 1794.

LAVORO, la-vo'-ro, a province of Italy. (See TERRA-DI-LAVORO.)

LAVOS, la'-vos, a town of Portugal, province of Douro, at the mouth of the Mondego, 24 miles S.W. of Coimbra. Pop. 5,000.

LAW, EDWARD. (See ELLENBOROUGH.)

LAW, JOHN, a famous projector of financial schemes, was the son of a goldsmith at Edinburgh, and having acquired a considerable knowledge of practical mathematics, and particularly excelling as an accountant, was appointed to arrange the revenue accounts of Scotland, an employment which turned his mind towards finance. He was at first, however, only remarkable for his loose course of life, and for his talents as a gambler. Forced to quit England for having killed a person in a duel, he wandered over the continent of Europe, deriving his subsistence mainly from the gaming-table. In 1716 he went to Paris, and succeeded in gaining the confidence of the regent, duke of Orleans, who authorized him to establish a bank, and appointed him manager of it. To this was soon afterwards added the Mississippi Company, a scheme which had for its objects the paying off the national debt, and the enriching of its subscribers. Ultimately, the company was granted the entire monopoly of the trade of France, from the Cape of Good Hope eastward to all the other parts of Africa, to Persia, India, China, Japan, and the isles, even to the Straits of Magellan and Le Maia. Finally, Law's establishment was created the Royal Bank in 1718, and, in 1720, he was nominated comptroller-general of finance. The project became extravagantly popular, and every one appeared anxious to convert his gold and silver into paper; but the bubble at length burst, and many thousands of families, once wealthy, were reduced to poverty. Law became the object of general execration, and was obliged to quit France. He wandered about Germany during several years, and died in indigence.

Born at Edinburgh, about 1681; died at Venice, 1729.

LAW, WILLIAM, an English religious writer, best known as the author of a book entitled, "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life," was born at Kingscliffe, in Northamptonshire, and was educated at Cambridge. He was afterwards tutor to Edward Gibbon, father of the historian, and subsequently settled at Kingscliffe, as friend, instructer, and almoner of his two friends—Miss Hester Gibbon and Mrs. Hutchinson. Law's "Serious Call" was highly commended by Dr. Johnson and the Wesleys. His collected works were published, in 1762, in nine volumes.

Born 1686; died 1761.

LAWES, HENRY, lawz, an English musician. He became a gentleman of the chapel royal, and one of the band of Charles I. In 1653 he published his "Ayres, Dialogues, &c." He set to music the "Comus" of Milton, with whom he was intimate. He also wrote music for the songs of Waller and other poets of his time, and composed the coronation anthem for Charles II. His brother William was an excellent musician: he was commissary in the royal army, and was killed at the siege of Chester, in 1645.

Born at Salisbury, 1600; died 1662.

LAWRENCE, ST., lor'-ence, one of the largest rivers in North America, issuing from Lake Ontario, and forming the outlet of the great lakes Superior, Huron, Michigan, Erie, and Ontario. In different parts it is known by different names. From its source (lat. 47° 43′ N., lon. 93° W.), the elevated district where the Mississippi and Red River also have their origin, to Lake Superior, the river is known as the St. Louis. It unites Lakes Superior, Huron, Erie, and Ontario. From Lake Ontario to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it has a course of 770 miles. From Lake Ontario to Montreal, the distance is 190 miles. In this part of the river there are numerous islands, shoals, and rapids, and it spreads out, also, into large lakes. To Montreal ships of 600 tons can ascend with little difficulty; thence the navigation is continued by canals to Kingstown and Lake Ontario. About 90 miles below Montreal the influence of the tide ceases entirely. At Quebec, the river is 2 miles across, and continues gradually increasing in breadth until it enters the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where, from Cape Rosier to the Labrador shore, it is nearly 105 miles wide. From the beginning of December until the middle of April, the water communication is totally suspended by the frost. The basin of the St. Lawrence is estimated to contain 297,600 square miles, of which 94,000 are covered with waters of the great lakes. The total length of this grand stream, including the lakes (forming the greatest body of fresh water in the world) is 2,200 miles. The principal affluent is the Ottawa, which enters on the left bank near Montreal. The great Victoria Bridge, built by Robert Stephenson, crosses this river in the neighbourhood of Montreal. (See MONTREAL.)

LAWRENCE, GULF OF ST., a western inlet of the North Atlantic Ocean, which receives the waters of the St. Lawrence river, is formed between the western part of Newfoundland, the eastern shores of Labrador, and parts of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and the island of Cape Breton. There are three communications with the ocean—the Strait of Belle Isle, between Newfoundland and Labrador; the Gulf of Canso, between Cape Breton and Nova Scotia; and a wider passage between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. It is 280 miles long by the same in width. It contains many islands, the chief of which are Anticosti, Prince Edward's, St. Paul's and Magdalen. The most extensive bays are Chaleur, Miramichi, and St. George's. Its fisheries are very important. Lat. between 46° and 54° N. Lon. between 58° and 65° W.

LAWRENCE, ST., a deacon of Rome, who suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Valerian; according to the legend, he was roasted on a gridiron.

Died 258.

LAWRENCE, ST., an island of North-Western America, at the entrance to Behring's Strait. It is about 100 miles long, with an average breadth of from 15 to 20 miles.

LAWRENCE, capital of Douglas county, Kansas, United States, on the right bank of the Kansas, 23 miles from its mouth. Manf. Leather, soap, machinery, and carriages. Pop. 8,500.—The town was established in 1854 by the Massachusetts opponents of slavery, and was the scene of many violent combats between them and the opposition party, known as "Border Ruffians."

LAWRENCE, a city of Massachusetts, United States, 26 miles N. of Boston. Manf. Linen and cotton goods. The factories are mainly worked by water-power, supplied from the river Merrimack through a canal, which is one mile long, 100 feet in width, and 12 deep. The Merrimack has been crossed by a granite dam, 1,629 feet in length, for the purpose of retaining a sufficient storage of water. Pop. 39,000.

LAWRENCE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 725 square miles. Pop. 21,000, more than one-third being coloured. The capital is Moulton.

LAWRENCE, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 9,000. The capital is Smithville.

LAWRENCE, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 13,000. The capital is Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCE, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 488 square miles. Pop. 18,000. The capital is Bedford.

LAWRENCE, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 205 square miles. Pop. 13,262. The capital is Louisa.

LAWRENCE, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 9,800, about half being coloured. The capital is Monticello.

LAWRENCE, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 573 square miles. Pop. 17,000. Mount Vernon is the capital.

LAWRENCE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 430 square miles. Pop. 39,000. Ironton is the capital.

LAWRENCE, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 33,000. The capital is New Castle.

LAWRENCE, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 780 square miles. Pop. 10,383. Lawrenceberg is the capital.

LAWRENCE, SIR THOMAS, a celebrated English painter. He was the son of an innkeeper, first established at Bristol, and afterwards at Devizes. Young Thomas Lawrence, while yet in petticoats, drew likenesses with astonishing skill, and, as he was moreover possessed of great personal beauty, he soon attracted the notice of his father's customers. At the age of 13, he obtained a prize from the Society of Arts for a crayon copy of the Transfiguration. In 1787 his father went to London, and obtained an introduction for his son to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who liberally encouraged the young artist. In the same year he exhibited seven female portraits at Somerset House, and from that time his fame rapidly became established. After becoming associate of the Royal Academy, he was nominated principal painter in ordinary to George III., in 1792, and was elected a royal academician in 1798. George IV., when prince-regent, commissioned him to paint the portraits of those sovereigns, warriors, and statesmen who had restored peace to Europe. In 1815 he was knighted, and from that time to his death he was the most popular portrait-painter in England. On the death of Benjamin West, in 1826, he was chosen president of the Royal Academy.

Born at Bristol, 1769; died in London, 1830.

LAWRENCE, SIR HENRY MONTGOMERY, a distinguished British officer. He was the eldest son of Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander William Lawrence, some time governor of Upner Castle, who distinguished himself by his gallantry at Seringapatam. Having received his early education at the diocesan school of Londonderry, and afterwards at the Royal Military College, Addiscombe, he entered the military service of the Hon. East India Company, in 1821, as a cadet in the Bengal Artillery. He soon acquired the reputation of one of the most able and intelligent officers in the service; and, having seen some active service in the Cabul campaign in 1843, he was raised to the rank of major. In the same year he became British resident at Nepaul. He afterwards played a distinguished part in the campaigns on the Sutlej, soon after which he was made a military companion of the Bath, and at the same time promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1846 he was appointed resident at Lahore. It was for his able services in the administration of this important office that he was made a K.C.B. (civil) in 1848. In the following year he was appointed by Lord Dalhousie president of the board for the reduction and government of the recently annexed province of the Punjab, where his administrative talents were admirably proved. On the outbreak of the Indian mutiny, he showed himself one of the firmest and most able officers in the Company's service. He fortified and defended Lucknow with great skill and bravery; but his valuable life was lost to his country by the explosion of a shell while commanding a sortie from the garrison. He founded the Lawrence Asylum for the reception of the children of European soldiers in India. There is a monument to his memory in St. Paul's.

Born at Matura, Ceylon, 1806; died 1857.

LAWRENCE, JOHN LAIRD-MAIR, Lord, younger brother of the above, was educated for the Indian Civil Service at Haileybury. On the annexation of the Punjab, Lawrence, who had been serving in the neighbourhood of Delhi, was appointed commissioner, and afterwards lieutenant-governor of the Punjab. On the outbreak of the Indian mutiny the influence which he had acquired over the Sikhs, and timely assistance he was enabled to render towards the relief of Delhi, &c., were of inestimable value. The thanks of the British parliament were accorded to him on his return from India, with a pension of £1,000 per annum. He was created a baronet in 1858, was appointed governor-general of India in succession to Lord Elgin in 1863, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Lawrence in 1869. He is also a knight of the Star of India, and a member of the Indian Council. He was elected first chairman to the London School Board in 1870, and held that office for three years.

Born at Richmond, Yorkshire, 1811. Died 1879.

LAWRENCE, WILLIAM, SIR, an eminent English surgeon, who was apprenticed to Abernethy, who appointed him demonstrator of anatomy at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, where he afterwards became principal surgeon. In 1828 he succeeded his old master as lecturer on surgery, but offended him and many others by his lectures on physiology, zoology, and the natural history of man, which were supposed to advocate materialistic doctrines. He wrote many professional works of high value, and succeeded Sir Benjamin Brodie as serjeant surgeon to the queen, and received a baronetcy.

Born at Circencester, 1783; died 1867.

LAWRENCEBURG, capital of Dearborn county, Indiana, United States, on the Ohio, 22 miles below Cincinnati. Pop. 4,500.

LAWSON, SIR JOHN, law'-son, a brave English admiral, who rose from the lowest station to the command of a ship. He served the parliament with great fidelity, but co-operated with Monk in effecting the Restoration, for which he received the thanks of both houses. He served under the duke of York, as rear-admiral, and was killed in the engagement with the Dutch fleet.

Died 1665.

LAXA, lax'-a, a river of Chili, rising on the west slope of the Andes, and after a south-westerly course of 150 miles, with many rapids and cascades, joins the right bank of the Biobio.

LAXAS, lax'-as, a river of Central America, watering the country between Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific, and entering the lake 10 miles S.E. of Nicaragua.

LAYAMON, or LAWEMAN, lay'-á-mon, old English chronicler, a priest of Ernely, Worcestershire. He wrote "Brut," a metrical chronicle of the fabulous period of English history.

Lived in the 13th century.

LAYARD, AUSTEN HENRY, lai'-yard, a modern English politician and traveller. The greater portion of his youth was spent at Florence, where he devoted himself to literature and the fine arts. He went to London, with the intention of becoming a student of the law, but, abandoning that idea, set out for the East, where he acquired the Turkish and Arabic languages, and adopted the dress and manners of the people with whom he sojourned. He subsequently went to Persia, with the intention of exploring the remains of Susa, and discovered the tomb of Daniel. About the year 1844 he began examining the ruins at Nimroud, and, under great difficulty, succeeded in excavating many sculptures, which have proved of the highest value in elucidating the history of Assyria and Babylonia. The immense remnants of antiquity, now in the British Museum, were floated down the river Tigris upon rafts sustained by inflated skins, and were shipped for England at Bagdad. An account of his labours was afterwards narrated by him in his works, entitled "Ninevel and its Remains," "Monuments of Nineveh," and "Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon." In 1848 he became attaché to the British Embassy at Constantinople, and in the following year, he again examined the mounds at Nineveh. In 1851 he acted for a short period as under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, and, in the year following, was returned to the House of Commons as member for Aylesbury. He became D.C.L. of the university of Oxford in 1848, and, in 1856, was elected lord-rector of the university of Aberdeen. His visit to the Crimea, while the allied French and English armies were before Sebastopol, caused him to become one of the principal advocates for the commission of inquiry into the condition of the British army, that subsequently sat. From 1852 to 1857 Mr. Layard sat in the House of Commons as member for Aylesbury, and in 1860 was returned for Southwark, having in the interval visited India. He became under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1861, and held that office until 1866. Three years later he went as ambassador to Spain.

Born at Paris, 1817.

LAYBACH, or LAIBACH, lai'-bak, a town of the Austrian empire, Carniola, on both sides of the river of the same name, 35 miles N.E. of Trieste. There are five bridges across the river.

It consists of a town grouped round a hill, on which is a castle, and six suburbs. The principal buildings are the cathedral of St. Nicholas, two other Roman Catholic churches, a modern Protestant church, and an old Gothic town-house. There are a museum and various educational and benevolent institutions. Manf. Woollen and silk goods, cotton, paper, oil, and sugar. A large transit trade is carried on. Pop. 24,000. Lat. 46° 2′ N. Lon. 14° 30′ E.—This town is of great antiquity, and occupies the site of the Roman Æmona; was taken in 1799 by Bernadotte, and in 1809 by Macdonald; and is well known from the congress which was held in it in 1821, the object of which was the extinction of the constitutional government, as established at Naples after the insurrection in 1820.

LÉ, lai, a city of central Asia, the capital of Ladakh, on the right bank of the Upper Indus, built at an elevation of upwards of 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. It is the great rendezvous between Chinese Tartary and the Punjab, and is the chief mart for shawl-wool, brought from the former country. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 34° 10′ N. Lon. 77° 40′ E.

LEADVILLE, led′-vil, a mining town of Colorado, United States, in a basin of the Rocky Mountains, near the Arkansas. It originated in a mining camp, and increased with such amazing rapidity into a large and handsome town, that it is spoken of as "the magical city."

LEAKE, a county of the United States, in Mississippi. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 13,146, one-third being coloured. The capital is Carthage.

LEAKE, Sir John, an English admiral, son of the succeeding, with whom he served in the action with Van Tromp. In 1702 he expelled the French from Newfoundland, and on his return was made rear-admiral of the blue. The year following he assisted Admiral Rooke in taking Gibraltar, for which he was knighted. In 1705 he saved that important fortress from the combined attacks of France and Spain. The same year he was engaged in the reduction of Barcelona, and in 1706 he so seasonably relieved that place, that king Philip was obliged to raise the siege. On the death of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, he was appointed admiral of the white, and commander-in-chief of the fleet. He retired on a pension, on the accession of George I.

Born at Rotherhithe, 1656; died 1720.

LEAKE, Richard, English sailor, who distinguished himself in several naval actions, particularly in the engagement with Van Tromp, in 1673. He was then on board the Royal Prince, which had lost all her masts; most of her guns were dismounted, and 400 of her men killed or wounded; notwithstanding which, he defended the ship against a superior force, and brought her to Chatham. He was afterwards made master-gunner of England, and store-keeper of the ordnance at Woolwich.

Born at Harwich, 1629; died 1686.

LEAKE, Lieut.-Col. William Martin, author of numerous works relating to the history, antiquities, and modern topography of Greece. In 1794 he obtained a commission in the royal artillery, and served in the West Indies. He afterwards entered the Turkish service, and visited Egypt and Syria. After his return to England he was employed by the government in the East. He possessed great learning, and a lucid style, and his works are held in high esteem.

Born 1777; died 1860.

LEAMINGTON, or LEAMINGTON PRIORS, lem′-ing-ton, a market-town and watering place of Warwickshire. It is situated on the Leam, a tributary of the Avon, and is noted for its mineral spring. It is distant about 2 miles N. of Warwick. Its principal buildings are a Gothic church, several other churches, a fine Royal Spa, and a proprietory college in the Tudor style. The town is well laid out, and there are many good houses, and attractive public gardens. The waters are saline, sulphureous, and chalybeate. Pop. 22,976.—A station on the London and North-Western, Great Western, and Midland railways.

LEAVENWORTH, a handsome town in Kansas, United States, situated on the right bank of the Missouri, about 25 miles above Kansas city. There are large mills and factories here. Pop. 16,546.

LEBANON, or JEBEL-LIBNAN, leb′-a-non, "the white mountain" (a name derived from the chalk cliffs), a mountain-chain of Syria, extending from the vicinity of Antioch to near Sidon. Its culminating peak is Jebel-Makmel, 10,050 feet above the level of the sea, and covered with snow for six months of the year. The next greatest elevation is Jebel Sunnin, 8,555 feet. There are several branches, which take a western direction, and form bold promontories on the Mediterranean coast of Syria. The lower parts of the mountain are cultivated, and the valleys are very fertile. Only a few of the famous cedars of Lebanon now remain. The inhabitants are chiefly Maronites and Druses. The river Jordan rises from the southern portion of the range. Anti-Lebanon is a parallel range lying to the east of Lebanon, and terminates southward in Mount Hermon, which rises to a height of 8,376 feet. The great plain known as Cœle-Syria lies between the two ranges.

LEBANON, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 288 square miles. Pop. 38,000. The capital is Lebanon.

The river is crossed by a bridge of eight arches. Manf. Silk and cotton, and articles in iron and copper. There is a small haven, and a transit trade is carried on. An annual fair is held. Pop. 6,000.

LECH, lek, a river of Germany, rising in the Vorarlberg, and, after a course of 150 miles, falling into the Danube, 13 miles above Narberg. There are many cascades, and the river is unnavigable.

LECH-HAUSEN, lek-how'-sen, a town of Bavaria, on the right bank of the Lech, 2 miles N.E. of Augsburg. Manf. Silk goods and wax-cloth. There is a trade in cattle. Pop. 4,800.

LE CLERC, SEBASTIAN, le(r) klair, an eminent French artist. Pope Clement XI. knighted him, and Louis XIV. appointed him engraver in ordinary. He engraved about three thousand pieces, and was the author of treatises on Geometry, Architecture, and Perspective.

Born 1637; died 1714.

LE CLERC, JOHN, an eminent writer and critic, was brother of the last-mentioned. He was ordained a minister; but, having embraced the Arminian doctrines, he left his native country, and in 1682 he went to London, where he officiated for some time in two French congregations. The climate of England not agreeing with his constitution, he went to Amsterdam, and became professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and belles lettres in the Remonstrant College. In 1686 he commenced a literary journal, entitled "Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique," which gained great celebrity, and was continued till 1693. From 1703 to 1713 he conducted another, entitled "Bibliothèque Choisie," which was followed by his "Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne," from 1714 to 1729. He also published systems of Logic, Ontology, and Pneumatology. Besides these, he published several miscellaneous pieces, editions of ancient and modern authors, a translation of the Bible into French, &c. He was, with all his learning and industry, a man of excessive vanity.

Born at Geneva, 1657; died at Amsterdam, 1736.

LECLERC, VICTOR EMMANUEL, a distinguished French general, who obtained the hand of Pauline, sister of Bonaparte, whom he greatly assisted after his return from Egypt. In 1802 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the expedition to St. Domingo, where he fought against the negro general, Toussaint L'Ouverture, but fell a victim to the climate.

Born 1772; died 1802.

LECOUVRIER, ADRIENNE, le(r)-kouv're-air, French actress of remarkable talent. One of her lovers was Maurice of Saxony, and it is stated she was poisoned by a rival in his affection.

LECTOURE, lek-toor', a town of France, department Gers, on the right bank of the Gers, 20 miles N. of Auch. There are a large church in the Saxo-Gothic style; an old episcopal palace now used for public offices; and a marble statue to Marshal Lannes. Manf. Serges, coarse woollens, and leather. Pop. 6,500.

LEDA, lé-da, in Greek mythology, a daughter of king Thestius, and wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. Being seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, the god was struck by her beauty, assumed the form of a swan, the result being that she became the mother of Castor and Pollux.

LEDBURY, led'-ber-re, a market-town of Herefordshire, on the Hereford and Gloucester canal, 14 miles E. of Hereford. Its church is a large ancient building, with a detached tower and lofty spire. Manf. Principally gloves. In its vicinity are marble-quarries, hop-grounds, and cider-orchards. Pop. 8,646.—A station on the Great Western and Midland railways.

LEDRU-ROLLIN, ALEXANDRE AUGUSTE, led'-roo rol'-la, a French politician and political writer. He was educated for the profession of the law, and commenced practising as an advocate in 1832. From that year until 1848, he was extensively employed in defending political prisoners, and, both in his speeches and writings, proved himself one of the most vehement members of the ultra-liberal party in France. When the revolution of 1848 burst forth, his influence in the Chamber of Deputies became only second to that of Lamartine; and on the establishment of the provisional government, he was nominated minister of the interior, in which position he zealously endeavoured to republicanize his native country. On becoming a candidate for the presidency, his name was third on the list; Louis Napoleon and Cavaignac being first and second, and Lamartine last. Subsequently, he became a most violent opponent of Louis Napoleon's government, and, after stirring up the people of Paris into an insurrection, in June, 1849, he fled to England. In 1850 he published "The Decline of England." For twenty years he continued to live alternately at Brussels and in London, but was permitted to return to France in 1870; was elected to the National Assembly in 1871; but almost immediately resigned.

Born 1807; died 1874.

LEDYARD, JOHN, led'-yard, an American traveller, rendered remarkable by his adventures. His father dying while he was young, he was left poor and friendless. After spending some years among the Indians, he took passage from New York to London as a common sailor. In 1766 he went with Captain Cook on his third voyage, as corporal of marines; was with that great navigator when he was killed, and, some years afterwards, wrote an account of his voyage. Conceiving the daring idea of traversing the unexplored regions of America, from Nootka Sound to the eastern coast, he left England in 1786, to prosecute his journey, with only ten guineas in his pocket. He travelled through Denmark and Sweden, and after unsuccessfully attempting to cross the Gulf of Bothnia on the ice, he passed round it, and arrived at St. Petersburg in 1787. He entered that city without money, and almost without clothing, but contrived to obtain a small sum, and permission to travel with a convoy to Yakutsk, in Siberia. He had reached the latter place, in 1788, when he was suddenly arrested by order of the empress Catherine, escorted to the frontiers of Poland, and informed that he would be hanged were he again found in Russia. He arrived in England after undergoing the severest hardship, and very soon afterwards set out, under the auspices of the Society for Promoting African Discovery, to explore the regions of Africa. It is narrated that on being asked when he would be able to start, his reply was, "To-morrow morning." He left London in June, 1788, and two months afterwards reached Cairo, where, being attacked by a bilious disorder, he died at the beginning of the following year.

Born at Groton, Connecticut, 1751; died 1789.

LEDZAYSK, led-zaisk', a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, 22 miles N.E. of Rzeszow. There is a Benedictine abbey, with a fine altar-piece and frescoes. Pop. 4,000.

LEE, RICHARD HENRY, American statesman, and one of the leaders in the war of independence, was a native of Virginia, and represented that state in the first American Congress, which sat in Philadelphia. In 1784 he was elected president of congress, and retired from public life in 1792. His Life and Correspondence was published in 1825.

Born 1732; died 1794.

LEE, ARTHUR, youngest brother of the preceding, was also a native of Virginia, but was educated for the medical profession in England, and commenced life as a physician. He soon abandoned his profession for politics, and returned to England to advocate the rights of the colonists, and afterwards took up his residence at Paris as the secret agent of the revolutionary party.

Born 1740; died 1792.

LEE, HENRY, a cousin of the preceding, and born in Virginia, distinguished himself in a revolutionary army as a general. He subsequently sat in congress for his native state, and was elected governor of Virginia in 1792. He published, in 1809, a work entitled "Memoirs of the War in the Southern Department of the United States."

Born 1756; died 1816.

LEE, ROBERT EDMUND, commander-in-chief of the Confederate States of America in the civil war 1861-63, was son of the preceding, received his education at West Point, served during the war with Mexico as captain of engineers under General Scott, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and brevet-colonel for his services. On the breaking out of the civil war, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the confederate army. In this capacity he fully sustained his previous reputation, but was finally compelled to surrender to General Grant, but was permitted to retire into private life, and became governor of Lexington College.

Born 1810; died 1870.

LEE, NATHANIEL, an English dramatic writer, was the son of a clergyman, and educated at Westminster school, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree. Being disappointed of a fellowship, he went to London, and made an attempt as an actor, but without success, on which he turned tragic poet. His first piece was "Nero, Emperor of Rome," which came out in 1675, and had a favourable reception. He continued to write a play every year till 1681, when he began to show symptoms of insanity. These increasing, he was confined in Bedlam, whence he was discharged in 1688. He wrote two plays after this, but never entirely recovered his senses, and died in consequence of a drunken frolic. Lee had some power in depicting the passions, but his language occasionally, rising into real dramatic fervour, is disfigured by rant and bombast. Of all his plays, "Alexander the Great" is the only one remembered.

Born 1655; died 1691.

LEE, SAMUEL, D.D., orientalist and linguist, was partially educated at a charity school, and then apprenticed to a carpenter. While in that humble capacity, he acquired the Latin, Greek, Chaldaic, and Syriac languages, and afterwards, his talent having attracted attention, was enabled to study Arabic, Persian, French, German, and Italian. He graduated at Cambridge in 1817, and was elected, in 1819, professor of Arabic, in the same university. He was appointed Regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge in 1831. He published "A Grammar of the Hebrew Language," a translation of the "Book of Job," and a Hebrew, Chaldaic, and English Lexicon, besides translations from the Arabic and other works. He assisted the Bible Society in bringing out their Syriac versions of the Scriptures, &c.

Born at Longnor, Shropshire, 1783; died 1852.

LEE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 27,000, more than half being coloured. The capital is Opelika.

LEE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 9,600, five-sixths of whom are coloured. The capital is Starkville.

LEE, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 3,100. The capital is Beattyville.

LEE, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 29,000. The capital is Dixon.

LEE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 476 square miles. Pop. 35,000.

LEE, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 20,000, one-third being coloured. The capital is Tupelo.

LEE, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 512 square miles. Pop. 15,500. The capital is Jonesville.

LEE, SOPHIA and HARRIET, novelists and dramatists, sisters, each of whom produced separately many works, and jointly the "Canterbury Tales," which became very popular. Harriet's tale "Kruitzner," was the foundation of Byron's "Werner."

Born, Sophia, 1750; Harriet, 1756; died, both at Clifton, Sophia, 1824; Harriet, 1851.

LEECH, JOHN, leech, a modern English draughtsman, who has gained great popularity by the effectiveness of his sketches, which appeared principally in "Punch." He was educated at the Charter-house school, and was articled to a surgeon, but preferred the pursuit of art, in which he was essentially self-taught.

Born in London, about 1816; died 1864.

LEEDS, leeds, a municipal and parliamentary borough of Yorkshire, 22 miles S.W. of York. It is situated on both sides of the Aire, which is crossed by six bridges, two of them suspension, on what is known as the bow and string principle. That part of the town on the southern, or right bank of the river, consists of the suburbs Hunslet and Holbech. In the older part, which occupies a rising ground, the streets are generally narrow and crooked, except the Briggate, about one-third of a mile long, the main thoroughfare leading to the old or Leeds bridge, about the centre of the town. In the western part are modern streets and squares, with handsome houses and gardens. There are 30 churches in the town and suburbs, and several others in the outlying districts. The parish church,

St. Peter's, in the Kirkgate, was rebuilt in 1838 at a cost of nearly £30,000. It is a decorated cruciform structure, 180 feet long, 86 feet wide, with a tower 139 feet high, containing a fine peal of bells. There are fine stained glass windows, and several interesting monuments. The oldest church is St. John's, New Briggate, consecrated in 1634, in the later English style, with an embattled tower, and retaining the original fittings. Holy Trinity, St. Paul's, Christ's, St. Mary's, St. Augustine's, and St. Saviour's are modern and handsome structures, and there are 15 other churches. There are five Roman Catholic chapels, one of which has a spire 150 feet high; and about 60 places of worship belonging to various denominations of Dissenters, conspicuous among them being two very elegant and spacious Wesleyan chapels, one Independent chapel, on the East Parade, and a Gothic chapel belonging to the Unitarian body. The public buildings are among the finest in England, the Town Hall, in Park-lane, opened by the Queen, in 1858, is a magnificent rectangular building, 250 feet long, by 200 wide. It has four handsome façades, with Corinthian columns, and a tower-clock, with a dome 225 feet high. The building contains the Victoria hall, 161 feet long, 72 wide, and 15 feet high, splendidly decorated, and containing a remarkably fine organ and several statues. There are also in the building two large courts, in which the assizes are held, a police court, and other public offices. The cost of the building was upwards of £100,000. In front of it is an equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington, by Marochetti. The Commercial Buildings, near the junction of Wellington-street and Park-row, occupy a large and massive structure in the Grecian style, with three handsome fronts. The Royal Exchange, opened in 1875 (the first stone having been laid by Prince Arthur, in 1872); the Stock Exchange, Corn Exchange, and the Post Office (formerly the old court-house), with a statue of Sir Robert Peel in front, are other fine public buildings. The General Infirmary (near the Town-hall), erected at a cost of £100,000, from the designs of Sir G. G. Scott, and opened by the Prince of Wales in 1868, is one of the most striking buildings in the town. It is in the First Pointed style, and consists of several separate buildings connected by corridors. The Grammar School, built in 1859, from designs by Mr. E. Barry, is cruciform, and in the decorated Gothic style. The new White Cloth Hall, a very large quadrangular structure, with a clock-tower; the old Mixed Cloth Hall (erected in 1758), the Philosophical Hall, the Free Library, the Wesleyan Training College (in the Gothic style), the Leeds School of Medicine, the Mechanics' Institute and School of Art, the Church Institute, and a large new theatre in the Italian style, erected in 1867, are other prominent public buildings. The banks (11 in number), club-houses, hotels, and railway stations (London and North-Western and North-Eastern junction, Great Northern, Wellington, Midland, and Selby) are handsome and commodious. There are three markets, one, opened in 1876, having been constructed at a cost of £20,000. There are many charitable and educational institutions. There are several public cemeteries, and a beautiful estate, two miles from the town, Roundbay Park, covering 733 acres, and containing a lake 33 acres in extent, was purchased by the corporation in 1872, and converted, at a cost of £140,000, into a public recreation ground, which was opened by Prince Arthur. Three miles from the town are the ruins of Kirkstall Abbey, founded for the Cistercian monks, about the middle of the 12th century. The borough of Leeds includes 13 townships, and parts of two others.

Manf.—Leeds is the chief seat of the woollen cloth manufacture in England. Besides plain cloth, meltons, tweeds, mantle cloth, beavers, and railway rugs are extensively made. The superfine broad cloths are of the finest quality; and in goods of lower and coarser quality, shoddy and cotton warps are employed. There are about 12,000 factories, giving employment to 27,000 persons, in connection with the manufacture of textile fabrics and wearing apparel; and the value of goods of that description annually sold in Leeds is little short of £7,000,000. Some of the largest flax mills in Europe are in the suburb of Holbeck. Locomotive engines, machinery, tools, leather, paper, glass, earthenware, oil, and tobacco, are also important manufactures.

Pop.—309,126, the rate of increase being considerably above the average.

History.—Leeds was first incorporated by royal charter in 1627, and a second charter was granted in 1673. It was constituted a parliamentary borough (returning 2 members) by the Reform Act of 1832, and an additional member was given by the Reform Act of 1867.

LEEDS, a county of Ontario province, Canada, on the north bank of the St. Lawrence. Area, 895 square miles. Pop. 36,000. The capital is Brockville.

It has an old parish and another church, several chapels, almshouses, a town-hall, mechanics' institute, and workhouse. Manf. Silk twist, sewing-silk, other small silk wares, and ribbons. Pop. 12,865.—A station on the London and North-Western and North Staffordshire railways.

LEER, leer, a town of Prussia, in Hanover, on the right bank of the Leda, 17 miles S. of Aurich. Manf. Hosiery, linens, soap, iron wares, tobacco, and vinegar. There is a harbour, with a considerable shipping trade. Pop. 10,000.

LEERDAM, leer'-dam, a town of the Netherlands, province of South Holland, 25 miles E. of Rotterdam, on the left bank of the Linge. Manf. Leather and glass. There is a horse market. Pop. 3,000.

LEEUWARDEN, loi-var'-den, a town of the Netherlands, and the capital of the province of Friesland, on the Ee, 16 miles N.E. of Harlingen. It is intersected by numerous canals. The chief public buildings are the town-hall, and the ancient palace of the Princes of Orange. Manf. Linen, paper, pottery, chicory, tobacco, soap, and rope. There is a trade in horses, and a cattle market is held annually. Pop. 29,155.

LEEWARD ISLANDS, loo'-ard. The terms Leeward and Windward, applied to the West-India islands, were given them from their situation in a voyage from the ports of Spain to Carthagena, or Porto Bello. The islands which lie to leeward extend from Porto Rico to Dominica, and comprise the British islands of Anguilla, St. Christopher's, Antigua, Dominica, Monserrat, and the Virgin group. The French islands are Marie Galante and Guadaloupe, with all the Swedish, Danish, and most of the Dutch possessions in this archipelago. Pop. 119,550.

LEFÉBVRE, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, le(r)-faibr', Duke of Dantzig and marshal of France. He was the son of a miller, and, on the outburst of the French revolution, had reached the grade of sergeant-major in the French guards. During the subsequent events, his rise was extremely rapid; in 1794 he became general of division. He took an active part in Bonaparte's coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire (1799); and after distinguishing himself at Fleurus, at the passage of the Rhine, at the battles of Altenkirchen, and of Stockach, he was made marshal in 1804. He fought at Jena, and took Dantzig, hitherto considered impregnable, in 1807. He performed signal services in Spain and in Austria; and in 1814 commanded the left wing of the French army opposed to the allies. After the abdication of Napoleon, he submitted to the Bourbons, and became a peer of France in 1819.

Born at Ruffach, in Upper Alsace, 1755; died at Paris, 1820.

LEFKOSIA, or NIKOSIA, lef-ko-se'-a, the capital city of the island of Cyprus, near the centre of the island. The mosque of St. Sophia, formerly the cathedral, the church of St. Nicholas, and the governor's palace, are the principal buildings. Calico-printing, silk-weaving, and tanning occupy many of the inhabitants. Pop. 15,000.

LEFORT, FRANÇOIS, le-for', descended from an old Scotch family, settled in Geneva, served for some time in the French and Dutch armies, and then entered the service of Russia. He served with distinction, and helped to place Peter the Great on the throne. He afterwards held very important offices, and was a great favourite of Peter's. He remodelled the army, organised the navy, promoted manufactures and agriculture, and obtained some toleration for the religion of foreigners. In 1694 he was made grand admiral and general of the Russian army, and three years afterwards governor of Novogorod. He was for many years the most powerful person in Russia, next to the Czar.

Born in Geneva, 1656; died 1699.

LEGE, lai-jai', a town of France, department Loire Inferieure, on the right bank of the Lagre, 22 miles S. of Nantes. There is a handsome church. The town suffered greatly during the war in La Vendée. Pop. 4,500.

LEGENDRE, ANDRIEN-MARIE, le(r)'-zhandr, a celebrated French mathematician, who, in 1782, came before the world as a mathematician by the publication of two papers, one treating of the motion of resisted projectiles, the other of the attraction of spheroids. These treatises gained prizes from the academies of Berlin and Paris. In 1787 he was engaged with Cassini and Méchain in connecting the observatories of Greenwich and Paris by a chain of triangles. His whole life was devoted to teaching and enlarging the boundaries of mathematical science. His "Elements of Geometry" is a standard work, and he also wrote an "Essay on the Theory of Numbers," and "New Method for determining the Orbit of Comets." He was likewise an industrious contributor to the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences.

Born at Paris, 1751; died at the same city, 1833.

LEGGE, GEORGE, leg, Baron Dartmouth, an eminent naval commander, was brought up under Admiral Spragge, and at the age of 20 obtained the command of a ship. In 1673 he was appointed governor of Portsmouth, master of the horse, and gentleman to the duke of York. In 1682 he was elevated to the peerage, and the year following sent to raze the fortifications of Tangier. James II. appointed him master of the horse, general of the ordnance, and constable of the Tower. He had also the command of the fleet when the prince of Orange landed, but was prevented from acting by contrary winds. At the Revolution he was committed to the Tower, where he died.

Born 1647; died 1691.

LEGHORN, leg'-horn (Italian, LIVORNO, le-vor'-no), a town and seaport of Italy, in the province of Livorno, on the Mediterranean. At one of the corners of the great square stands the Duomo, or high church, a Gothic fabric, remarkable only for its vault. It is of small dimensions, and a larger cathedral is in course of erection. Exclusive of this, there are several other churches (including two of the Greek communion) an elegant synagogue, and a Turkish mosque. The ducal palace is a building of little importance. The lazaretto of San Leopoldo is a magnificent building, and there are two other lazarettos. On the side of the harbour is a fine marble statue of Ferdinand I. The other public structures are the arsenal, the theatre, the public baths, hospitals, and schools. The N. part of the city comprises many wharves and warehouses, and is intersected by canals. The maritime accommodation consists of a roadstead, and an outer and an inner harbour. The outer harbour, which is the real port, is difficult to enter; it is protected by a mole half a mile long. The inner harbour (la Darsena) is only a small basin. The lighthouse of Leghorn stands on a rock, and is brilliantly illuminated at night. Leghorn supplies the interior of Italy with the produce of the rest of Europe, of the Levant, and of the colonies. In return, it exports the produce and manufactures of the adjacent part of Italy. Manf. Silk, leather, straw-hats, paper, glass, oil, liqueur, Rosolio, tobacco, and soap. Pop. 94,000. Lat. 43° 32′ N. Lon. 10° 17′ E.—In the 16th century, Leghorn (previously only a fishing village) was made a free port by Cosmo de' Medici; and it is to this circumstance that its prosperity may be chiefly attributed. It is connected with Florence and Pisa by railway.

LEGNAGO, leg-na'-go, a town of northern Italy, province of Verona, on the right bank of the Adige, 22 miles S.E. of Verona. It is fortified, and has good public buildings. Rice is extensively cultivated in the vicinity. Manf. Hats and leather. Pop. 10,500.—The French were defeated here in 1701.

LEGNANO, leg-na'-no, a town of northern Italy, on both sides of the Olona, 16 miles N.W. of Milan. Manf. Cotton and silk. Pop. 6,500.

LEGRAND, ANTOINE, le(r)-graw', a French monk, who was an enthusiastic professor of the Cartesian philosophy. He wrote many books in elucidation of the greater work of Descartes.

Born at Douai, about 1629; died in England, about 1700.

LEGRAND, JAMES WILLIAM, a celebrated French architect. He was extensively employed in the construction and restoration of great edifices at Paris. He published, among other valuable architectural works, "Galerie Antique," "Edifices de Paris," and began a complete history of architecture, which, if finished, would have extended to thirty volumes.

Born at Paris, 1753; died 1806.

LEHIGH, le-hi', a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 389 square miles. Pop. 66,000. The capital is Allentown.

LEHMANN, CHARLES ERNEST RODOLPHE HENRI, lai-man', historical painter. He was the son of a miniature painter in Holstein, and studied under Ingres at Paris, and afterwards at Rome, and under Cornelius at Munich. He painted many subjects from the Bible, and from the works of Æschylus, Dante, Shakspeare, and Goethe. In 1852 he undertook the decoration, with mural paintings, of a gallery in the Hotel de Ville, Paris, and produced 56 pictures. He also adorned the Salle du Trône, at the Luxembourg, with a series of paintings representing the history of the French monarchy, and produced five elaborate compositions for the new Palais de Justice. Several fine mural paintings for churches are also among his works. He was decorated with the Legion of Honour in 1846, and elected member of the Academy in 1864.

Born at Kiel, Holstein, 1814.

LEIA, lé'-a, a town of India, in the Punjab, on the left bank of the Indus. An extensive trade in wool, cotton, grain, and metals, is carried on, and it is the centre of a large transit trade. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 31° N. Lon. 71° E.

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM, Baron von, libé'-nitz, a celebrated German philosopher. His father was professor of law in the university of Leipsic, but died when his son was six years old. At the age of 15 he began his studies at Leipsic, whence he removed to Jena. In 1664 he was admitted M.A. at the former university, and about the same time applied to the study of the Greek philosophers; but having chosen the law for his profession, he took his doctor's degree in that faculty, after which he obtained a post at the court of the elector of Mayence. In 1672 he was at Paris, where he formed an acquaintance with several mathematicians. He next visited London, where he was introduced to Newton, Boyle, and other eminent men. He subsequently engaged in a bitter dispute with Sir Isaac Newton, relative to the discovery of the method of fluxions, to the merit of which invention Leibnitz laid claim. The Royal Society of London, however, decided in favour of the English philosopher. The elector of Hanover, George I., employed him in writing the "History of the House of Brunswick." In 1700 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and on the erection of that of Berlin, was appointed perpetual president. In 1711 he was made aulic counsellor to the emperor, and Peter the Great of Russia appointed him privy counsellor, with a pension. He prepared the plan for the establishment of the Academy of St. Petersburg. He was a profound mathematician and metaphysician, and a man of lively genius, but vain and avaricious. His works illustrating the history of Brunswick, "Miscellaneous Questions of Philosophy and Mathematics," "Essays of Theodicea on the Goodness of God and the Liberty of Man," "Metaphysical Tracts," Poems, Latin and French, and several other works. He was by far the most variously accomplished man of his age: mathematics, languages, science, divinity, philosophy, and history being subjects in which he was profoundly versed.

Born at Leipsic, 1646; died at Hanover, 1716.

LEIBNITZ, or LINDENSTADT, a town of the Austrian empire, in Styria, 20 miles S.E. of Grätz. There is an old castle. Pop. 3,600.

LEICESTER, a town of England, municipal and parliamentary borough, the capital of Leicestershire, on the right bank of the Soar, in the centre of a fine agricultural and wool-growing district. There are 20 churches in the town and suburbs, the most interesting being All Saints, St. Margaret's, a large structure, with a lofty tower, built in the 15th century; St. Martin's, a cruciform building, with a spire (restored in 1862); St. Mary's, with a richly carved oaken roof; St. Nicholas, an ancient Gothic church, and a fine new church, St. George's, with a spire 170 feet high. There are about 25 chapels. The most prominent public buildings are the new Municipal Buildings, in the Queen Anne style, with a lofty clock-tower, erected in 1874, collegiate school, the infirmary; the clock-tower, 70 feet high, erected in 1868, as a memorial of Simon de Montfort, William of Wiggeston, Sir Thomas White, and Alderman Newton, eminent men connected with the town. There are many valuable charities and excellent schools. The river is crossed by three old and one new bridge. There is a fine promenade, the New Walk. Manf. Woollens and hosiery, of which it is the principal seat in the kingdom, lace, boots and shoes. Woolcombery and dying are extensively carried on. Pop. 122,351.—A station on the London and North-Western and Midland railways.

LEICESTER, ROBERT DUDLEY, Earl of. He was son of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, who was executed in 1553 for asserting the claims of his daughter-in-law, Lady Jane Grey. On the accession of Elizabeth, Dudley rose rapidly into favour, and was made master of the horse, knight of the garter, privy counsellor, high steward of the university of Cambridge, and advanced to the peerage, first as Baron Dudley, and then as Earl of Leicester. Her majesty proposed him to Mary, queen of Scots, for a husband. Dudley appears to have indulged the ambitious idea of sharing his sovereign's throne; and, to effect it, he is suspected to have murdered his own wife, the beautiful Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart, whom he married at an early age. In 1560 this lady was found dead at Cumnor, but no positive proof of her being murdered has ever been adduced. The great novelist, Sir Walter Scott, in his "Kenilworth," has somewhat distorted the historical facts of the case; but his work has taken such a hold on common opinion, that she is generally believed to have been murdered at her husband's instigation. About 1572 he is said to have privately married Lady Sheffield, although he never acknowleged her as his wife; however, he had by her a son called Robert, whom he called in his will his "base son." He afterwards married the countess dowager of Essex, and finding Lady Sheffield intractable to his proposals for a separation, is said to have taken her off by poison. In 1584 a book was printed, entitled "Leicester's Commonwealth," which was a severe attack upon his public and private character. The year following he was appointed governor of the Protestant Low Countries, at the request of the inhabitants; but his proceedings there did not satisfy the queen, and he returned to England the same year. In 1588 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury, and died the same year, it is suspected by poison, which he had intended for his wife, but which she contrived to administer to him.

Born 1531; died 1588.

LEICESTERSHIRE, les'-ter-sheer, an inland county of England, nearly in the centre of the kingdom, bounded on the N. by the counties of Derby and Nottingham, S. by Warwick and Northampton, E. by Lincoln and Rutland, and W. by Warwick and Derby; and between these, for a short way, also by Staffordshire. It is flat and hilly, the hills having sufficient slope to carry off the water, and yet almost nowhere of sufficient altitude to prevent the highest cultivation. In the south-west is a hilly district known as the Forest of Charnwood, although it has long since lost its forestal character. The soil may be generally described as a fine mixture of sand and clay, partaking, however, on the whole, more of the nature of clay than of sand. More than half the land is constantly in pasture. There are many large dairies. The Stilton cheese is made near Melton Mowbray, and the county is noted for a useful and beautiful breed of black horses, and for long-horned cattle. The sheep and pigs are also of superior breeds. The food for such a number of animals is obtained from the meadows, the pastures, and arable grounds. Along the banks of the rivers, especially those of the Soar, the natural meadows are rich and extensive.

Rivers.—The Soar, a tributary of the Trent; the Wreak, the Eye, and numerous smaller streams.

Minerals.—Chiefly coal and lime. In some parts the limestone affords a rich lead-ore. Ironstone is found in abundance on Ashby Wolds; also large quantities of granite, slate, freestone, and clay for bricks.

Manf.—These consist almost entirely of its great staple, wool, which is combed and spun, and converted into hosiery.

Area.—799 square miles.

Pop.—321,018.

Parliamentary Representation.—Four members are returned for the county, and 2 for Leicester.

Chief Towns.—LEICESTER, the county town; Melton Mowbray (well known as the centre of the finest fox hunting county in England), Hinckley, and Loughborough.

LEICHHARDT, FRIEDRICH WILHELM LUDWIG, like'-hart, Australian explorer. He studied at Göttingen and Berlin, and in 1841 went to Australia, where he made several excursions for the purpose of studying the botany and geology of the country. In 1844 he started for Sydney on a journey of exploration, and reached Port Essington, on the north coast, after a journey of 16 months, during which he suffered great hardship, but made some important geographical discoveries. For this expedition he received the patron's medal of the Royal Geographical Society. In 1846 he started again, with the hope of traversing Australia from east to west, across the centre of the vast island. He was last heard of in April, 1848, and there can be no doubt that he and his party perished in the desolate interior. Mr. Forrest and others have undertaken expeditions in search of some traces of Leichhardt, but without result.

Born at Trebalsch, Prussia, 1813.

LEIDEN, li'-den, a town of the Austrian empire, in Hungary, 22 miles S.E. of Presburg. There is a large Gothic church. A large trade is carried on in corn and peat. Pop. 2,800.

LEIGH, le, a market-town of Lancashire, 7 miles S. of Bolton. Manf. Silks, fustians, cambrics, muslins, and agricultural implements. Coal abounds in the neighbourhood. Pop. 21,733.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

LEIGHTON, ALEXANDER, lai'-ton, a Scotch physician. He became noted for his sufferings on account of tracts which he published against Charles I. and the Church of England. For these his nose was slit, his ears cut off, and a public whipping was inflicted on him. In 1640 the parliament appointed him keeper of Lambeth Palace, then converted into a state prison. He died insane.

Born at Edinburgh, 1587; died 1644.

LEIGHTON, ROBERT, archbishop of Glasgow, was son of the preceding. He studied at Glasgow University, where he took his degree when only 16 years old, and afterwards resided for some time at Douai, in France. On his return he was appointed to the parish of Newbattle, near Edinburgh. He was an exemplary parish priest, and the magistrates of Edinburgh chose him president of their college. Soon after the Restoration, Charles II. nominated him bishop of Dunblane, which diocese he governed with great moderation. On account of the violent animosities between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian parties, he resigned his see, but the king constrained him, in 1670, to accept the archbishoptic of Glasgow, in which station he made another effort at moderation, but in vain; on which he resigned his dignity. He then led a retired life in Sussex. His principal work is a "Commentary on St. Peter's Epistles."

Born at Edinburgh, 1613; died 1684.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD, a market-town of Bedfordshire, near the Ouse, 40 miles N.W. of London. The church, a large cruciform structure, dates from the 13th century, and there is an ancient cross in the market-place. Manf. Lace and straw plaits. It has, besides, a trade in cattle, corn, and grocery. Pop. 10,384.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

LEININGEN, line'-ing-en, an old principality of Germany, now shared between Bavaria and Baden.

LEINSTER, lens'-ter, the eastern province of Ireland, bounded on the N. by Ulster, W. and S.W. by Connaught and Munster, and S. and E. by the sea. It comprises the counties of Carlow, Dublin, Kildare, Kilkenny, King's and Queen's, Longford, Louth, Meath, Westmeath, Wicklow, and Wexford. Area, 7,619 square miles. Pop. 1,279,190. It gives the title of duke to the Fitzgerald family, whose head is sole duke and premier of Ireland.

LEIPPA, or LEIPA, lipe'-pa, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, 43 miles N.E. of Prague. There are an old and a new church, both handsome buildings; and a monastery, and several good educational establishments. Manf. Woollens, chintz, cottons, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 10,500.

LEIPSIC or LEIPZIG, lipe'-sic, a city of Saxony, on the White Elster, 65 miles N.W. of Dresden. It was formerly fortified, but has long been dismantled. The town consists of an inner, or old town, connected by promenades and avenues of lime and chestnut trees, with extensive suburbs. There are several churches, hospitals, and one spacious square, or market place, in which are the town-hall, built in 1556, and other picturesque buildings. Among the public edifices are an old castle, the Pleissenburg, now used as government offices and barracks, the exchange, the cloth-hall, the church of St. Nicholas, the Roman Catholic chapel, the theatre, city library, an orphan-house, a foundling-hospital, an institute for the deaf and dumb, a house of correction, with a separate ward for lunatics, a famous conservatoire, and various schools. The university of Leipsic (in a building known as the Augusteum) was founded in 1409; it has a library, containing several rare and beautiful editions of the classics, many oriental manuscripts, and a variety of antiquities, gems, medals, and natural curiosities.

Manf.—Linen, silk, velvets and velveteens, soap, playing-cards, leather, hosiery, tobacco, jewellery, printing-types, oil, snuff, chocolate, musical instruments, chemicals, and perfumes; and there are about 50 printing offices and 300 houses engaged in the book trade, which forms a remarkable and peculiar object in the commerce of Leipsic, which, in this respect, is the grand emporium of Germany. It is, besides, a great entrepôt of general trade. A large part of its business is carried on at the three great fairs, which have been held for 600 years, which take place at the New Year, Easter, and Michaelmas, and are attended by traders from all parts of the world. There is also a great wool market in June.

Pop.—Of the district, 707,826; of the city, 170,076.

History.—Leipsic was taken by Frederick II. in 1745, and again in 1756. In the autumn of 1813 its environs became the scene of several most sanguinary actions, in the last of which the French, under Napoleon I., were defeated by the allies

LEIRIA, le-ré-a, a town of Portugal, province Estremadura, near the right bank of the Liz, 39 miles S.W. of Coimbra. It is walled, and has an old castle, a cathedral, three convents, and a hospital. Manf. Rock crystal. A good general trade is carried on. The town has frequently been selected as a royal residence. Pop. 3,400.

LEISNIG, lise'-nig, a town of Saxony, on the right bank of the Mulde, 28 miles S.E. of Leipsic. It is walled, and has an old castle. Manf. Woollens, linens, and articles in horn. Pop. 6,000.

LEITH, leeth, a seaport, municipal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, in the county of Edinburgh, formerly called Inverleith, on the southern shore of the Firth of Forth, at the mouth of the Water of Leith, 2 miles N. of Edinburgh, of which it is the seaport, and with which it is connected by Leith Walk, a road lined with houses. It is divided into two districts, called South and North Leith (the former the most business part), communicating by drawbridges across the harbour. The town, with the exception of the modern streets, is irregularly built, with narrow lanes, and the houses mostly old-fashioned and inconvenient. The public buildings are the parish church, recently rebuilt, and several other churches and chapels. Adjacent to the parish church is James the Sixth's hospital, founded by the kirk-session in 1614. The trinity house, custom house, exchange, town-hall, public institute, and corn exchange are handsome buildings. In 1857 a park was formed on the Links, an open space adjoining the town. In 1800 a suit of wet docks was planned, and two basins were soon opened for shipping. Two other docks have recently been added. These docks comprehend over 40 acres, and there are six graving docks. The harbour of Leith has been gradually improved by the extension of piers upwards of a mile long, and, at the extremity, by a light-house. The depth is nearly 25 feet at high water. Leith Fort, an artillery station, is to the west of the town. The fishing village of Newhaven is included within the limits of the port.

Commerce.—Leith carries on an extensive trade with the Baltic, and other countries of Europe; besides a coasting trade to the different parts of England and Scotland. Coal and iron are largely exported. The Greenland fishery is also prosecuted with great activity.

Manf.—Rope, canvas, glass, soap, sugar, and bottles; and there are several breweries, iron-works, and cooperages. Ship-building, also, is carried on to a considerable extent.

Pop.—63,515. A station on the North British railway.

Lat. 55° 58′ 9″ N. Lon. 3° 10′ 5″ W.

History.—In 1541 Leith was burnt by an English fleet, and, in 1549, it was taken possession of by French troops, who came to the assistance of Mary of Guise. In 1832, it was made a parliamentary burgh, uniting with Musselburgh and Portobello in returning a member to parliament.

LEITMERITZ, lite'-mer-itz, capital of the circle of same name, in Bohemia, 34 miles N.W. of Prague. It is walled, and has a fine old cathedral, several other churches, two monasteries, a gymnasium, and an academy of philosophy. There is a considerable trade in corn, wine, and fruit. Pop. 10,500.

LEITOMISCHEL, lite-o-mi'-shel, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the left bank of the Lauchna, 24 miles S.E. of Chrudim. There is a very fine castle in the Italian style, built in the 16th century, a deanery church, college, town-house (with a lofty tower), and a large market place. Manf. Linen and tiles. There is a trade in corn, linen, and flax. Pop. 7,000.

LEITRIM, le'-trim, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, bounded on the S. by Roscommon and Sligo, W. by the Bay of Donegal, N. by Donegal and Fermanagh, and E. and S.E. by Cavan and Longford. It is extremely uneven, being composed of bogs and high mountains, which afford sufficient herbage for the breeding of cattle. The valleys are fertile and well watered.

Rivers.—The Shannon, Bonnet, Yellow River, and Daff.

Lakes.—Loughs Allen, Melvin, and Gill.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, lead, and copper. There are chalybeate springs.

Manf.—Chiefly linen goods for home consumption.

Area.—613 square miles.

Pop.—89,795.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

Chief Towns.—Carrick-on-Shannon, Manor Hamilton, and Mohill.

LE LABOUREUR, JOHN, lá'-boo-rer, a French writer. He was at first a gentleman's servant, but afterwards entered into holy orders, and became prior of Juvigné, commander of the order of St. Michael, and almoner to the king. He wrote the History of the Marshal of Guebriant, with the genealogy of Budos and some other houses in Brittany; he also published an edition of the "Memoirs of Michael du Castelnau," and other works.

Born at Montmorency, 1623; died 1675.

LELAND, or LAYLENDE, JOHN, le'-land, an eminent English antiquary. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and All Souls College, Oxford. On entering into orders, he became chaplain to Henry VIII., who gave him the title of king's antiquary. By virtue of the royal commission, he searched various cathedrals and religious houses for curious records and other remains of antiquity; in which employment he spent six years, travelling over every part of the kingdom. In 1545 he presented his collections to the king, under the title of "A Newe Yeare's Gifte." This, however, was only the beginning of what he proposed to execute; but while he was intent on his studies, he became insane, in which state he continued till his death. His "Itinerary" and "Collectanea" were published by Hearne, in 1710.

Born in London, 1506; died 1552.

LELAND, JOHN, a learned English divine, whose labours in defence of Christianity procured him the degree of D.D. from two universities in Scotland. He was for many years a Dissenting minister in Dublin. His principal works were a "Defence of the Christian Religion" against Tindal, a "View of the Deistical Writers that have appeared in England," "The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," and "Family Devotions."

Born at Wigan, 1691; died 1766.

LELAND, DR. THOMAS, a learned divine, who wrote a "History of Ireland," "The Life of Philip of Macedon," and "The Principles of Human Eloquence," which last was attacked by Warburton. He also translated the Orations of Demosthenes.

Born at Dublin, 1722; died 1785.

LELY, SIR PETER, le'-le, a famous painter. His real name was Peter Vander Faes, and he was the son of a Dutch captain, generally known as Captain Lys or Lely, from a fleur-de-lis sculptured on the house in which he was born. The name was adopted by the young Peter, who studied under Grebber at Haarlem, after which he went to England, where he at first painted landscapes and historical subjects; but, finding more encouragement given to portrait-painting, he turned his attention to that branch of his art, and became unrivalled in the graceful rendering of heads; the hands of his portraits were remarkably fine and elegantly turned. He was in great favour with Charles I. and Charles II., by the latter of whom he was knighted, and appointed court painter, and for whom he painted the voluptuous beauties of his court. This collection is now contained at Hampton Court.

Born at Soest, Westphalia, 1618; died in England, 1680.

LEMA ISLANDS, the outermost group of the archipelago that fronts the entrance to Canton river, in the Chinese Sea. They consist of three large and one small islands, the largest, the Great Lema, or Tam-quoon-Tow, being only 6 miles long and less than 2 broad. Lat. 22° 4′ N.; Lon. 140° 18′ E.

LEMAN LAKE. (See GENEVA, LAKE OF.)

LEMBERG, lem'-bairg, a city of the Austrian empire, capital of Galicia, on the Peltew, a branch of the Dniester, 185 miles from Cracow. It is fortified. The lofty towers and cupolas of the cathedral, built in the 14th century; the Greek church in the Italian style, and other churches, of which there are 28, and the height and massiveness of the houses, built of freestone, give the town an air of grandeur. It is the seat of a civil and military governor, and of a Roman Catholic and a Greek and an Armenian archbishop. The public institutions are a university (with a noble library and a collection of coins), literary institute (with a very large library, including many rare MSS. connected with Polish literature), two gymnasia, and numerous schools and charities. Manf. Woollens, linens, jewellery, and tobacco. Pop. 109,746, including many Jews.—The city was formerly named Löwenburg, "the city of the lion," having been founded by Prince Leo Damiebowicz in 1259.

LEMERY, NICOLAS, lem'-e-re, a celebrated French chemist, who, in 1683, visited England, being of the reformed religion, then violently persecuted in his own country. He was well received by Charles II., and great offers were made to induce him to continue there; but in 1686 he returned to France and turned Roman Catholic. In 1699 he was made associate chemist to the Royal Academy, and the same year became a pensionary. He wrote a "Course of Chemistry," which went through many editions; a "Universal Pharmacopœia;" a "Treatise on Simple Drugs;" a "Treatise on Antimony."

Born at Rouen, 1645; died 1715.

LEMGO, lem'-go, a town of the principality of Lippe-Detmold, Germany, on the Bega, 16 miles from Minden. It is walled, and has an antiquated appearance, with several churches, a palace, a town house, gymnasium, a seminary for noble ladies, and an orphan asylum. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, and meerschaum pipes. There is a considerable book trade. Pop. 4,000.—This was formerly one of the Hanse towns.

LEMNOS, or STALIMINE, lem'-nos, an island of Turkey in Europe, 40 miles S.E. of the entrance of the Dardanelles. It is irregular in shape, resembling two islands united by a narrow isthmus. The length is 22 miles, the greatest breadth 20 miles. The most fertile tracts are in the west and south; in the other parts are barren hills of volcanic origin. There are several good harbours, especially Paradise, on the north side, and Port Antonia on the south. The chief town is Limni, or Kastro, on the western coast, with a harbour and building dock. Pop. 10,000.

LE MONNIER, PETER CHARLES, le(r)-mon'-ne-ai, a French astronomer, was member of the Academy of Sciences and of the National Institute, and accompanied Maupertius in his journey towards the north pole for measuring a degree of the meridian. His principal works were, "Astronomical Institutions," "Lunar Nautical Astronomy," and "Tables of the Sun, and Corrections for those of the Moon."

Born at Paris, 1715; died 1799.

LEMPA, lem'-pa, a river of Central America, rising in Guatemala, and after a circuitous course of 180 miles, receiving numerous mountain torrents, discharges an immense body of water into the Pacific, near Port Giquilesco.

LEMPRIERE, JOHN, Dr., lem-pre-aire', editor of the once popular "Classical Dictionary." He was educated at Westminster and Pembroke College, Oxford. He was, too, the editor of a "Universal Biography."

Born in Jersey, 1760; died 1824.

LENA, le'-na, a river of Asiatic Russia, Eastern Siberia, rising in the mountains N.W. of Lake Baikal, and after a course of 2,800 miles, falling into the Arctic Ocean by numerous mouths, between lat. 72° and 73° N., and lon. 125° and 130° E. The principal affluents are the Vilui, on the left, and the Vitim, Olekama, and the Aldan, on the right. The chief harbours are Olekminsk, Jakutsk, and Kachugsk, and a large trade is carried on.

LENAWEE, len-a-we', a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 735 square miles. Pop. 48,000. The capital is Adrian.

L'ENCLOS, NINON DE, lan(g)'-klo, a celebrated French lady. Her mother wanted to place her in a convent, but was prevented by her father, who was a man of gaiety. Ninon lost her parents at the age of 15, and possessing great charms and a lively temper, she was followed by some of the greatest men, but would never unite herself in marriage. She was the friend of Molière and Fontenelle, and had a fine understanding; but it has been truly observed of her, that though she thought like Epicurus, she lived like Lais. She is, however, represented to have been perfectly unmercenary in her amours; and her wit and behaviour were such, and so low the moral tone of the time, that even virtuous ladies courted her acquaintance. She was held in great respect by men of genius, who consulted her upon their works. She retained her personal beauty and powers of fascination to a very advanced age, and a most lamentable and horrible incident is recalled in connection with her. One of her illegitimate sons, who had been brought up in ignorance of his parentage, saw her, and fell madly in love with her, but on discovering the relationship, committed suicide. There are a few genuine letters by her in the works of St. Evremond, but those under her name, addressed to Villarceaux, De Sévigné, &c., are fictitious.

Born at Paris, 1615; died 1706.

LENCZIZA, lench-e'-za, a town of Russia, in Poland, 90 miles S.W. of Warsaw. There are the ruins of a royal castle erected in the 12th century. Manf. Linen and woollen cloths. Pop. 6,500, about half being Germans and Jews.

LENDELIDE, len'-de-leed, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, 19 miles S. of Bruges. Manf. Linen, oil and tobacco. There is a trade in corn and oil seeds. Pop. 3,800.

LENDINARA, len-de-na'-ra, a town of northern Italy, on the Adigette, 9 miles N.W. of Rovigo. There are several churches, a court house, and public library. Pop. 5,100.

L'ENFANT, JAMES lan(g)'-fa, a French Protestant divine, who was educated at Geneva, and became minister of the French church at Heidelberg; but on the invasion of the Palatinate, in 1688, by the French, he retired to Berlin. He published histories of the councils of Constance, Basle, and Pisa; he likewise translated the New Testament into French, with notes, and a learned introduction, in conjunction with Beausobre. He was also author of a History of Pope Joan, now superseded by like researches.
Born at Bazoche, France, 1661; died at Berlin, 1728.

LENGLET, NICHOLAS DU FRESNOY, lan'-glai, a French writer. He became secretary to the French ambassador at Cologne, and librarian to Prince Eugene. His works are voluminous, but incorrect: the best is his "Method for Studying History," which has been translated into English.
Born at Beauvais, 1674; died 1755.

LENKORAN, len-ko-ran', a seaport of Russia, on the Caspian Sea, in the Caucasian provinces. The harbour is defective, but a considerable trade between Russia and Persia is carried on. Pop. 16,000.

LENNEP, JACOB VAN, len-nep', Dutch novelist and dramatist. He practised as a barrister, but found time for the production of numerous romances and dramas, which attained great popularity. He also translated into Dutch several plays of Shakspeare, and poems of Southey, Byron, and Tennyson. His countrymen speak of him as the Walter Scott of Holland.
Born at Amsterdam, 1802; died 1868.

LENNEP, a town of Prussia, in a beautiful valley, watered by a river of the same name, 20 miles E. of Düsseldorf. Manf. Woollens, particularly fine cloths and kerseymeres, in large quantities, hats, ironmongery, and gunpowder. Pop. 7,800.

LENNOX, len'-nox, an ancient district of Scotland, comprising Dumbartonshire and portions of the counties of Renfrew, Perth, and Stirling.

LENNOX, a county of Ontario province, Canada, on the north-west shore of Lake Ontario. Area, 314 square miles. Pop. 16,500, including many Irish and German. The capital is Napanee.

LENNOXTOWN, a village of Stirlingshire, Scotland, 11 miles N.E. of Glasgow. There are print works and alum works. Pop. 3,920.

LENOIR, MARIE ALEXANDRE, len-wawr', French archæologist, who at first studied art, but preferred archæology, and at the time of the Revolution, exerted himself to save the old national monuments in danger of destruction. The National Assembly forwarded his views, and a central museum was formed at the Louvre. Under the Consulate and Empire, Lenoir was employed to restore the tombs of the French kings at S. Denis, and other monuments which had suffered injury.
Born at Paris, 1761; died 1839.

LENOIR, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 390 square miles. Pop. 15,500, one half being coloured. The capital is Kingston.

LENOLA, a town of Italy, 15 miles N.W. of Gaeta. It is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Inola Campana. Pop. 3,000.

LENORMANT, CHARLES, le-nor'-mahn, French historian and archæologist. Went to Egypt with Champollion, and published works on the history of Western Asia and on Egyptian antiquities.
Born 1802; died 1859.

LE NOTRE, ANDRÉ, le-notr', French landscape gardener, famous for laying out the grounds at Versailles, by direction of Louis XIV.
Born 1613; died 1700.

LENS, lens, a town of France, department Pas-de-Calais, on the Souchez, 9 miles N. of Arras, Manf. Leather and soap. There are coal pits in the vicinity. Pop. 10,500.—Here, in 1648, a battle was fought between the Spanish forces and those of the prince of Condé, who gained the victory.

LENTHALL, WILLIAM, lent'-al, an English lawyer, and speaker of the Long Parliament. In 1639 he was elected to parliament for Woodstock, and, in 1640, was chosen speaker; in which capacity he made a considerable fortune by joining the ruling party. He was also master of the rolls, a commissioner of the great seal, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was removed from his office in 1653; but, the year following, he became speaker of the parliament called by Cromwell, and subsequently acted as speaker of the Rump Parliament. At the Restoration he was exempted from the act of indemnity, but obtained a pardon from the king.
Born at Henley-on-Thames, 1591; died 1662.

LENTINI, or LEONTINI, len-te'-ne (the ancient Leontium), a town of Sicily, province of Siracusa, near a lake of the same name, 15 miles S.W. of Catania. Its inhabitants have an active fishery on the lake, and there is a large gunpowder-mill. Pop. 13,000.

LENZEN, len'-zen, a walled town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, 79 miles N.W. of Potsdam, near the confluence of the Löckenitz with the Elbe. Pop. 3,000.

LEO, le-o, the name of several emperors and popes.

EMPERORS OF THE EAST.

LEO I., or the Great, emperor of the East, ascended the throne in 457. He was a Thracian, of obscure birth, but attained the highest military rank, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers in succession to Marcianus. He confirmed the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon against the Eutychians, and renewed the war against the Vandals; but was unfortunate, through the treachery of his general, Aspar, whom he put to death with his family in 471. The Goths, to revenge the fate of Aspar, poured into the empire, which they ravaged to the walls of Constantinople.
Born 400; died 474.

LEO II. was the son of Zeno and of Ariadne, daughter of Leo I. He succeeded his grandfather in 474, under the guardianship of his father, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor a few months afterwards. Leo II. is said to have been put to death by his own father, after reigning for only ten months.
Born 470; died 474.

LEO III. (Flavius Conon), called the Isaurian, from the country of his birth, where his parents were poor mechanics. Leo entered into the army, and became general-in-chief of the army of Asia, under Anastasius II. In 716 he marched against Theodosius III., who had been proclaimed emperor, and Theodosius resigned his crown to him in 718. The Saracens, having ravaged Thrace, laid siege to Constantinople, which was bravely defended by Leo, who compelled them to retire. His reign, however, was tyrannical, and he drove the patriarch Germanus from his seat, in which he placed Anastasius. He was also guilty of burning the library at Constantinople, containing a quantity of medals and above 30,000 volumes. The popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. having excommunicated him, he prepared an armament to invade Italy; but the ships were destroyed by a storm.

Born 680; died 741.

LEO IV. (Flavius Chazarus), the son of Constantine Copronymus, and grandson of Leo III., succeeded his father in 775. In his time the controversy raged between the Iconoclasts, or image-breakers, and their adversaries, both of whom he protected by turns. He repulsed the Saracens in Asia.

Born at Constantinople, 750; died 780.

LEO V. (Flavius), the Armenian, from the country of which he was a native. He rose to the rank of general by his valour; but being accused of treason, the emperor Nicephorus disgraced him, and imprisoned him in a convent. Michael Rhangabus, on ascending the throne, in 811, restored him to his rank; but Leo, profiting by the misfortunes of his master, headed a military revolt, and was elected emperor by the troops in 813. He was one of the most violent of the Iconoclastic princes. He was assassinated by the friends of one of his adherents, whom he had condemned to death.

Died 820.

LEO VI. (Flavius), styled the Philosopher, was the son and successor of Basilius, the Macedonian, and ascended the throne in 886. The Hungarians, Saracens, and Bulgarians having united against the empire, he called to his assistance the Turks, who entered Bulgaria, which they ravaged with fire and sword. Leo drove the patriarch Photius from his seat; and Nicholas, one of the successors of Photius, excommunicated the emperor; for which Leo deposed him. He wrote some books, the most interesting of which is a treatise on Tactics, printed at Leyden in 1612.

Born 865; died 911.

POPES.

LEO I., Pope, surnamed the Great, one of the most eminent of the Latin Fathers, and a saint of the Roman Catholic church, was an Italian by birth, and had been employed by Celestin I. and Sixtus III. on several important missions. He succeeded the latter in 440, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Manichæans, Pelagians, and Eutychians. In 449 the council of Chalcedon was called; and, while sitting in the East, Attila and the Huns ravaged the West, and advanced towards Rome. The emperor Valentinian applied to the pope, who went to meet Attila, and, by the power of his eloquence, prevailed with him to leave Italy. Genseric, however, sacked Rome in 455. He left behind many epistles and sermons, which have been printed.

Born 390; died 461.

LEO II. was a native of Sicily, and succeeded Agathon, in 682. He pretended to have an authority over the Eastern church, and was succeeded by Benedict II. He is supposed to have been the first to introduce sprinkling with holy water.

Died 684.

LEO III. succeeded, in 795, Adrian I. In 799, Leo was seized while riding in a religious procession, and almost killed; but he recovered, and retired to Germany. Charlemagne restored him to his seat, and he crowned that monarch emperor of the West. On the death of Charlemagne, a new plot was formed against the pope, who caused the conspirators to be put to death.

Died 816.

LEO IV., a Roman, succeeded Sergius II. in 847. The Saracens having invaded the Ecclesiastical States, he marched against them, and obtained a complete victory; after which he put the city of Rome into a state of defence, and founded the town of Leopolis.

Died 855.

LEO V., a Benedictine monk, who, in 903, succeeded Benedict IV., but was deposed by his chaplain Christopher.

Died 903.

LEO VI. became pope in 928, in succession to John X. He is said to have been put to death by Marozia. (See MAROZIA.)

LEO VII. was elected in succession to John XI., son of Marozia. He negotiated a peace between Hugo, king of Italy, and Alberic, duke of Rome, the son of the celebrated Marozia. He is said to have been an irreproachable man and zealous ecclesiastic, and was succeeded by Stephen VIII.

Died 939.

LEO VIII. was elected pope on the deposition of John XII., in 963, under the patronage of the emperor Otho I. On Otho's withdrawal, John re-entered Rome, and drove away Leo; but John dying soon afterwards, Benedict V. was chosen pope. The emperor Otho subsequently took Rome, and, exiling Benedict, reinstated Leo VIII.

Died 965.

LEO IX. (Bruno), who bears the distinction of a saint in the Roman calendar, was born of an illustrious family, became bishop of Toul, and, in 1048, was chosen pope. He convened several councils to reform the manners of the ecclesiastics and to condemn the errors of Berenger. The Normans having marched into Italy, in 1053, he went against them at the head of a German army; but was defeated, taken prisoner, and conducted to Benevento. Some sermons and letters of his are extant.

Born 1002; died 1054.

LEO X. (Giovanni de' Medici), second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent. (See MEDICI.) At the age of 11, he was made an archbishop by Louis XI., king of France, and, at 13, was created cardinal. He travelled for a few years, and then Julius II. invested him with the dignity of legate, and he served as such in the army which was defeated by the French, near Ravenna, in 1512. He was taken prisoner after that battle; but the soldiers showed the most superstitious veneration for his person, as the representative of the pope. He was elected to the papacy in 1513, and his coronation was celebrated with unusual pomp. Leo was fond of magnificence; but he had a taste for letters, and liberally patronized men of learning and genius, particularly poets. He terminated the disputes which had subsisted between his predecessor and Louis XII. of France, concluded the council of the Lateran, and formed a splendid library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. A conspiracy to murder him was discovered in 1516, and Cardinal Petrucci, the chief of it, was hanged. Leo formed two great projects; the one to effect a general association of the Christian powers against the Turks, and the other to complete the church of St. Peter. To aid these schemes, he issued plenary indulgences, by which the purchasers were supposed to procure release from punishment in purgatory for their temporal sins. These indulgences being carried into Germany, occasioned the secession from the church of Rome, or Reformation, commenced by Luther. (See LUTHER.) Leo, however, throughout his life took little notice of the great religious movement. A war also broke out between the emperor Charles V. and Francis I. of France, who both courted the alliance of the pope. If not an exemplary pope, he was at least a splendid and magnificent prince, and a noble patron of art and learning. He is the subject of Roscoe's fine biography, entitled the "Life and Pontificate of Leo X."

Born at Florence, 1475; died 1522.

LEO XI. (Alessandri de' Medici), was elected pope in 1605, and died in less than a month afterwards.

Born 1535; died 1605.

LEO XII. (Annibale della Genga), was of a noble family of the Romagna, and became pope in 1823, in succession to Pius VII. He embellished Rome, encouraged letters, and enriched the library of the Vatican.

Born 1760; died 1829.

LEO VI., the last of six kings of Armenia, of the same name, who reigned between the years 1123—1375, and were constantly at war with the crusaders or with the Turks. He was driven from his kingdom by the sultan of Egypt, and took refuge in France, where he died.

Died 1393.

LEO, archbishop of Thessalonia, was one of the revivers of Greek literature and a good mathematician.

Flourished during the 9th century.

LEO, HEINRICH, German historian, studied medicine at Breslau, but preferred literature to history, and went to Jena and Gottingen. In 1822 he went to Berlin, and was for a time an ardent follower of Hegel. In the following year he travelled in Italy, and in 1828 became professor of history at Halle. He has written a history of the Jewish States, History of the Middle Ages, of the Low Countries, of the Italian States, and a great number of other valuable works.

Born at Rudolstadt, 1799.

LEO, JUAN, surnamed Africanus, a Moor of Granada, who wrote, in Arabic, a "Description of Africa," and the "Lives of the Arabian Philosophers."

Died about 1552.

LEO, LEONARDO, a celebrated Italian composer, who was the master of Piccini, Jomelli, and other famous musicians. His many operas are now unknown, but his masses and other sacred works are still regarded as master-pieces of church music.

Born at Naples, 1694; died at the same city, 1755.

LEO THE GRAMMARIAN, one of the authors of the "Byzantine History."

Lived in the 11th century.

LEONARDO BONACCI, lai-onar'-do, surnamed "of Pisa," a celebrated Italian mathematician, who first introduced in Europe the study of algebra. His work was never published, but is preserved in manuscript at Rome.

Born 1170.

LEONARDO DA VINCI, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and engineer, was the son of a notary at Florence. Verrochio, an able painter and sculptor, was his master, whom he soon excelled, as he did all the painters of his time. In 1483 he went to Milan, where, two years afterwards, he founded an "Academy of Arts." One of his greatest works was a picture of "The Last Supper," at Milan, in which city he founded his celebrated school of painting. He was also an excellent architect, and constructed the famous aqueduct which supplies Milan with water. From Milan he went, in 1500, to Florence, where he laboured with Michael Angelo in ornamenting the grand council-chamber. At the invitation of Francis I., he visited the French court in 1515. He wrote a "Treatise on Painting," in Italian, folio, and some other works, of which Hallam thus speaks:—"The discoveries which made Galileo, and Kepler, and other names illustrious, the system of Copernicus, the very theories of recent geologers, are anticipated by Da Vinci within the compass of a very few pages. . . . He first laid down the grand principle of Bacon,—that experiment and observation must be the guide to just theory."

Born near Florence, 1452; died at Amboise, 1519.

LEONARDS-ON-SEA, ST., len'-ards, a fashionable watering-place of Sussex, immediately adjoining Hastings (in which borough it is included), on the west, and stretching for about a mile along the sea. There are terraces and squares, with noble houses, six churches, a large congregational chapel, assembly-rooms, baths, esplanade, and pleasure-grounds. St. Leonards dates only from 1828. Pop. 3,700 permanent, greatly increased by visitors during the season.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast railway.

LEONESSA, lai-o-nes'-sa, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Corno, 13 miles N. of Civita Ducale. It is surrounded by lofty precipices, which, in winter, exclude the sun till midday. There are five churches, four monasteries, and three nunneries. Two important fairs are held annually. Pop. 5,400.

LEONFORTE, lai-on-for'-tai, a town of Sicily, province of Messina, on the shore of the Mediterranean. It is surrounded by walls. A trade in oil, wine, and grain is carried on. Pop. 15,914.

LEONICENUS, NICHOLAS, le-o-ni-se'-nus, professor of medicine at Ferrara, was the first who translated Galen's works, to which he added commentaries and illustrative notes. He likewise reproduced, in Italian, the "Aphorisms of Hippocrates," and other works.

Born 1428; died 1524.

LEONIDAS, le-on-i-das, king of Sparta. He succeeded his half-brother Cleomones, about 491 B.C. He opposed Xerxes when he invaded Greece, and fought the whole Persian host at the Straits of Thermopylæ with such bravery as to check the progress of the invader. At last a detachment of the Persians, led by Ephialtes the Trachinian, by a secret path up the mountains, came down on the rear of the Spartans, and obtained a complete victory. Out of the 300, only one man escaped, and he was treated with ignominy by his countrymen, for leaving so glorious a field where death was more honourable than life. A monument was afterwards erected upon the spot, with this inscription: "Stranger, tell the Lacædemonians that we lie here, obeying their laws."

Died 480 B.C.

LEONINE CITY. (See ROME.)

LEOPARDI, GIACOMO, count, lai-o-par'-de, Italian scholar and poet. He was self-educated, but attained such proficiency in Latin and Greek, that when only 16 years of age, he was elected member of the Academy of Sciences, at Viterbo. He afterwards went to Rome, where he gained the friendship of Niebuhr, and other eminent men, and subsequently took up his residence at Florence, where he struggled with poverty and impaired health until his death. His poems are elegant and pathetic; but marked by the despondency characteristic of his mind, and he particularly excelled in love sonnets, in the Italian style, and in imitation of the Greek and Latin authors, many of which are mistaken for veritable productions of classical writers.

Born at Recanati, 1798; died at Naples, 1837.

LEOPOLD of BABENBERG, le'-o-pold, first hereditary margrave of Austria, and founder of the line which became extinct in 1246. He was the descendant of the old Frankish kings, and became margrave of Austria in 983.

Died 994.

LEOPOLD I., emperor of Germany, was the second son of Ferdinand III. and of Mary Anne of Spain. He became king of Hungary in 1655, king of Bohemia in 1657, and emperor in 1658. He contended against France and the Turks, and suffered in his wars with both: France took from him Alsace, and many frontier places of the empire; and the Turks would have captured Vienna, had they not been compelled to raise the siege by John Sobieski, king of Poland. In 1697, Prince Eugene of Savoy concluded the war by totally defeating the Turks at Zenta, in Hungary.

Born 1640; died 1705.

LEOPOLD II., the son of Maria Theresa of Austria and her husband, Francis of Lorraine, succeeded his father, in 1765, in the duchy of Tuscany, which he governed with great wisdom, and finally abolished the Inquisition in that country. In 1790 he succeeded the emperor Joseph II., and removed to Vienna, where, by his judicious and liberal measures, he consolidated the power of his empire. He concluded a peace with the Turks, and was preparing for a war with the French, when he was carried off by a fever. He was succeeded by his son Francis. (See FRANCIS II.)

Born 1748; died 1792.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, was the son of Charles, the fifth duke, and of Eleonora of Austria. He distinguished himself as a soldier, and after the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, was reinstated in his duchy, which had been taken from his father by the French. He restored his country to a flourishing condition, maintained the poor, and assisted the nobility who had been reduced. He founded a university at Luneville, and was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences.

Born 1679; died 1729.

LEOPOLD I., GEORGE CHRISTIAN FREDERICK, king of the Belgians. He was the third son of Francis Anthony Frederick, duke of Saxe-Saalfeld-Coburg, and brother of the duchess of Kent, and consequently uncle to her majesty Queen Victoria, as well as to her consort, Prince Albert. In 1816, while Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, he married the Princess Charlotte Augusta, only child of the prince-regent, afterwards George IV. The highest hopes were formed of that union; and, as the husband of the heiress-apparent to the throne of Great Britain, Leopold obtained the highest esteem. After the sudden death of the Princess Charlotte, in 1817, he continued to live in retirement at Claremont, and was created by the king field-marshal and member of the privy council. In 1830, the Belgian provinces were lost to the crown of Holland, in consequence of the revolution of Brussels. A provisional government was formed, and the throne of Belgium was offered to the duke de Nemours, son of Louis Philippe. That prince declining it, Leopold was next solicited to accept the crown. After at first refusing, he was induced to ascend the throne of Belgium in 1831. Leopold promised, in his opening speech to the Belgian parliament, to encourage industry and to rule according to the principles of civil and religious liberty; a promise which he fully redeemed. In 1832 he contracted a matrimonial alliance with Louise-Maria-Thérèse, princess of Orleans, and eldest daughter of Louis Philippe, by whom he had several children.

Born 1790; died 1865.

LEOPOLD II., king of the Belgians, son of the preceding, before his accession to the throne bore the title of Duke of Brabant. He married, in 1853, the Archduchess Maria of Austria. He travelled in Egypt and Asia Minor, held the rank of major-general in the Belgian army, and took a prominent part in the senate, of which he was a member. He succeeded his father, in December, 1865, and has followed the line of liberal policy marked out by his predecessor. He has also distinguished himself by the encouragement of arts, science, literature, and commerce, and by the cordial reception given to English volunteers on the occasion of visits to Belgium. He has frequently visited England, where he is very popular.

Born at Brussels, 1835.

LEOPOLDO, SAO, lai'-o-pol'-do, a town of Brazil, province of Rio Grande do Sul, between the Sino and Cahi, 30 miles N. of Porto Alegre. It was founded in 1824 by a colony of Germans under the patronage of the Brazilian empress Leopoldina. Pop. 6,000.

LEPANTO, or EPACTO, le-pan'-to, a seaport-town of Greece, on the north side of the Gulf of Lepanto, 25 miles E. of Missolonghi. The town is wretchedly built, but there is a good port. Pop. 2,600.—In 1477, it being then held by the Venetians, it was besieged by a large force of the Turks, but not taken until two years afterwards, and then by an army of 150,000 men under Bajazet II. In 1571 there was a great naval battle near the port, and the Turks were completely defeated by Don John of Austria.

LEPANTO, GULF OF. (See CORINTH, GULF OF.)

LEPE, lai'-pai, a seaport-town of Spain, province of Huelva, on the right bank of the Piedra, 12 miles S.W. of Huelva. Pop. 3,100.

LEPIDUS, MARCUS ÆMILIUS, lep'-i-dus, dictator of Rome in the absence of Julius Cæsar, 47 B.C., and joint consul with him in the following year. He was afterwards one of the triumvirs with Octavius and Marc Antony. He obtained Africa as his share of the empire, on the death of the dictator; but was deprived of it by Augustus, whereupon he retired into private life, and died in obscurity.

Died 13 B.C.

LEPSIUS, KARL RICHARD, lep'-se-us, a German archæologist, who studied at Leipsic, Göttingen, Berlin, and Paris. He published between 1834 and 1842 a short treatise on the hieroglyphics of Egypt, and other works. In 1842 he went to Egypt, as chief of a party of learned men, for the purpose of investigating the antiquities of that country. He discovered several monuments of the Pharoah dynasty, and excavated the tombs of fifty of the Ethiopian kings of Egypt. He likewise contrived to obtain a ground-plan of the celebrated temple of the Memnonium. After his return, in 1846, he published many works in connection with his researches; among the rest, "Letters from Egypt," which have been translated into English. "The Chronology of Egypt," and the "Monuments of Egypt and Ethiopia." In 1866 he made another visit to Egypt, and in 1874 was appointed director of the Prussian state library of Berlin.

Born at Naumburg, 1813.

LERCARA DE' FREDDI, lair-kai'-ra de frai'-di, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo, 30 miles S.W. of Palermo, in an inland mountainous district. There are extensive sulphur mines in the vicinity. Pop. 13,081.

LERMONTOV, MICHAEL IVANOVITCH, ler-mon-tof', a Russian poet and novelist. He served as an officer in the imperial guards until the year 1837, when, in consequence of a poem which he wrote upon the death of the Russian poet Pushkin, the emperor Nicholas sent him to the Caucasus. This poem was first printed in 1856, in Herzen's "Polar Star," a Russian periodical published in London. While serving with the army of the Caucasus, he wrote his novel, "A Hero of Our Own Times," which was afterwards translated into English. He likewise produced many beautiful poems, the action of which is chiefly laid in the mountains of the Caucasus. Just as his fame was beginning to spread over Europe, the writer fell in a duel before he had attained his 30th year. His complete works were published in St. Petersburg in 1842, and were subsequently translated into German. In Russian literature, he takes rank immediately after Pushkin.

Born 1811; died 1841.

LERO, or LEROS, le'-ro, a small island of the Greek Archipelago, off the west coast of Anatolia. It is 9 miles long, with an average breadth of 4 miles, rising in Mount Klidi to an elevation of 1060 feet. It is famous for its honey. On the east side is the town of Lero, and on the north Partheni, a good port. Pop. 2,000.

LEROUX, PIERRE, le-roo', French philosopher and politician, began life as a mason, but became a compositor and journalist, and in 1824 was one of the founders of Le Globe, which he made the organ of St. Simonism. He afterwards edited or contributed to various reviews, and on the proclamation of the Republic in 1848 was elected mayor of Boussac, and was shortly afterwards returned to the Constituent Assembly, where he was more remarkable for the advocacy of impracticable but benevolent schemes than for practical ability. After the coup d'état of 1851, he took refuge, first in London, afterwards in Jersey, but returned to Paris, under the amnesty of 1860. He wrote a great number of works, explaining his peculiar democratic and socialistic opinions, a philosophic poem, and translated the "Werther" of Goethe.

Born in Paris, 1798; died 1871.

LEROY DE ST. ARNAUD, JACQUES, French marshal. He entered the army in 1816, but did not serve continuously until 1840, when he was appointed captain of the foreign legion in Algeria. His courage at the siege of Constantine obtained for him the cross of the legion of honour, of which, in reward for other distinguished services, he became a commander. In 1847 he was raised to the rank of marshal. He unscrupulously assisted Prince President Napoleon in the memorable coup d'état of December 1851, and was in 1854 appointed to the command of the French army, sent to the Crimea, where he died of disease, nine days after the battle of the Alma.

Born at Paris, 1800; died in the Crimea, 1854.

LERS, lair, a river of France, rising in the department Ariége, forming part of the boundary between that department and Aude. After a course of 70 miles it joins the right bank of the Ariége.

LERWICK, ler'-rik, a burgh of barony, chief town of the Shetland Islands, on the mainland, on the spacious harbour called Lerwick or Bressay Sound, 21 miles N.E. of Sunburgh Head. It consists of one principal street next the quay, with several lanes branching off. The church is modern. It is the seat of the Shetland courts of law, and is defended by a fort. Pop. 3,500, mostly employed in the herring and whale fisheries.

LE SAGE, ALAIN RÉNÉ, le(r)-saj', a celebrated French novelist, who, after completing his education at the Jesuits' college at Vannes, was engaged in a financial post in Brittany; but, in 1692, went to Paris, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He commenced by translating and imitating several Spanish works, and, in 1707, produced his first dramatic work,—"Crispin the Rival of his Master." In the same year he published "The Devil on Two Sticks," the plot of which was borrowed from the Spanish author Guevara. In 1708 he composed his comedy of "Turcaret," wherein he ridiculed the farmers-general, whose opposition nearly prevented the production of the piece upon the stage. In 1715 appeared the first part of his greatest work, "Gil Blas;" but the conclusion was not made public until 1735. He was likewise the author of "The Adventures of Don Guzman d'Alfarache," a considerable number of comedies and other humorous dramatic pieces. His fame, however, chiefly rests upon his "Gil Blas." An attempt was made to dispute the originality of the plot of this celebrated fiction; but it was never shown that Le Sage was not the true inventor of it.

Born at Sarzeau, 1668; died 1747.

LESBOS, les'-bos. (See MITYLENE.)

LESINA, les'-e-na, anciently called Pharos, an island of Austria, in the Adriatic, on the south coast of Dalmatia. It is 40 miles long, with an average breadth of from 2 to 4. It is partly occupied by a chain of hills, with precipitous cliffs at the coast, but some parts are undulating and fertile, producing wine, figs, rosemary oil, anchovies, and marble. Pop. 13,000.

LESINA, the principal town of the above island, on the south-west coast, 24 miles S. of Spalatro. It rises boldly from the shore, is defended by two forts, and has a cathedral and barracks. The harbour is good. Manf. Oil and spirit of rosemary. Pop. 2,800.

LESKOVATZ, les-ko-vats', a town of Turkey in Europe, on both sides of the Morava, 20 miles S.W. of Nissa. Pop. 10,807.

LESLIE, or LESLEY, JOHN, les'-le, bishop of Ross, in Scotland, a member of a famous historical family of Scotland, who accompanied Queen Mary from France to Scotland, and soon after became bishop of Ross and a privy counsellor. He zealously defended the Romish religion; and when Queen Elizabeth appointed commissioners to meet at York to consider the complaints made against Mary by her subjects, Leslie appeared in behalf of his mistress, whose cause he pleaded with great ability. He also tried many expedients to procure her liberty, for which he was committed to the Tower; but, in 1573, he recovered his liberty, on condition of quitting the kingdom. While abroad, he endeavoured to interest many foreign princes in the cause of Mary, and wrote several pieces in her defence. Being appointed vicar-general by the bishop of Rouen, he was, while visiting that diocese, seized by the Huguenots, who would have sent him to England; but he recovered his liberty by paying a ransom. He afterwards obtained the bishopric of Constance. His principal work is a history of Scotland.

Born 1527; died 1596.

LESLIE, ALEXANDER, soldier of fortune, an illegitimate member of the same family as the preceding. He entered the service of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and rose to be a field-marshal. In 1639 he commanded the army of the Covenanters in Scotland, and in 1641 was made Earl of Leven and Lord Balgony.

Died 1661.

LESLIE, CHARLES, a theological controversialist, who after receiving his education at Trinity College, Dublin, went, in 1671, to England, where he commenced the study of the law. A few years afterwards, he entered upon holy orders, and became chancellor of Cloyne, in Ireland. He accompanied the Pretender both in France and in Italy. In his old age he sought permission to return to his native land. George I. acceded to his request, and he thereupon took up his residence at Glaslough, in Ireland. His theological writings excited much attention in his time; and one of them, entitled "A Short and Easy Method with Deists," is still regarded as of considerable value. In addition to pamphlets against Hoadley, Locke, and Burnet, he published controversial pieces antagonistic to Quakers, Jews, Socinians, Deists, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics. His own views were those of a zealous Protestant, combined with an advocacy of high monarchical principles.

Born in Ireland, about 1650; died there, 1722.

LESLIE, CHARLES ROBERT, R.A., a distinguished artist. His father and mother were both born in America. When six years of age he was taken to Philadelphia, and was there sent to school, and subsequently apprenticed to a bookseller. Having shown considerable talents for design, he was sent to London in 1813, with letters of introduction to Benjamin West, at that time president of the Academy. As a student of the Royal Academy, he evinced great industry, and in the year 1820 exhibited his first picture, "Anne Page and Master Slender." He became an R.A. in 1826. In 1833, to the surprise of his friends, he accepted the post of drawing-master to the United States Military Academy; but he soon returned to England. As an illustrator of the productions of Shakspeare, Pope, Goldsmith, Addison, Molière, Cervantes, and Sterne, he achieved great triumphs. His delineation of Sancho Panza has never been equalled. In 1848 he was elected professor of painting at the Royal Academy, but resigned the appointment in 1851. He was also a clear and pleasant writer, and wrote "Memoirs of the Life of John Constable" and a "Handbook for Young Painters."

Born in London, 1794; died 1859.

LESLIE, SIR JOHN, an eminent natural philosopher, who, after completing his education at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, and travelling as tutor in the United States, returned to Scotland, and, obtaining letters of introduction to individuals of literary and scientific celebrity, set out for London, where he for some time gained a subsistence by translating and compiling scientific works. In 1805 he became professor of mathematics in the university of Edinburgh, not without considerable opposition on the part of the clergy, who objected to the appointment on account of Leslie's referring to Hume in a laudatory manner in one of his treatises. In 1819 he obtained the chair of natural philosophy, upon the death of Professor Playfair; and from that period until his death he produced a succession of valuable works on subjects connected with natural philosophy. In 1832 he was made a knight of the Guelphic order. He contributed treatises on Achromatic Glasses, Acoustics, Climate, Cold, Dew, Meteorology, &c., to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and also furnished the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Edinburgh Transactions" with many excellent papers. Among the larger works may be cited "The Elements of Geometry," "The Elements of Natural Philosophy," and an "Account of Experiments and Instruments depending on the Relation of Heat to Moisture." He was also the inventor of the differential thermometer.

Born at Largo, Fifeshire, 1766; died in Scotland, 1832.

LESNEVEN, lai'-ne-vai(n), a town of France, department Finistère, 16 miles N.E. of Brest. About a mile from the town is the church of Notre Dame of Folgoat, one of the most remarkable Gothic structures in Brittany. Pop. 2,700.

LESPES, NAPOLEON, French journalist, founder of the famous Petit Journal, in which he wrote under the signature "Timothée Trim." He served in a line regiment before adopting literature as a profession.

Born 1811; died 1875.

LESPINASSE, JULIE JEANNE ELÉONORE DE, lase-pe-nas', French literary lady, illegitimate daughter of the Countess d'Albon, for some years a companion of the Marchioness du Deffand, the intimate friend of d'Alembert, and afterwards her salon was the resort of the most eminent literary men of the time. She was greatly admired for her intellectual gifts and accomplishments. Her letters have been published.

Born at Lyons, 1732; died in Paris, 1776.

LESSEPS, FERDINAND DE, les'-sep, an eminent French engineer and diplomatist, who has represented the interests of his native country, as vice-consul and consul, in Spain, Portugal, Cairo, and other places. In 1854 he formed the project of cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Suez; but, although Robert Stephenson, and other eminent engineers, English and continental, have pronounced the idea to be impracticable, M. de Lesseps energetically defended his plan, and successfully carried it out. (See SUEZ.) He received the grand cross of the legion of honour, the grand cross of the Star of India, the freedom of the city of London, and other honours.

Born at Versailles, 1805.

LESSINES, les-seen', a town of Belgium, province of Hainaut, on the left bank of the Dendre, 21 miles N.E. of Tournay. It is surrounded by gardens on the site of the old walls. There are a large town-hall, three churches, and various literary and artistic institutions. Manf. Leather, soap, tiles, and earthenware. Pop. 5,700.

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM, les'-sing, an eminent German poet and general writer, son of a Lutheran clergyman. After studying at Leipsic he went to Berlin, where he made himself known by the publication of his celebrated fables. He subsequently produced his "Letters on Literature," which greatly contributed to improve the taste of his countrymen. In 1760 he accepted the post of secretary to the governor of Breslau; in 1770 he was appointed keeper of the Wolfenbüttel library, and soon afterwards produced his famous tragedy "Emilia Galotti." In 1779 he produced the famous dramatic poem "Nathan the Wise," perhaps the best known of all his works. He enriched the literature of Germany with masterpieces of different kinds, especially in the departments of biography, archæology, and the drama.

Born at Kamenz, 1729; died 1781.

L'ESTRANGE, SIR ROGER, le-strainj', an English writer. He received a liberal education, and, in 1639, attended Charles I. in his expedition to Scotland. He adhered to the royal cause, and, in 1644, was condemned as a spy; but, after remaining in confinement four years, he made his escape, and endeavoured to stir up an insurrection in Kent, which failed; whereupon he went abroad. In 1653 he returned to England, under shelter of Cromwell's act of indemnity. After the Restoration he was appointed censor of the press; he also set up a newspaper, called the "Public Intelligencer," which was discontinued on the publication of the "London Gazette," in 1665. In 1679 he commenced another paper, called the "Observator," designed to vindicate the court measures; this procured him the honour of knighthood. He was a violent and unscrupulous partizan, an industrious writer, and besides his own pamphlets, which were numerous, he published translations of several books, particularly Josephus, from the French version of D'Andilly; Seneca's Morals, Erasmus's Colloquies, and Quevedo's Visions.

Born in Norfolk, 1616; died 1704.

LE SUEUR, EUSTACHE, les-soo'-er, a celebrated French artist, surnamed the "Raphael of France." He studied under Vouet, and, early in life, attracted the notice of Poussin. Displaying great disregard of court patronage, he worked only for private individuals and for religious establishments, and, while still young, retired to a cloister. He was the first painter in France during the reign of Louis XIV., and surpassed Lebrun, his rival, in grace and vigour.

Born at Paris, 1617; died 1655.

LE SUEUR, JEAN FRANÇOIS, an eminent French composer, who became chapel-master to several cathedrals in France, and subsequently professor at the Conservatoire de Musique. He composed five grand operas, the most successful of which were "The Cavern" and "Paul and Virginia." He also wrote a treatise on Ancient Music, which is highly esteemed, as casting new light upon the obscure subject of the art of music among the Greeks. The emperor Napoleon I. created him a knight of the Legion of Honour, and appointed him his director of music.

Born near Abbeville, 1763; died 1837.

LE SUEUR, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Le Sueur.

LETCHER, let'-cher, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 309 square miles. Pop. 6,600. The capital is Whitesburg.

LETHE, le'-the, "oblivion," in Greek mythology, one of the rivers of the lower world, the waters of which the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus. The draught caused them to forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard before, as the name implies.

LETOURNEUR, PIERRE, le-toor'-noor, a French author, who was the first to make the works of Shakspere known to his countrymen, through the aid of translation. He also translated the poems of Young and Ossian, and the novel of "Clarissa Harlowe."

Born at Valognes, 1736; died at Paris, 1788.

LE VAILLANT, FRANÇOIS, le-vai'-yahn, French traveller and naturalist, son of the French consul in Dutch Guiana. He was educated at Metz, and when a young man inspected the collections of natural history in Paris, and determined to visit foreign countries and make collections. He made several excursions in South Africa; but finding that his health was unsuited to the climate, returned to Paris, and devoted himself to the preparation of the specimens he had secured, and writing accounts of his travels and discoveries. In 1793 he was arrested, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. His works, especially on ornithology, are highly valued.

Born at Paramaribo, Dutch Guiana, 1753; died in France, 1824.

LEVANT, le-vant'. This term properly signifies the East, or place where the sun rises, from the Italian, "Il levante," it rises; but it has been commonly applied to the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean, more especially those of Asia Minor and Syria, frequented by Europeans for mercantile purposes.

LEVANTO, le-van'-to, a town of Italy, province of Genova, on a small bay, 11 miles N.W. of Spezzia. On the land side it is defended by a wall, and towards the sea by a castle and several batteries. LEVEN, LOCH, le'-ven, a lake of Scotland, in the eastern part of the county of Kinross, about 11 miles in circumference. It contains four islands, on one of which stood the castle of Loch Leven, anciently a royal residence. Here Queen Mary was confined, in 1567-8, and signed her abdication of the Scottish crown. She escaped from it in 1568, to meet with an imprisonment of much longer duration and more fatal termination in England. On another and larger island, St. Serf's Inch, are the ruins of an abbey of great antiquity. Loch Leven abounds with pike, perch, eels, char, and very fine trout.

LEVENCZ, le-vencl', a town of Hungary, on the Pereez, 20 miles S.W. of Schemnitz. There are a college, gymnasium, and a castle. Important yearly markets are held. Pop. 5,200.

LEVER, CHARLES JAMES, a modern novelist, distinguished for his fictions illustrative of Irish life and character, and for the vigour and variety of his incidents. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and afterwards took the M.D. degree at Göttingen. After being attached to the British legation at Brussels, and spending some time in the practice of his profession, he abandoned it for literature. At the outset of his career in this latter employment, he was, with the single exception of Dickens, perhaps, the most popular author of the day; his "Harry Lorrequer," "Charles O'Malley," "Tom Burke," &c., were in every one's hands. During his after-career, his style became more thoughtful and sober: "The Knight of Gwynne" is an example of this. Several popular novels, known to have issued from his pen, were published anonymously; the best of them being "Con Cregan; or, the Irish Gil Blas," and "The Diary of Horace Templeton." Among his later works of fiction were "The Dodd Family Abroad," "Davenport Dunn," and "A Day's Ride." In 1858 he was appointed vice-consul at Spezzia, Italy, and was transferred to Trieste in 1867.

Born at Dublin, 1806; died at Trieste, 1872.

LEVERRIER, URBAIN JEAN JOSEPH, le-ver'-re-ai, a modern French astronomer, celebrated for his discovery of the planet Neptune. His first scientific labours were in chemistry; for, in 1837, he published two treatises on the combinations of phosphorus, as well as taking some part in the chemical department of the "Dictionary of Conversation;" but, in the year 1846, he had acquired sufficient celebrity as an astronomer to obtain admission to the Paris Academy of Sciences, and, a few months later, made known his great discovery. The same results had been attained within a few days of the same time by the English astronomer Adams. (See ADAMS.) Each, however, had laboured in ignorance of the other's pursuits; but the French astronomer was the first to publish the discovery. Leverrier soon rose to the highest honours which his country bestows upon scientific men; he was made officer of the Legion of Honour, director of the Board of Longitude, and professor of the Faculty of Sciences. The Royal Society of England likewise awarded to him, as well as to Adams, its Copley medal, the highest honour in its power to bestow, electing him a member at the same time. In 1849 he was returned as democratic member of the Legislative Assembly for the department of La Manche; and in 185- was raised to the senate. In 1854 he succeeded Arago as director of the Observatory of Paris, and retained that office until 1870.

Born at St. Lo, France, 1811.

LEVI, le'-vi, the third son of Jacob and of Leah. He was guilty of a dreadful massacre of the Shechemites, whose prince had violated the chastity of his sister Dinah. He went into Egypt with his father and brethren. His family, known as Levites, were consecrated to the service of God.

Born in Mesopotamia, 1748 B.C.; died in Egypt, 1611 B.C.

LEVICO, le-ve'-ko, a market town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, 12 miles S.E. of Trent, on a lake. There are several churches, a castle, and mineral springs. Pop. 5,700.

LEVINGSTON, JAMES, Earl of Callendar, lev'-ing-ston, a famous soldier of Scotland, was gentleman of the bedchamber to Charles I., who created him Lord Levingston of Almont in 1633, and afterwards earl of Callendar. In the civil war, he at first joined the parliament; but afterwards distinguished himself by his activity in the king's service. He took Carlisle, where he found a considerable supply of ammunition, and endeavoured to rescue Charles from his confinement in the Isle of Wight.

Died 1672.

LEVIS, le-'vis, a county of Quebec province, Canada, on the south of St. Lawrence river. Area, 256 square miles. Pop. 279,80, nearly all of French descent.

LEVIS, or POINT LEVI, capital of the above county, opposite Quebec. It is the landing-place for passengers arriving by steamers from Europe, and a large shipping trade is carried on. Pop. 7,597.

LEVROUX, lev-roo', a town of France, department Indre, 12 miles N. of Chateauroux, on the Nahon. There is a very fine church. Manf. Cloth and leather. There is a trade in corn, wine, wool, and cattle. Pop. 4,000.

LEVUKA, the former capital of the Fiji Islands, situated on the east coast of the island of Ovalau, has been superseded by Surva, which see. Levuka, though put in the second place, exhibits the good effects of British enterprise since the acquisition of the islands by the British government. There are hotels, boarding-houses, systematic bathing-places, government buildings, churches belonging to all the leading denominations, literary institute and library. Wesleyans are especially numerous.

LEVY, le'-vi, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 860 square miles. Pop. 6,100. The capital is Levywell.

LEWES, the county town of Sussex. The old castle was the residence of William de Warrenne, son-in-law of William the Conqueror, in which Henry III. was imprisoned after defeat by Simon de Montfort at the battle of Lewes. Pop. 6,017.

LEWIS, loo'-is, one of the largest and most northerly islands of the Hebrides, about 30 miles N.W. of Ross-shire, Scotland, parted by two arms of the sea into two divisions, the southern of which is called Harris, and the northern Lewis; the former belongs to Inverness-shire, the latter to Ross-shire. The chief town is STORNAWAY. Area, 770 square miles. Pop. 28,000.

LEWIS, kings of France. (See LOUIS.)

LEWIS, SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL, Bart., M.P., a modern English statesman and author. He studied at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he took a first-class in classics, and was called to the bar in 1831, although he never practised. After filling various subordinate posts under the Government, he was appointed poor-law commissioner in 1839, secretary of the Board of Control in 1847, under-secretary of the Home department in 1848, and secretary of the Treasury in 1850. Three years previously he had been elected M.P. for Herefordshire, but lost his seat in 1852. He was again returned to Parliament for Radnor in 1855, and was soon afterwards made chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Palmerston, an office he vacated in 1858. In the second administration of Lord Palmerston in 1859, he was appointed Secretary of State for the Home Department, and in 1861 succeeded Lord Herbert as Secretary for War. His first important literary production was a translation of Müller's "History and Antiquities of the Doric Race," which, together with the "Inquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History," may be considered the most profound of his historical efforts. Among his political works, the following are the best: "On the Use and Abuse of Political Terms," "Treatise on the Method of Reasoning in Politics," and the "Government of Dependencies." In 1854 he became editor of the "Edinburgh Review," a post he resigned upon taking office as Chancellor of the Exchequer. One of his latest works was an elaborate treatise on the "Astronomy of the Ancients." His increased mental activity weakened his constitution, and he died from congestion of the lungs.

Born in London, 1806; died 1863.

LEWIS, JOHN FREDERICK, a distinguished modern artist. In early life he painted both in oil and water, and engraved his works himself. He has achieved the greatest success in both Spanish and Eastern subjects. In 1855 he obtained the greatest mark of honour open to a water-colour artist; viz., the presidentship of the Society of Painters in Water-colours.

Born in London, 1805.

LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY, an English novelist, popularly known as "Monk Lewis." He was the son of a wealthy man, who was deputy-secretary at war. After studying at Christchurch, he went to Germany, where he became acquainted with Göthe, and imbibed a taste for the mysterious, and the tragic, exhibited in some of his translations from weird German ballads. The best-known of his romances is the "Monk," first published in 1794; a work charged with horrors and libertinism of spirit. He was nevertheless a kind and charitable man, as was evidenced by his treatment of the slaves upon the Jamaica estates he inherited from his father. He was a fluent versifier, and his "Alonzo the Brave" and "Bill Jones" are still found to contain interest. In 1812 he produced a drama, entitled, "Timour the Tartar," and subsequently a work called "Residence in the West Indies," since reprinted in Murray's Home and Colonial Library. He died while on a voyage home from the West Indies.

Born in London, 1775; died at sea, 1818.

LEWIS, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 13,154. The capital is Clarksburg.

LEWIS, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 520 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Monticello.

LEWIS, a county of New York, United States. Area, 1,288 square miles. Pop. 31,500. Martinsburg is the capital.

LEWIS, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 364 square miles. Pop. 2,000. Newburg is the capital.

LEWIS, a county of Washington territory, United States. Area, 1,580 square miles. Pop. 3,000. The chief place is Claquato.

LEWIS, a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 610 square miles. Pop. 13,200. The capital is Weston.

LEWIS, a much increasing county of Missouri, United States. There are productive gold-mines in the southern part. Area, 1,700 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Helena.

LEWIS ISLAND, in the Dampier Archipelago, lying off the N.W. coast of Australia, in lat. 20° 30′ S.; lon. 116° 30′ E.

LEWIS or SNAKE RIVER, a river of N. America, rising on the west side of the Rocky Mountains, in Nebraska territory, and, after a course of 900 miles, entering the Columbia (of which it may be considered as the great southern branch), 413 miles above its mouth.

LEWISBURG, capital of Union county, Pennsylvania, United States, on a branch of the Susquehanna, 50 miles N.W. of Harrisburg. There are four churches and a Baptist university. Pop. 3,500.

LEWISTON, a town of Maine, United States, on the Androscoggin river, 33 miles N. of Portland. The river has a considerable fall near this point, affording valuable water power, available for saw and other mills. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 19,000.

LEWISTOWN, capital of Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, United States, on the north side of the Juniata river, 142 miles N.W. of Philadelphia. Pop. 2,700.

LEXINGTON, lex'-ing-ton, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 980 square miles. Pop. 18,000, of whom about one-third are coloured. The capital is Lexington Court House.

LEXINGTON, a town of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, United States, 11 miles N.W. of Boston. Pop. 2,300.—Here the first battle was fought in the American war, on April 19th, 1775, and ended disastrously for the British.

LEXINGTON, capital of Rockbridge county, Virginia, United States, on North river, 110 miles N.W. of Richmond. It is the seat of the Washington and Lee University. Pop. 3,000.

LEXINGTON, capital of Fayette, county of Kentucky, United States, on Town Fork, a small stream which enters the Elkhorn, 70 miles east of Louisville. It is well built and beautifully situated in a fertile country, and possesses a court-house, a State lunatic asylum, State university, hospital, orphan asylum, and 12 churches. There is a very fine cemetery. Manf. Carriages, ropes, and bagging. Pop. 16,500.

LEXINGTON, capital of Lafayette county, Missouri, United States, on the left bank of the Missouri, 92 miles N.W. of Jefferson City. Pop. 4,500.

LEYDEN, li'-den, a city of the Netherlands, in South Holland, on the Rhine, 22 miles S.W. of Amsterdam. It is the oldest town in Holland, and is traversed by canals, which, by their various intersections, form upwards of 50 petty islands, connected together by above 100 small bridges, mostly of wood. The principal streets are broad, well paved, and somewhat raised in the middle; so that no water can remain on them. The street in which the Stadthouse is situate, is accounted among the finest in Europe. It extends, in the form of a crescent, from one end of the town to the other. The houses are for the most part of brick, built with the gable-ends to the street. Many of them are five or six stories high. Of public buildings, the Stadthouse is a picturesque structure, with a stone front, a tall tower, and projecting gables. The church of St. Peter is a large and handsome building in the Gothic style. There are 13 other churches, and a synagogue. In the centre of the town is a very ancient castle or fort, considered as a work of the Romans. The other public buildings are the arsenal, the custom-house, and the hospitals. The university, founded in 1575, was formerly famous throughout Europe, and the names of some of the most eminent scholars have been connected with it. It was founded by the Prince of Orange, who offered the citizens the alternative of a remission of taxation or the foundation of a university, the latter being chosen. Connected with it are museums of natural history, cabinets of comparative anatomy, an Egyptian museum, botanic garden, and an extensive library. There are, besides, many learned institutions. Manf. These have greatly declined; woollens, linen, and calico, being now made only on a small scale; but it has a considerable trade in butter, cheese, and grain. Pop. 26,827.—In 1574, Leyden sustained a long siege from the Spaniards, and the inhabitants suffered terrible privations; in 1655 it was ravaged by the plague, and in 1807 was greatly injured by an explosion of gunpowder, which destroyed the finest portion of the city.

LEYDEN, LUCAS VAN, a Dutch painter in oil, distemper, and on glass; also an eminent engraver, producing works which rank with those of Albert Dürer. His picture of the "History of St. Hubert" procured him a great reputation.

Born at Leyden, 1494; died 1533.

LEYDEN, JOHN, Dr., Scotch poet and philologist. He was the son of a poor shepherd, but exhibiting great talents, was sent at the age of 15 to the university of Edinburgh, and when 23 years old was licensed to preach. In the following year he published a history of discoveries and settlements by Europeans in Northern and Central Africa, at the close of the 18th century. He also contributed several ballads to the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and secured the friendship of Sir Walter Scott, and other eminent men. Having studied medicine with amazing rapidity, the university of St. Andrew conferred upon him the degree of M.D. In 1803 he went to India, soon mastered the principal languages of that country, and was appointed professor of Hindostanee in the college of Calcutta, a judge and assay master of the mint. He accompanied the British troops in the expedition to Java, and on the capture of Batavia proceeded to examine the library, but caught a malignant fever, and died in three days. There is a monument to his memory in his native village.

Born at Denholme, Roxburghshire, 1775; died at Batavia, 1811.

LEYS, JAN AUGUSTE HENRI, Baron, laize, Belgian painter, educated first for the priesthood, but at an early age cultivated art, and studied in Holland and France. He painted many subjects from early Belgian history, and speedily obtained a great reputation. Among his latest works are a noble series of frescoes, illustrating the progress of liberty, with which he adorned the hotel de ville of Antwerp. He was created a baron by the king, Leopold II.

Born at Antwerp, 1815; died 1869.

LEYTE, lai'-tai, an island of the Indian archipelago, one of the most southern of the Philippines, lying to the S. of Samar. It is mountainous and volcanic, and 130 miles long, with an average breadth of 35. It produces cotton, rice, ebony, and other fine woods. Pop. 220,515.

LEYTHA, li'-ta, a river of Germany, forming part of the boundary between Austria and Hungary. After a course of 90 miles, it joins the Raab at the town of that name.

LEZAT, le-za', a town of France, department Ariége, on the right bank of the Leze, 17 miles N.W. of Pamiers. Pop. 2,800.

LEZAY, le-zai', a town of France, department Deux-Sèvres, 7 miles N.E. of Melle. It is famous for a breed of horses. Manf. Linen, rope, brick, tiles, and lime. Pop. 2,400.

LEZOUX, le-zoo', a town of France, department Puy-de-Dôme, on the right bank of the Allier, 15 miles N.E. of Clermont. It is an old town, but well built, with agreeable promenades. Manf. Earthenware, leather, and oil. Pop. 3,700.

LHWYD, EDWARD, thloud, a Welsh antiquary, who employed a considerable part of his life in searching into the Welsh antiquities, in the execution of which task he perused or collected a great deal of ancient and valuable matter from their MSS.; transcribed all the old charters of the monasteries that he could meet with; travelled several times over Wales, Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland, Armoric Bretagne, countries inhabited by the same people; compared their antiquities, and made observations upon the whole. Many of his observations were inserted in Gibson's edition of Camden's "Britannia." He also published, in 1707, the "Archæologia Britannica; or, an Account of the Languages, Histories, and Customs of the Original Inhabitants of Great Britain, &c.," folio. He left, in MS. a Scottish or Irish-English dictionary, and other proofs of his learning and industry.

Died 1709.

LIANCOURT, li'-an-koor, a parish and town of France, department Oise, 5 miles from Clermont. Pop. 1,500.—It is a station on the Paris and Brussels Railway.

LIBANIUS, li-bai'-ne-us, an ancient sophist. He became so eminent a teacher at Constantinople, that some other professors procured his banishment on the charge of magic. He then went to Nicomedia, where he obtained a great number of disciples, amongst whom was Julian, afterwards called the Apostate; but his adversaries were again too strong for him, and he settled down in his native city. Although remaining a pagan, he taught philosophy to St. Chrysostom and St. Basil.

Born at Antioch, Syria, 314; died 393.

LIBANUS. (See LEBANON.)

LIBAU, le-bou', a seaport of European Russia, in Courland, on the Baltic, 70 miles from Memel. There is a secure harbour. The town is inclosed by walls, and contains a castle and a cathedral. There is a considerable trade in wine, fruit, and salt herrings, and shipbuilding is extensively carried on. Pop. 27,418.

LIBERIA, li-beer'-e-a, an independent negro republic of W. Africa, on the Grain Coast of Upper Guinea. The length of coast is about 500 miles, and the average breadth of the territory 50 miles. This country has been, by the American Colonization Society, purchased from time to time, and has been greatly improved. It produces coffee, cotton, indigo, camphor, ginger, arrow-root, hides, ivory, and gold dust. Pop. 1,068,000, all descended from African races, though about 20,000 have migrated from America, chiefly derived from the United States, and the remainder aborigines or captives released from slave-ships. Lat. between 4° 50′ and 7° N. Lon. between 6° 50′ and 12° 39′ W.

LIBERIUS, li-be'-re-us, Pope, a native of Rome, who succeeded Pope Julius I. in 352. He took an active part in the great Arian dispute, and was deposed and banished by the emperor Constantius for refusing to confirm the decrees of his councils which had condemned Athanasius. He was restored three years afterwards. He had a great reputation for sanctity.

Died 366.

LIBERTAS, li-ber'-tas, in Latin mythology, a goddess of Rome, who had a temple on Mount Aventine. She was represented as a woman in a light dress, holding a rod in one hand and a cap in the other, both signs of independence; as the former was used by the magistrates in the manumission of slaves, and the latter was worn by slaves who were soon to be set at liberty.

LIBERTY, lib'-er-te, a county of Florida, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 1,100. The chief place is Bristol.

LIBERTY, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 660 square miles. Pop. 10,649, of whom about two-thirds are coloured. The capital is Hinesville.

LIBERTY, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,600 square miles. Pop. 4,500, about 2,000 being coloured. The capital is Liberty.

LIBERTY, the capital of Clay county, Missouri, United States, and 13 miles N.E. of Kansas City. Pop. 2,000.

LIBETH, or LUBJETORA, le-bet', a mining town of Hungary, at the confluence of the Hutna and Udvoka, 12 miles E. of Neusohl. It has mines of iron and copper. Manf. Cutlery and earthenware. Pop. 1,600.

LIBOLLO, li-bol'-lo, a territory of Western Africa, Kimbunda country, separated by the Coanza from the Portuguese settlements. Area, about 2,000 square miles. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 9° 15′—10° 30′ S. Lon. 14° 35′—15° 20′ E.

LIBOURNE, le-boorn', a town of France, department of Gironde, on the right bank of the Dordogne, at its confluence with the Isle, 20 miles N.E. of Bordeaux. It is enclosed by walls, and has a cavalry barracks. The harbour is good. Manf. Cotton yarn, iron, glass, leather, rope, and nails. A trade in timber, wine, spirits, and grain is carried on, and there are shipbuilding yards. Pop. 16,000. —This place was founded by Edward I. of England, in 1286.

LIBRILLA, li-bril'-la, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, 15 miles S.W. of the town of that name. There are suburbs on the opposite side of a ravine, communicated with by a bridge. Manf. Saltpetre and oil. Pop. 3,000.

LIBYA, lib'-e-a, the name given to the whole of Africa, Egypt excepted, by the old Greek poets and geographers. The vast sandy tract to the west of Egypt, including the eastern part of Sahara, was generally known as the Libyan desert.

LICHFIELD, lich'-feeld, a city, municipal and parliamentary borough and county in itself of Staffordshire, 17 miles S.E. of Stafford. The cathedral is supposed to have been founded in 667, and was afterwards much enlarged and improved. It is one of the noblest religious edifices in the kingdom, extending 411 feet in length and 67 in breadth. In the centre rises an elegant steeple to the height of 280 feet, and two smaller ones at the west end, each 180 feet. The interior is finished with corresponding elegance and splendour. The bishop's palace is situate at the north-east corner; the deanery house stands west from the palace. St. Chad's is the oldest church in the town. St. Michael's has been recently restored, and St. Mary's is a handsome modern edifice. The other public buildings are the market-house, the guildhall, and gaol; also a theatre, various schools, and a grammar-school, formerly free, at which were educated Addison, Garrick, and Johnson. Of the latter there is a statue in the market-place. Nearly opposite to it is the Hospital of St. John, originally a monastery. There are, besides, several other charitable institutions. Manf. Flax, paper, carriages and harness, and some carpets (formerly an important manufacture). Pop. 8,360.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

LICHTENSTEIN, leezh'-ten-stine, a town of Saxony, circle Zwickau, 14 miles S.W. of Chemnitz. It stands at the foot of a mountain crowned by a castle. Manf. Linen, cotton, and paper. Pop. 4,500.

LICHTERVELDE, leezh'-ter-veld, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, 12 miles S. of Bruges. Manf. Woollens, linen, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 6,000.

LICINIUS, Caius, li-sin'-e-us, a Roman tribune, born of a plebeian family, who rose to the rank of tribune, when he obtained the surname of Stolo, or Useless Sprout, on account of the law which he enacted forbidding any one to possess more than 500 acres of land; alleging as his reason, that when they cultivated more, they could not pull up the useless shoots (stolones) which grew from the roots of trees. He also made another law, which allowed the plebeians to share the consular dignity with the patricians; and he himself became one of the first plebeian consuls, B.C. 364.

Lived in the 4th century, B.C.

LICINIUS, Caius Flavius Valerianus, emperor of the East, the son of a Dacian peasant, became a soldier in the Roman army, and Maximinus subsequently made him his coadjutor in the empire, and gave him the government of Pannonia and Phœacia. Constantine had a great esteem for him, and bestowed his sister on him in marriage; but afterwards a serious difference broke out between the two emperors, which ended in the death of Licinius, after several battles.

Died 323.

LICKING, lik'-ing, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 666 square miles. Pop. 40,000. The capital is Newark.

LICKING, a river of the United States, rising in Kentucky, and joining the Ohio at Newport, opposite Cincinnati, after a course of 180 miles.

LICODIA, le-ko'-de-a, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, on the Dirillo, 30 miles S.W. of Catania. Pop. 7,000.

LIDKÖPING, lid-che(r)'-ping, a town of Sweden, at the mouth of the Lida, on the south side of Lake Wener, 136 miles S.W. of Stockholm. A large trade in corn is carried on. Pop. 3,500.

LIEBENAU, le'-be-nou, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the right bank of the Mohelka. There are a handsome town house and a Protestant church. Pop. 3,000.

LIEBENWALDE, le'-ben-vald, a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, on the left bank of the Havel, 37 miles N.E. of Potsdam. There are shipbuilding docks, and a trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 2,500.

LIEBENWERDA, le-ben-ver'-da, a walled town of Prussia, province of Saxony on the left bank of the Black Elster, 60 miles N.E. of Merseburg. A trade in wool is carried on. Pop. 2,600.

LIEBIG, Justus, Baron von, le'-big, a distinguished German chemist. In early life he served in an apothecary's establishment, but was afterwards sent to the university at Bonn, and, still later, to Erlangen, where he took the M.D. degree. In 1822 he went to Paris, where he devoted himself to the study of chemistry. The first result of this labour was the composition of a paper on "Fulminates," which on being read, in 1824, at the Institute of France, brought the young chemist under the notice of Humboldt, who was then residing at Paris. Through Humboldt's influence, Liebig was soon after appointed extraordinary professor of chemistry at Giessen, where, in 1826, he founded a laboratory for teaching practical chemistry. This was the famous Giessen establishment, in which the best chemists of Germany and England have been educated. With the assistance of Hofmann, Will, Fresenius, and others, Liebig there originated or tested almost every theory of importance in chemical science. To Liebig the department of organic chemistry is greatly indebted for numerous discoveries of the highest importance. As he is a clear and elegant writer, the result of his profound labours has been made palpable to the mind of the least professional person. Merely to enumerate those books which have been translated and published in England will afford a fair notion of his great labours. These are,—"Chemistry in its application to Agriculture and Physiology;" "Principles of Agricultural Chemistry;" "Animal Chemistry; or, Chemistry in its application to Physiology and Pathology;" "Researches on the Chemistry of Food," and "Familiar Letters on Chemistry." This last has done more to popularise the study of chemistry than any other single book ever written. Liebig's great talents and distinguished services have been appreciated very extensively. In 1845 he was made a grand baron by the grand-duke of Hesse; in 1840 he became fellow of the Royal Society of England, and was also requested to fill several professorships, which offers he refused. He was a fellow of almost every learned body on the continent of Europe and in America; and, in 1854, a subscription, amounting to £1,000, was raised in Europe for the purpose of presenting him with five pieces of plate.

Born at Darmstadt, 1803; died 1873.

LIECHTENSTEIN, principality of, leezh'-ten-stine, a small independent state of South Germany, inclosed by a part of the Tyrol and the Swiss cantons of St. Gall and the Grisons. It is divided into the districts of Vadutz and Schellenberg, and the chief town is Liechtenstein. Area, 60 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

LIÈGE, le'-aizh (in Flemish Luyk, and in German Lüttich), a province of Belgium, in the south-east part of the kingdom, and comprising a part of the Forest of Ardennes. The aspect of the country is that of an undulating plain, except in the south and east, where it is hilly and covered with extensive forests. The northern part, or Herve land, is fertile, and affords excellent pasturage. There are noted mineral waters.

Rivers.—The principal is the Maas. Of the subordinate streams, the most considerable are the Ourthe, the Vesdre and the Amblève.

Area.—1,106 square miles.

Pop.—702,149.

LIÈGE, the capital of the above province, stands on the Meuse (which, on entering the town, divides into a number of branches, and is crossed by 17 bridges), 54 miles from Brussels. There are an old and a new town separated by the river. In general although extremely picturesque, when seen from a little distance), it is an ill-built town, without that cleanliness and neatness which mark most towns of the Netherlands. The most interesting public buildings are the cathedral (completed in the 16th century), the ancient and very interesting churches, St. Martin's, St. Jacques, the Holy Cross, and St. Barthelemy; the large palace of justice (a splendid edifice, with richly decorated porticoes and open courts, formerly the residence of the prince-bishop), and the university. The fountains, particularly one near the centre of the great square, deserve the attention of the tourist.

Manf.—Swords, bayonets, cannon, muskets, and rifles; also locomotives and other machinery, clock-work, and nails; cloth, serge, black lace, earthenware, glass, vitriol, and verdigris. There are, besides, zinc-works, sugar-refineries, tanneries, and distilleries.

Pop.—133,044. From 1793 to 1814 Liège was the capital of the French department of Ourthe.

LIEGNITZ, leeg'-nitz, a town of Prussia, in Silesia, at the conflux of the Katzbach, the Schwarzwasser, and the Neisse, 40 miles W. of Breslau. It is a handsome old town, defended by a castle, surrounded by a boulevard, and there are fine suburbs. The principal objects of interest are the Catholic church of St. John, the Ritter Academie, five churches, and the superb chapel where the dukes of Leignitz and Brieg were buried. There are several art collections, industrial museums, and many educational and benevolent institutions. Manf. Woollen cloths, table-linen, hosiery, leather, and tobacco, and, in its vicinity, horticulture is much practised. Pop. 37,157.—Here, in 1760, the Austrian army was totally defeated by the Prussians under the command of Frederick the Great; and in 1811 Blücher defeated the French.

LIERRE, le'-air, a town of Belgium, province of Antwerp, at the junction of the two Nethes, 10 miles S.E. of Antwerp. It contains several churches and a hospital. Manf. Silk, lace, embroidery, linen, and musical instruments. There are also distilleries and breweries to a great extent. Pop. 17,000.

LIESTAL, or LIESTHAL, leest'-al, a town of Switzerland, on the Ergolz, 8 miles S.E. of Basel. The chief buildings are St. Catherine's church, and a finely carved town-hall. Manf. Gloves. Three annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,500.

LIFFEY, lif'-fe, a river of Ireland, on the banks of which stands Dublin. It rises in the mountains of Wicklow, about 12 miles S.W. of the capital, and after a course of 50 miles, falls into the Bay of Dublin.

LIFU, lif-foo, the largest and most northern of the Loyalty Islands. It is 37 miles long, 15 broad, and of coral formation, with steep shores. Pop. 3,500. Lat. 20° 27′ S. Lon. 167° 47′ E.

LIGARIUS, QUINTUS, li-gair'-e-us, proconsul in Africa, who conducted himself so well in that station, that, at the desire of the people, he was appointed perpetual governor. He opposed Cæsar, who pardoned him after the defeat of Scipio. Not thinking himself safe, he absented himself from Rome, on which account Tubero accused him; but Ligarius was defended by Cicero, and acquitted. He was one of the conspirators with Brutus and Cassius against Cæsar.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, divine and Hebrew scholar. He studied at Cambridge, entered into holy orders, and became chaplain to Sir Rowland Cotton. In 1642 he was appointed to the living of St. Bartholomew's, London, and in the following year was one of the Westminster assembly of divines. In 1643 he was elected master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and in 1655 vice-chancellor of the university. He was considered the best Hebraist of the time, and his work on the Talmudic writings is of considerable value.

Born at Stoke-upon-Trent, 1602; died at Ely, 1675.

LIGNE, CHARLES JOSEPH, Prince de, leen, a celebrated general in the service of Austria, famous for his wit, the graces of his person, and for his military talents. He distinguished himself under the Austrian standard during the Seven Years' War, and in the subsequent campaigns, becoming, in 1771, lieutenant-general. He was a favourite with Maria Theresa, and particularly with Joseph II., who, in 1782, sent him to Russia, on a mission to Catherine II. He became the intimate friend of Catherine, and was charged to participate with the Russian general Potemkin in acting against the Turks. In 1789 he greatly contributed to the taking of Belgrade. He subsequently fell under the displeasure of the successors of Joseph II., but was, nevertheless, created field-marshal by Francis II. in 1808. De Ligne's reputation as a wit was of the highest order in continental society. He was an industrious writer, and left behind some thirty volumes of journals, military memoirs, &c. A selection from these, under the title of "Letters and Opinions of the Prince de Ligne," was published by Madame de Staël in 1809.

Born at Brussels, 1735; died 1814.

LIGNIERES, leen-ye-aire', a town of France, department Cher, on the Arnon, 25 miles S.W. of Bourges. It is famous for patés, which are named from it. There is a trade in cattle, and nine annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,800.

LIGNY, leen'-ye, a village of Belgium, province of Namur, 10 miles N.E. of Charleroi. It was the scene of an obstinate battle between the Prussians and French, in which, after severe loss, the former gave way, on the 16th of June, 1815, two days before the battle of Waterloo.

LIGNY, a town of France, department Meuse, on the right bank of the Ornain, 10 miles S.E. of Bar-le-Duc. Manf. Anvils, for which it is famous; cotton, leather, and iron. Pop. 3,800.

LIGONIER, JOHN, Earl of, lit'-go-neer, field-marshal of the English army, who served in all the wars of Queen Anne, under the duke of Marlborough, with the greatest distinction, and was employed in every succeeding war.

Born 1678; died 1770.

LIGORIO, PIRRO, le-gor'-e-o, a painter and architect of Naples, whose designs, after the antique, make thirty volumes in folio. Ligorio was nominated architect of the church of St. Peter, at Rome, in the pontificate of Paul IV., but was deprived of that post afterwards, and was succeeded by Michael Angelo.

Died 1580.

LIGUORI, ALFONZO MARIA DE, le-goo-o'-re, founder of the Roman Catholic order of Liguorians, or Redemptorists. He was a member of a noble Neapolitan family, and for a time practised as a lawyer; but in 1725 was ordained a priest, and in 1732, with 12 others, founded an association of missionary priests. In 1762 he was appointed bishop of Sant Agata dei Goti, in Naples, but after 13 years' faithful discharge of episcopal duties, resigned his see and returned to his order. He wrote a large number of theological works, and his works on casuistry are regarded as of great authority. In 1839 he was canonized by the pope.

Born at Naples, 1696; died at Nocera dei Pagani, 1787.

LIGURIA, a province of north-western Italy. Pop. 911,018.

LILBURNE, JOHN, lil'-burn, political adventurer, who, in 1636, became assistant to Dr.

Eastwick, and was employed by him in circulating his seditious pamphlets, for which Lilburne was whipped, pilloried, and imprisoned. In his confinement he wrote several virulent tracts against the church; but in 1640 he regained his liberty, and was rewarded by parliament with a grant of £2,000 out of the estates of the royalists. He then entered into the army, and became a colonel, in which capacity he behaved gallantly at the battle of Marston Moor; but, publishing a libel against the earl of Manchester, he was confined in the Tower. In 1648 he was released and remunerated; but he still continued writing libels, particularly against parliament, for which he was heavily fined and banished. Lilburne withdrew privately to Holland, where he joined the royalists, and proposed to restore the king for £10,000, which offer was treated with contempt.

Born at Durham, 1618; died 1657.

LILLE, or LISLE, leel, a town of France, capital of the department Nord, situate on the Deule, 127 miles N. of Paris. The river is navigable, and is divided into branches, which traverse the town. Wide streets have been recently made, connecting the town with the suburban villages of Fives, Wagemmes, and Moulins-les-Lille. It is well built, with straight streets, large squares, and handsome houses. The principal square is the Place d'Armes. Among the public buildings are the Gothic church of St. Maurice, said to date from the 11th century; the old palace, built in 1430, now the town-hall, containing an excellent school of art; a triumphal arch in honour of Louis XIV., a large hospital, the barracks, the exchange, the mint, the corn-market, and the theatre. The Deule is crossed in the town by several bridges, and along part of a canal is the fine esplanade, near to which is the handsome Pont Royal. The town is strongly fortified, and the citadel, the masterpiece of Vauban, is a mile in circuit, and is surrounded by a double moat. Manf. Woollen stuffs, blankets, Lille thread, hosiery, tulle, ribbons, cotton, calico, linen, silk, velvet, lace, carpets, soap, starch, paper, beetroot sugar, tobacco, leather, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 178,144.—Originated in a strong castle, built probably by the Romans, and named, from its position, Isola, from which the modern name is derived. Louis XIV. took it from the Spaniards in 1667, and it became the capital of French Flanders. It surrendered in 1708, to the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, and at the peace of Utrecht it was restored to France.

LILLEBONNE, leel-bon', a town of France, department Seine-Inférieure, 9 miles E. of Havre. There are a church with a fine spire, an old castle, and many interesting Roman remains. Manf. Cotton and leather. Pop. 5,000.

LILLERS, leel-lair', a town of France, department of Pas de-Calais, on the Nave, 24 miles N.W. of Arras. The church was founded in the 12th century. Manf. Linen, shoes, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 5,000.

LILLO, GEORGE, lil'-lo, an English tragic writer, who carried on the business of a jeweller during many years with great success. His plays, founded on common incidents, are constructed with the purpose of showing how easy is the advance from small to greater crimes. His best play is the "Fatal Curiosity." His "George Barnwell" was usually acted on Boxing-night, it having been held to convey a useful lesson to young men; but the custom has long since died out.

Born 1693; died 1739.

LILLY, or LYLY, JOHN, an English author, studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and afterwards went to London, where he was in high repute as a court wit. He was a dramatic poet of considerable power, but is best known by his "Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit," which set the fashion of the fantastic Euphuistic style of conversation and writing ridiculed by Shakspeare and Scott.

Born in Kent, 1553; died 1600.

LILLY, WILLIAM, lil'-le, an English astrologer. After receiving some education, he went to London, and became book-keeper to the master of the Salters' Company, on whose death he married his widow. In 1632 he became the pupil of Evans the astrologer, and soon excelled his master. He was employed by both parties during the civil wars, and even Charles I. is said to have made use of him. Lilly was certainly consulted respecting the king's projected escape from Carisbrook Castle. He, however, gained more from the parliament party; and the predictions contained in his almanacks had a wonderful effect upon the soldiers and common people. After the Restoration, he was examined respecting the king's executioner, who, he affirmed, was Cornet Joyce. He was apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in causing the great fire in London, but liberated in the absence of evidence. His principal works are "Christian Astrology;" "A Collection of Nativities;" "Observations on the Life and Death of Charles, late King of England;" "Annus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year."

Born at Diseworth, Leicestershire, 1602; died 1681.

LILY, or LILLY, WILLIAM, an eminent grammarian, who, after completing his education at Oxford, went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. In this journey he learned the Greek language at Rhodes. On his return to England, in 1509, he was appointed master of St. Paul's school; which trust he discharged with great reputation, and educated many eminent scholars. His "Latin Grammar," which was ordered by royal authority to be used in all schools, was not wholly of his own composition, part of it being written by Cardinal Wolsey, and part by Erasmus and Colet. He likewise wrote several grammatical pieces. He died of the plague.

Born at Odiham, Hampshire, 1468; died in London, 1523.

LIMA, le'-ma, or li'-ma, a province of Peru, South America, bounded on the N. by Truxillo, E. by Tarma and Guancavelica, W. by the Pacific, and S. by Arequipa. Area, 38,000 square miles. Pop. 226,922.

LIMA, capital of Peru, on both banks of the Rimac, over which is an elegant stone bridge, 6 miles from its port, Callao, on the Pacific. The principal part of the city is on the left bank of the river, and is surrounded with a brick wall, flanked with numerous bastions, having, in its circumference, seven gates and three posterns. The smaller part, or San Lazari, is on the opposite side. The streets are broad, parallel, or at right angles; some running from north to south, and others from east to west, forming squares of houses, each 150 yards in front. They are well paved, and furnished, from the river, with streams, which are arched over, and rendered subservient to cleanliness and many other conveniences. The houses, though low, are generally commodious, and of a handsome appearance. They are constructed of wood, on account of the frequent earthquakes; but in such a manner as to resemble stone buildings. The grand square, the Plaza Mayor, in the middle of the city, is of great extent and beauty. The east side is occupied by the cathedral (in which Pizarro is buried) and the archbishop's palace, both of which are lofty and magnificent buildings, partly constructed with stone. On the north side is the viceroy's palace, containing the courts of justice and several public offices. On the west side are the senate-house, town-hall, and city prison; and the south is occupied with private houses. In the centre of the square is a noble bronze fountain, and on two sides are piazzas, forming attractive promenades. The other principal buildings are churches and chapels, which are partly built of stone, and decorated in the most splendid style with paintings and ornaments of the greatest value; the convent of San Francisco, and numerous other convents and monasteries, there being altogether 68 places of worship. There are a large university, several colleges and institutions for religious instruction, and many charitable foundations, hospitals for different objects, and numerous schools. Outside the walls are the public cemetery, baths, and promenades. There are 10 suburban villages. From the fertility of its neighbourhood, large quantities of provisions and live stock are produced. For a long period, Lima formed the grand entrepôt for all the W. coast of S. America, and it still has a large trade, exporting silver, copper, bark, nitre, sugar, chinchilla skins, and vicuña wool. Manf. Gold lace, fringe, cotton, chocolate, and paper. Pop. 101,488, including the villages. Lat. 12° 3′ S. Lon. 77° 5′ W.—The city has been, at various times, nearly destroyed by earthquakes. One of the most dreadful of these was that of 1687. Other earthquakes took place in 1697, 1699, 1716, 1725, 1732, and 1746. The city was founded by Pizarro in 1535.

LIMASAL, le-ma-sal', a seaport on the south side of the island of Cyprus. It is wretchedly built, but there is a good harbour. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 34° 41′ N. Lon. 33° 2′ E.

LIMBORCH, PHILIP VAN, lim'-bork, a learned divine, who, in 1686, published a "System of Theology," which passed through four editions. The same year he had a dispute with Orobio, a Spanish Jew, an account of which was published under the title of "De Veritate Religionis Christianæ amica Collatio cum erudito Judæo." Besides the above, he published the "History of the Inquisition," and other works. He was a friend and correspondent of John Locke.

Born at Amsterdam, 1633; died 1712.

LIMBURG, lam'-boor, a province of the Netherlands, in the S.E. part of the kingdom, bounded by Prussia, the provinces of Liège, S. Brabant, Antwerp, and N. Brabant, and the Belgian province of Limburg. The surface is generally level, and there are extensive moors and marshes. The rearing of live stock forms the principal branch of rural industry. Minerals. Iron, coal, calamine, and turf. Manf. Leather, paper, soap, glass, and tobacco. Area, 844 square miles. Pop. 249,018. The capital is MAESTRICHT.

LIMBURG, BELGIAN, a province of Belgium, inclosed by Dutch Limburg, Antwerp, Brabant, and Liège, partly separated from the Netherlands by the Meuse. The surface is level, with good arable and pasture land in the south, but barren heaths in the other parts. Large herds of cattle and swine are reared. Minerals. Iron, coal, and peat. Manf. Woollens and linens, paper, tobacco, pottery, beet sugar, soap, and straw hats. Area, 923 square miles. Pop. 216,794. The capital is HASSELT.

LIMBURG, a town of Prussia, province of Nassau, on the left bank of the Lahn, 20 miles N.W. of Wiesbaden. It is an ancient place, with a splendid cathedral, partly in the Byzantine and partly in the early Gothic style, with lofty towers, on an elevated site, overlooking the river. The town is walled, and has three suburbs. Pop. 4,300.

LIMBURG, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Lenne, 21 miles W. of Arnsberg. There are a castle, church, and synagogue. Manf. Linen and cotton goods, and iron. Pop. 3,500.

LIMEHOUSE, lime'-hous. (See LONDON.)

LIMERICK, lim'-e-rik, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, bounded on the N. by the river Shannon, which separates it from the county of Clare, S. by Cork, N.E. and E. by Tipperary, W. by Kerry. The surface, though diversified by small hills, is not, generally speaking, mountainous, excepting on the S.E., where it is bounded by the Galtees, a lofty ridge, which extends into Tipperary, and on the borders of Kerry, where the ground rises, and forms a grand amphitheatre of low but steep hills, which extend in a wide area from Loghill to Drumcolloher. The land throughout is generally fertile, especially in the district known as the Golden Vale, and on the left bank of the Shannon. There are many ecclesiastical and other interesting antiquities, including ruins of about 100 castles.

Rivers.—The principal are the Maigue, the Feale, the Gale, the Blackwater, and the Shannon.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, copper, lead, and marble.

Pro.—The usual crops, and dairy and stock farms are extensive. Large quantities of corn, butter, and cider are exported.

Area.—1,064 square miles.

Pop.—177,203, the majority Roman Catholics.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county and two for Limerick.

Chief Towns.—LIMERICK, Newcastle, and Rathkeale.

LIMERICK, a city and parliamentary borough of Ireland, and the capital of the above county, on the Shannon, about 60 miles from its mouth, and 120 miles S.W. of Dublin. It stands on an island, and on both banks of the river. The older part, or the English Town, with a large suburb, Thomond Gate, is on the north side of the river, and the New Town, or Newtown Pery (formerly known as the Irish Town), is on the opposite side, and is very handsome and well-built. The principal public buildings are the new Roman Catholic cathedral and Redemptorist church, the bishop's palace, parish churches, friaries, convents, schools, an infirmary, asylums, hospitals, county and city courthouses and gaols, an exchange, chamber of commerce, a linen-hall, and markets. There is a good harbour, crossed by the Wellesley Bridge (the erection of which cost £85,000), and there are extensive and commodious docks and quays. Manf. Unimportant: the principal are lace, gloves, and fishing-hooks. There are numerous flour-mills, distilleries, breweries, tanneries, and foundries, and shipbuilding is carried on, and a considerable export and import trade. Pop. 30,562, nearly all Roman Catholics.—A station on the Great Southern and Western railway.—Limerick has always been deemed a place of importance. It was taken by the English in 1174; in 1651 it was taken by Ireton, the son-in-law of Cromwell; in 1690 it was unsuccessfully besieged by King William III. in person; in 1691 it surrendered to General Ginkle, afterwards Earl of Athlone, and the treaty of Limerick was signed on a stone which is still preserved. Before the Conquest, it was the seat of the king of Thomond.

LIMESTONE, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 575 square miles. Pop. 21,600, nearly half being coloured. The capital is Athens.

LIMESTONE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 16,246. The capital is Springfield.

LIMOGES, le-mozh', a town of France, department Haute-Vienne, on the Vienne, 67 miles S.E. of Poitiers. A number of the streets of this town are crooked; but it is not without handsome edifices, and several of its squares and fountains are greatly admired. The cathedral, said to have been begun by the English in the 13th century, is still unfinished. There are a handsome episcopal palace, college, university, academy, and several learned societies. Manf. Porcelain, pottery, druggets, packthread, and paper. Pop. 65,765.—This town was besieged and taken by the English in 1370.

LIMONE, le-mo'-ne, a town of northern Italy, 13 miles S. of Coni. There are a large Gothic church, several other churches, and a Capuchin convent. Pop. 3,000.

LIMOUX, le'-moo, a town of France, department Aude, on the left bank of the Aude. Manf. Fine broad-cloths, worsted, yarn, leather, and oil. Pop. 6,700.

LIMPOPO, or BEMBE, lim-po'-po, a river of South Africa, rising in the Transvaal Republic, and falling into the sea on the eastern coast, by a narrow mouth, obstructed by sandbanks, in lat. 25° 16′ S., after a course of 1,500 miles.

LINACRE, or LYNACER, THOMAS, lin'-a-ker, an eminent English physician, who, after completing his academical studies, went to Italy, where he studied under the same preceptor with the sons of Lorenzo de' Medici. On his return, he took his doctor's degree, and was made professor of physic at Oxford. Henry VII. appointed him preceptor to Prince Arthur; he also became physician to the king, and to Henry VIII. He founded two medical lectures at Oxford and one at Cambridge, and may be considered the first founder of the College of Physicians in London. Anxious to improve the practice of physic in England, he applied to Cardinal Wolsey, and obtained a patent, by which the physicians of London were incorporated, that illiterate and ignorant medicasters might no longer be allowed to practise the art of healing. Linacre was the first president, and held the office as long as he lived. In 1509 he entered into orders, and obtained the precentorship of York, which he resigned on being made prebendary of Westminster. He was a man of great natural sagacity, a skilful physician, and one of the best Greek and Latin scholars of his time. He translated some of the best pieces of Galen, and wrote the "Rudiments of Grammar" for the Princess Mary, and other works.

Born at Canterbury, about 1460; died 1524.

LINARES, le-na'-rais, a town of Spain, province of Jaen, chief town of a mining district. Pop. 36,627.

LINARES, a province of Chili. Area, 3,488 square miles. Pop. 134,172.

LINCOLN, lin'-kon, a city, municipal and parliamentary borough, the capital of Lincolnshire, on the Witham. It is a city of high antiquity, and the see of a bishop. It consists chiefly of two long streets, with several smaller cross and parallel ones. Of the public buildings, by far the principal is the cathedral, or minster, an elegant specimen of Gothic architecture, crowning the lofty hill on the slope of which the city is built. It has three lofty towers,—one in the centre 300 feet high, and two at the western end, each 180 feet high (formerly surmounted by spires), all richly decorated. The grand western front is the most distinguished for the beauty and magnificence of its architecture. This cathedral was first founded in 1086, and was rebuilt in 1283. The prevailing style is early English. Besides the cathedral, there are several parish churches, several of them very ancient. The remains of the episcopal palace, near the cathedral, are very interesting. The other public buildings and institutions are the castle, the county hall, the old guildhall, or Stone-bow, spanning the High-street, the county hospital, post-office, corn-exchange, several schools, an assembly-room, a theatre, asylum, union workhouse, market-house, libraries, and mechanics' institute. Few places in the kingdom afford so many remains of antiquity as Lincoln. There is a Roman gate in a good state of preservation. Manf. Iron, machinery, and agricultural implements. There are large steam flour-mills, and a considerable trade in flour, corn, and wool is carried on. Pop. 37,312.—A station on the Great Northern, Midland, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincoln railways.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, President of the United States. He was the son of a poor farmer in Indiana, and he had but a scanty education, and his early life was passed in hard labour, especially railsplitting, in which he was remarkably adroit, and from which a nickname afterwards given to him originated. He possessed considerable natural ability, and early in life showed an interest in public affairs. At the age of 25 he was elected to the Illinois legislature, and was afterwards three times re-elected. He found time to study law, and in 1836 commenced practice as a lawyer at Springfield. In 1846 he was elected to Congress, adopted anti-slavery views, and was soon recognized as a leader of the Republican party. In 1860 he was nominated for president by the Chicago Convention, and obtained more votes than any other candidate, although every southern and one northern state voted against him. He took office as president in March, 1861. The war of the Secession followed, and in 1863 President Lincoln proclaimed the abolition of slavery. He was re-elected to the presidency in 1864; but in April of the following year was shot in the theatre by a man named Booth. Lincoln preserved great decision of character and large views of policy, accompanied with homely shrewdness and humour.

Born in Kentucky, 1809; died 1865.

LINCOLN, a new county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 9,255. The chief place is Star City.

LINCOLN, a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 8,739. The capital is Hamlin.

LINCOLN, the capital of Nebraska territory, United States, on the right bank of Salt Creek, a tributary of the river Platte, 50 miles S.W. of Omaha. There are a state university, penitentiary, and lunatic asylum. Pop. 13,000.

LINCOLN, a county of Ontario province, Canada, on the south side of Lake Ontario. Area, 321 square miles. Pop. 22,963. The capital is St. Catharine's.

LINCOLNSHIRE, lin'-kon-sheer, a maritime county of England, on the eastern coast, lying between the estuaries of the Humber and the Wash, and bounded on the E. by the German Ocean; N. by the river Humber, which divides it from Yorkshire; W. by the counties of York, Nottingham, and Leicester; and S. by the counties of Rutland, Northampton, and Cambridge; though but little diversified in its aspect and surface, it yet presents three great natural divisions,—the Wolds, the Heaths, and the Fens; also known as the Parts of Lindsey, the Parts of Kesteven, and the Parts of Holland. The Wolds commence near Spilsby, and extend, in a north-westerly direction, to Barton-on-the-Humber. They are, on an average, nearly 8 miles in breadth, and the most elevated portion of the county. The Heaths, north and south of Lincoln, extend from the Humber to Grantham, and were formerly barren, but are now chiefly inclosed and cultivated. Along the foot of the Wolds is a low land, which forms a district called the Marsh, a long and rather narrow strip, extending from Wainfleet, on the Wash, to the Humber. To the south of this is the district of the Fens, which forms the northern termination of the great fenny district, which extends so widely over the counties of Norfolk, Cambridge, Bedford, and Huntingdon. The coast-line is almost uniformly low and marshy. The Fens form one of the richest tracts in the kingdom. They are adapted to all the ordinary crops, especially oats, which are raised in great quantities; but they are chiefly devoted to grazing. Many of the unimproved fens are devoted to the breeding and rearing of geese, their quills and feathers being in great request; immense quantities being sent to the London and other markets. Immense numbers of wild fowl are also caught in these fens by decoys. The soil of the Wolds consists of sand and sandy loam, upon flinty loam, with a substratum of chalk. Besides the ordinary live stock, a great number of rabbits are bred in this district. The soil of the Heaths is in general a good sandy loam, on a bed of limestone. These high grounds, which were formerly open, wild, and heathy, are now mostly inclosed, and produce all the ordinary crops. The number of oxen and sheep in the county is very great, and it has been long famous for its breed of horses.

Rivers.—The chief are the Trent, Ancholme, Witham, and Welland.

Area.—2,762 square miles. Except Yorkshire, this is the largest county in England.

Pop.—469,994.

Parliamentary Representation.—Six members are returned for the county; 2 for Lincoln and 2 for Boston, 2 for Grantham, and 1 for Great Grimsby.

Chief Towns.—LINCOLN, the capital; Boston, Gainsborough, Grantham, Great Grimsby, Horncastle, Louth, and Holbeach.

LIND, JENNY, Swedish vocalist. She was born of poor parents, but her talent for music attracting attention, she was admitted, when quite a child, into the Conservatory at Stockholm, and, at the age of 18, appeared on the stage in Der Freischütz. She afterwards studied at Paris, and appeared, but unsuccessfully, at the Grand Opera. She returned to Stockholm, where she achieved a triumph, and, on the recommendation of Meyerbeer, was engaged at Berlin. From that time she enjoyed an uninterrupted career of success. Rival managers competed for her services, and on her appearance in London, in 1849, she arousedn an almost unparalleled enthusiasm. She afterwards visited America and the West Indies, realizing enormous amounts of money. In America she married M. Otto Goldschmidt. Since then she has appeared in public only on a few special occasions. Her liberality is as conspicuous as her talent. She endowed schools in Sweden, at an expense of £40,000, and has unostentatiously contributed generously to many other good works. She has for many years past resided in the country.

Born at Stockholm, 1821.

LINDAU, lin'-dou, a town of Bavaria, circle of Suabia, on two islands in Lake Constance, connected with the shore by long wooden bridges. It is walled and fortified, and there is a good harbour. Manf. Surgical and musical instruments. Pop. 5,300.

LINDLEY, JOHN, LL.D., lind'-le, a distinguished English botanist. The son of a nursery-garden proprietor at Norwich, he, from his earliest years, evinced the greatest inclination for the study of botany. After translating Richard's "Analyse du Fruit" from the French, and contributing some valuable papers on botany to the Transactions of the Linnæan Society, he went to London, where he was engaged by Mr. Loudon to assist in the production of the "Encyclopædia of Plants." His first work of importance was published in 1830. This was the "Introduction to the Natural System of Botany," followed by "Introduction to Systematic and Physiological Botany." For more than 30 years, Dr. Lindley filled the chair of botany at University College, London, and contributed to the science of which he was an untiring exponent, a great number of exceedingly important works. "The Ladies' Botany," written upon the model of Rousseau's "Botanical Letters," has proved one of the most popular books of science ever brought out in England. Of a similar character are his "School Botany" and the "Botany" which he wrote for the "Library of Useful Knowledge." After the year 1841 he was for many years horticultural editor of the "Gardeners' Chronicle." He was Ph. D. of the university of Munich, fellow of the Royal, Linnæan, and Geological societies, corresponding member of many continental and American learned bodies, and assistant-secretary to the Horticultural Society.

Born at Catton, near Norwich, 1799; died 1865.

LINDOS, lin'-dos, the ancient capital of the island of Rhodes, with a small harbour, 22 miles from Rhodes.

LINDPAINTNER, PETER JOSEF, lind'-paint-ner, German musical composer, who, at the age of 21, became conductor of the Royal Theatre, Munich, and in 1819 was appointed director of the Chapel Royal at Stuttgart, a position he retained until his death. He composed about 20 operas, an oratorio, and other compositions in almost every style.

Born at Coblenz, 1791; died 1856.

LINDSAY, or LYNDSAY, SIR DAVID, lind'-sai, a Scotch poet. In 1512 he became gentleman-usher to the young prince, afterwards James V., who subsequently appointed him lion-king-at-arms. He represented Cupar in the Scotch parliaments of 1542 and 1543, and was one of the Reformers who adopted the ministry of John Knox, as his poems were great aids to the Protestant cause.

Died 1555.

LINDSAY, a town of Ontario province, Canada, 57 miles N.E. of Toronto. There is a trade in lumber. Pop. 5,080.

LINGAGEN, lin-ga-gen', a commercial town of Luzon, one of the Philippine islands, situated on a bay of the same name. The town is well built, and there are several beautiful churches. There are large exports of rice, indigo, and sugar. Pop. 6,578.

LINGAH, or LINJA, lin'-ja, a town and port of Arabia, on the north-eastern side of the Persian Gulf. There are a harbour, dock, and ship-building yards. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 26° 37' N. Lon. 55° E.

LINGARD, JOHN, D.D., LL.D., lin'-gard, an eminent English historian. He was a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, and was educated in France. He held appointments in the Roman Catholic College at Ushaw, near Durham (of which he afterwards became president), and commenced authorship in 1805, by contributing to the "Newcastle Courant" a series of letters, which were afterwards republished under the title of "Catholic Loyalty vindicated." Besides several controversial works, he wrote a "History of the Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church," and made a translation of the New Testament into English. His great work was the "History of England from the first Invasion by the Romans to the Accession of William and Mary, in 1688." This has passed through many editions, and is generally allowed to be a work of great learning and research. The theological views of the writer colour many of his statements, as was to be expected; nevertheless, his religious opinions are never put forth in an offensive manner. For his services to literature, he was granted a pension of £300 per annum by the queen. The last years of his life were spent in retirement at Hornby, near Lancaster.

Born at Winchester, 1771; died 1851.

LINGEN, or LINGA, ISLE, lin'-ga, an island in the Indian archipelago, lying off the east coast of the island of Sumatra, and 100 miles from Singapore. It is 50 miles long, with a breadth of 20 at its extreme point. The surface is flat, except at the south-western extremity, where it rises into mountains. The soil is fertile, producing fruits and fine timber. Pop. estimated at 10,000. Lat. 0° 20' S. Lon. 104°—105° E.

LINGEN, ling'-en, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, 35 miles N.W. of Osnabruck. Manf. Linens, leather, starch, gunpowder, and vinegar. Pop. 4,500.

LINGUAGROSSA, lin-goo-a-gros'-sa, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, on the north-eastern slope of Mount Etna, 37 miles S.W. of Messina. Pop. 10,391.

LINKOPING, lin-che(r)-ping, a town of Sweden, and capital of a district of the same name, on the Stanga, 110 miles S.W. of Stockholm. It has a very beautiful Gothic cathedral, an old castle, a town-hall, house of assembly, gymnasium, and large library. Pop. 7,000.

LINLEY, THOMAS, lin'-le, an English musical composer, who set the music to Sheridan's opera, the "Duenna," and wrote the accompaniments to the airs in the "Beggar's Opera," which are still in use. His "Twelve Ballads," though now neglected, are exquisite melodics. Together with his son-in-law, Sheridan, and Dr. Ford, he was during many years engaged in the management of Drury-lane theatre. His daughter, Mrs. Sheridan, was the lady referred to by Macaulay in the famous description of the trial of Warren Hastings, as "the beautiful mother of a beautiful race, whose features, lighted up by love and music, art has rescued from the common decay," referring to the portraits of this lady by Gainsborough and Reynolds.

Born at Wells, about 1725; died 1795.

LINLEY, WILLIAM, son of the preceding, wrote two comic operas, and compiled "The Dramatic Songs of Shakspere," an excellent work. He likewise composed a large number of glees, characterized by grace and feeling.

Born about 1767; died 1835.

LINLITHGOW, lin-lith'-go, an ancient royal and parliamentary burgh and market-town, the capital of Linlithgowshire, 16 miles W. of Edinburgh. At the north side of the town stands the royal palace, a large quadrangular building, with towers at each corner. In this building is the room in which Queen Mary was born, on the 8th December, 1542. This palace was burnt in 1746, by the royal army, on their march to the battle of Falkirk. It is now roofless; but, even in ruins, it exhibits a most majestic appearance. At the south-east corner of the palace is the church of St. Michael's, a noble structure, built in the 15th and 16th centuries, of Gothic architecture, with a fine spire, ornamented with an imperial crown. The other public buildings are the town-house and prison. Manf. Leather and glue. Brewing and distilling, to some extent, are also carried on. Pop. 5,619. Linlithgow was constituted one of the principal burghs in the kingdom in the reign of David I., and has been the scene of many memorable transactions in the ancient history of Scotland.

LINLITHGOWSHIRE, or WEST-LOTHIAN, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the Firth of Forth, and S. by Edinburghshire and Lanarkshire, and W. by the latter county and Stirling. The surface is diversified by flat tracts and small hills, in no part exceeding 1,000 feet in height, whilst every description of soil is to be found within the limits of the shire. The richest carse clay, and some of the best loams, are in it, as well as a large portion of gravel and sandy soil, and some tracts of moss. Agriculture is greatly improved, and large crops of turnips are grown.

Rivers.—The chief are the Almond and the Avon, which forms the western boundary for 12 miles. Small streams, however, run in every direction.

Minerals.—Coal is found all over the county. In the hills of Bathcate lead-mines were formerly wrought. Ironstone and freestone are likewise found in various parts.

Area.—127 square miles.

Pop.—43,198.

Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county.

Chief Towns.—Linlithgow, Queensferry, Bathgate, and Borrowstounness.

LINN, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 33,000. The capital is Marion.

LINN, a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 13,000. The capital is La Cygne.

LINN, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 588 square miles. Pop. 17,000. The capital is Linneus.

LINN, a county of Oregon, United States. Area, 2,400 square miles. Pop. 9,000. The capital is Albany.

LINNÆUS, or VON LINNÉ, Karl, lin'-ne-us, a celebrated Swedish naturalist, was the son of a clergyman. After struggling with poverty during several years, he succeeded in gaining the notice of Professor Rudbeck, of the university of Upsala. That botanist took him into his house, and made him his demonstrator of botany, and curator of his botanical garden. In 1732 he made a journey to Lapland at the expense of the Swedish government, the results of which were published in his "Flora Lapponica." After residing for some years in Holland (where he took a degree at Harderwyck, in 1735), and visiting England, he was, in 1740, appointed professor of physic and botany in the university of Upsala. He also became physician to the king, who created him a knight of the Polar Star, and conferred on him a pension, with a patent of nobility. He was the founder and first president of the Academy of Stockholm, and a member of several foreign societies. Linnæus travelled into Norway, Dalecarlia, Lapland, Germany, Holland, France, and England, in eager pursuit of his favourite science. He invented a new method of dividing plants into classes, and extended the same to animals. The ardour of Linnæus's inclinations to the study of nature, and the uncommon application which he bestowed upon it, gave him a most comprehensive view both of its pleasures and usefulness. Availing himself of the advantages which he derived from a large share of eloquence and an animated style, he never failed to display, in a lively and convincing manner, the relation subsisting between the study of nature and the public good, and to incite the great to countenance and protect it. Under his culture, botany raised itself in Sweden to a state of perfection unknown elsewhere, and was thence disseminated throughout Europe. His pupils dispersed themselves all over the globe, and, with their master's fame, extended both his science and their own. He lived to see the sovereigns of Europe establish several public institutions for the study of natural history, and even professorships appointed in divers universities for a similar purpose. Linnæus's system of classification first gave to botany a clear and precise language; and, although his system was an artificial one, it yet paved the way for other discoverers, and undoubtedly led to the natural system of Jussieu. His chief works were: "Systema Naturæ," "Bibliotheca Botanica," "Hortus Cliffortianus," "Critica Botanica," "Flora Lapponica," "Genera Plantarum," "Amœnitates Academicæ," and "Materia Medica."

Born in the province of Smaland, Sweden, 1707; died 1778.

LINNHE, LOCH, lin'-he, an arm of the sea, on the west coast of Scotland, between the counties of Argyle and Inverness. It is 20 miles long, with a breadth of 8. It has several branches, which take the names of lochs Etive, Leven, and Creran, and contains the islands of Lismore, Balnagowan, and Shuna.

LINSELLES, lin-sal', a town of France, department Nord, 6 miles N. of Lille. Manf. Flax and oil. Coal is worked in the vicinity. Pop. 4,100.

LINTON, William, lin'-ton, English landscape painter; began business life in a merchant's office at Liverpool, but his love for art induced him to adopt the career of a painter. He first exhibited at the British Institution in 1821, and was one of the promoters of the Society of British Artists. He travelled and studied art on the continent, and on his return achieved a great reputation as a painter of landscapes. He wrote a treatise on ancient and modern colours, and in 1858 published an illustrated book, "The Scenery of Greece and its Islands."

Born at Liverpool, 1790; died 1876.

LIN-TSEH-SU, lin'-tse-soo, Chinese statesman and author, known in the country as commissioner Lin, was the son of a maker of artificial flowers, whom he assisted, but studied diligently and passed the competitive examinations, with great credit, obtaining degrees. He went to Pekin, and obtained several official appointments, especially distinguishing himself by his administrative ability in the time of a terrible famine. An appointment as viceroy of the provinces of Shan-se and Kan-suh followed, and his abilities elicited special marks of imperial favour. He was appointed to put a stop to the traffic in opium, but his zeal led him into actions which provoked a war with Great Britain, and he fell into disgrace and was banished. When the rebellion broke out in Yun-nan, he did good service, was restored to his former honours, and obtained new distinctions. His death was the occasion of a general mourning throughout China. He was not only an administrator of great energy and enlarged views, but possessed considerable literary talents.

Born at Hing-hwa, 1785; died 1850.

LIN-TSING, lin-tsing', a city of China, in the province of Shan-tung, 70 miles from Tsi-nan. It has both mosques and temples, besides a colossal golden idol. Pop. Unascertained.

LINYANTI lin-yan'-te, chief town of the Makolo county, South Africa, on the Chobe, 3,500 feet above the sea level. There is a large trade in ivory. Pop. 6,000.

LINZ, or LINTZ, lints', a town of the Austrian empire, capital of the province of Upper Austria, at the influx of the Traun into the Danube, 100 miles W. of Vienna. It is well built, on both sides of the Danube, communicating by a bridge and defended by a circle of thirty-two detached forts. The church of St. Ignatius is a large and fine building, as is the castle and meeting-place of the States. Besides these, it has many churches, public schools, a public library, an institute for the deaf and dumb, a magnificent theatre, gymnasium, lyceum, custom-house, and barracks. There are two large squares, in one of which is a fine fountain. Manf. Woollen goods and carpets, made at the imperial factories; cotton and silk goods, gold lace, tobacco, cards, gunpowder, leather, and looking-glasses. It is an important steamboat station on the Danube. Two annual fairs are held. Pop. 41,687.

LION, or LYON, GULF OF, li-on, a gulf of the Mediterranean, on the S.E. of France, stretching for about 170 miles from the isles of Hyères to Cape Creux, with a breadth of about 90 miles, and receiving the Rhône, Hérault, and Aude. Its name is not, as some suppose, derived from the town of Lyons, but from the violence of the waves on this part of the coast.

LIPARI ISLANDS, lip'-a-re, a group of twelve volcanic islands in the Mediterranean, included in the province of Messina, Sicily. The classic poets considered these as the abode of Vulcan. The principal islands are LIPARI, Vulcano, and Stromboli (both actively volcanic), Salina, Panaria, Felicudi, Alicuda and Ustica. Pop. in the group, 11,677. Lat. 38° 20′—38° 55′ N. Lon. 14° 15′—15° 15′ E.

LIPARI, the largest of the above group, to which it gives name. It has a circumference of about 18 miles, and is highly cultivated, producing grapes, figs, and olives in large quantities. Minerals. Pumice-stone, which it sends to all parts of the world, sulphur, soda, and nitre. There are warm springs much resorted to. The climate is delightful. Pop. 4,968.

LIPARI, the chief town of the above island, has an episcopal palace, castle, gymnasium, hospital, and two harbours. Pop. 12,000.

LIPCSE, lip'-che, a market town of Hungary, 21 miles N.W. of Brieser. There are mines of iron and antimony in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,300, mostly descendants of German colonists.

LIPETZK, le-petzk', a town of European Russia, government of Tambor, on the Veronetz, a tributary of the Don. There are fine chalybeate springs, with a bathing establishment, and beautiful gardens, and large numbers of visitors are attracted in the summer. Manf. Woollens principally. Pop. 14,500.

LIPPA, lip'-pa, a market town of Hungary, in the Banat, on the left bank of the Maros, 30 miles N.E. of Temesvar. There are a castle and two churches. Manf. Liqueurs. In the vicinity are quarries of stone. Pop. 6,800.

LIPPE, lip'-pe, a river of Germany, rising 3 miles from Lippspring, and, after a course of upwards of 100 miles, joining the Rhine at Wesel.

LIPPE-DETMOLD, det'-molt, a principality of Germany, situated between Hanover, Westphalia, Brunswick, and Waldeck. It is the most beautifully wooded part of Germany, and there is excellent pasture. The chief river is the Werve, a tributary of the Weser, and the chief towns DETMOLD, the capital, Lemgo, and Horn. Minerals. Iron, salt, marble and lime. Area, 445 square miles. Pop. 124,000, nearly all Protestants.

LIPPE-SCHAUMBURG. (See SCHAUMBURG-LIPPE.)

LIPPI, FRA FILIPPO, lip'-pe, a celebrated Italian painter, whose life was a most romantic one. He was captured by a pirate, and carried to Africa, but was released by his master for having executed his portrait on a wall. He worked for Alfonso I. at Naples, and was employed by Cosmo de' Medici at Florence. His greatest picture was the "Adoration of the Virgin."

Born at Florence, 1412; died at Spoleto, 1469.

LIPPI, FILIPPINO, the son of the preceding, and of Lucrezia Buti (a young lady, a novice at a convent at Prato, who was allowed by the nuns to sit as a model to the painter, with whom she eloped): a painter, who also attained a high reputation. He executed many great works in Florence, Genoa, Rome, Lucca, and Bologna, producing some of the finest of the great frescoes of the church of the Carmine at Florence, which were studied by Michael Angelo, Raffaelle, and other great artists. Raffaelle, it is said, copied a figure of St. Paul, in one of his cartoons.

Born at Florence, 1460; died 1505.

LIPPSPRING, lip'-spring, a town of Prussian Westphalia, 35 miles from Minden. Pop. 1,600.

LIPPSTADT, lip'-stat, a town of Germany, 38 miles from Munster. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 5,000.

LIPPSTADT, lip'-stat, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, on the left bank of the Lippe, 24 miles N.E. of Arnsberg. Manf. Woollens, leather, and starch. Pop. 6,500.

LIPSIUS, JUSTUS, lip'-se-us, a learned critic, who studied civil law at Louvain, and, in 1567, became secretary to Cardinal Granvelle, at Rome. In 1579 he became professor of history at Leyden. His changes in religion were remarkable; being a Roman Catholic, then a Lutheran, afterwards a Calvinist, and lastly a Catholic again. His learning was great, but he was very superstitious, and attributed some of his pieces to the inspiration of the Virgin Mary. His principal works were, a "Commentary on Tacitus," "Saturnalia," "De Militiâ Romanâ," "Electorum," "Satira Menippæa," "De Amphitheatris," "De Rectâ Pronunciatione Linguæ Latinæ."

Born 1547; died 1606.

LIRIA, le'-re-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Valencia, and 20 miles from the city of that name. Manf. Linen, soap, and earthenware; also brandy distilleries. Pop. 9,000.

LISBON, lis'-bon (Portuguese, LISBOA, lees-bo'-a), the capital and principal seaport of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, is beautifully situated on the right bank of the Tagus, about 18 miles from its mouth. It is built on several hills, and rises in the form of an amphitheatre, stretching, with its suburbs, for five miles along the river, and about 2 miles in breadth. The older part is around Castle-hill, on which is the citadel of Sao Jorge. The streets here are narrow, steep, crooked, and badly paved. Further west, between the Castle-hill and the hills of San Francisco and Do Carmo, is a more modern part of the town, rebuilt since the great earthquake of 1755. The streets are straight and well built. The three principal streets extend from north to south, between the picturesque square Praça da Figueira, used as a public market, and the Rocio, another handsome square, on the north, to the Praça de Commercio, by the river side, in which are the exchange, custom-house, India house, and other public buildings, with an equestrian statue of Joseph I. in bronze, in the centre. A new town extends along the Tagus, with good streets and squares, and a new royal palace, completed in 1864. In the extreme west is the suburb Buenos Ayres, where are many pleasant residences, with gardens. Belem Castle, on the western hill, has been recently restored. Near it on a hill is Ajuda Palace, a large unfinished structure, where the Court receptions are generally held. There are 41 churches, 99 chapels, and many monasteries. The most remarkable sacred edifices are the cathedral, on the slope of the Castle-hill; the church of the Heart of Jesus, which has a cupola of white marble; the church of St. Roque, the church of the Martyrs, on the spot where Alphonso I. mounted the walls of the city, and rescued it from the Moors; the church of Santa Engracia, and the church of San Roque. In the palace of Necessidades, near the river, the meetings of the Cortes are held. There are a foundling and another hospital, a handsome opera-house, and four other theatres, an amphitheatre, school of music, two public libraries, college of the nobles, a royal academy of artillery and engineering, the royal school of Vicente de Fora, a royal marine academy, a school of navigation and shipbuilding, and other educational institutions. Water is supplied to the town by the Alacantara Aqueduct, completed about the middle of the 18th century, and one of the most magnificent works of the kind in existence. It brings water from the village of Ballas, 10 miles distant, and crosses a valley by a bridge of 30 arches, some of which are 250 feet high, and more than 100 feet wide. The river opposite Lisbon is about six miles wide, and the roadstead, or harbour, is one of the finest in the world. It is guarded by Fort St. Julian, on the north bank of the river, and Fort Bugio, on the south, each with a lighthouse, and higher up the river by the Castle of Belem. The export trade consists chiefly of wine, oil, fruit, and salt. The trade with Africa is increasing, and the steam navigation in connexion with the port is considerable.

Manf.—Silk, paper, soap, sugar, jewellery, and pottery.

Pop.—246,343, including natives of every province of Portugal, and about 30,000 Gallegos, or Spaniards from the Galician provinces, who are chiefly employed as labourers.

Lat. 38° 42′ N. Lon. 9° 8′ W.

History.—Tradition ascribes the foundation of a city at this place to Ulysses, and the most ancient name was Olisipo. Under the Romans it was named Felicitas Julia. The Moors captured it in 716, and it remained in their possession for more than four hundred years. It was made the capital of Portugal in 1506. In 1755, 30,000 lives were lost, and a great portion of the city destroyed, by an earthquake. In 1807 it was occupied by the French, and was afterwards the scene of important operations between the British and French armies, until the latter were finally driven from the Portuguese capital.

LISCARD, lis'-kard, a township of Chester, 2 miles W. of Birkenhead, at the mouth of the Mersey. There are many elegant villas. Pop. 5,625.

LISBURN, lis'-burn, a market-town and parliamentary borough of Ireland, partly in the county of Antrim, and partly in Down, on the Lagan, 8 miles S.W. of Belfast. Its public buildings are a fine cathedral, with a lofty steeple; a large market-house, an infirmary, a fever hospital, linen-hall, and assembly-rooms. There is a pleasant public promenade on the site of the old castle, destroyed by fire in 1707. Manf. Principally linen, muslins, and damasks. Pop. 10,755, about half Protestants.—A station on the Ulster railway.

LISIEUX, lé'-ze-u(r), a town of France, department Calvados, on the Touques, 27 miles S.E. of Caen. The only remarkable building is the church of St. René. Manf. Woollens, linen, horsecloths, and ribbons. Pop. 16,000.

LISKEARD, lis-kard', a market-town and municipal and parliamentary borough of Cornwall, 16 miles N.W. of Plymouth. The church consists of three spacious aisles; and there are meeting-houses for Quakers, Independents, and Methodists. It has, besides, a town-hall, union workhouse, philosophical society, and various schools. Manf. Serges and leather. In the neighbourhood are tin, copper and lead mines. Pop. 4,479.

LISKO, lis'-ko, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, on the right bank of the San, 80 miles S.W. of Lemberg. There are important cattle markets. Pop. 2,800.

LISLE, SIR GEORGE, lile, a gallant English officer, was the son of a bookseller in London; but on the breaking out of the civil wars, he entered into the royal army, where he behaved so well as to rise to a command. At the battle of Newbury, when it grew so dark that his men could not distinguish him, he put his shirt over his clothes to make himself conspicuous, so that they might be encouraged by his presence and example. He bravely held the town of Colchester a long time against the parliamentary forces, and surrendered as prisoner of war, but was put to death by the victors.

Died 1648.

LISLE, ALICIA, widow of one of the judges of Charles I. He was assassinated in Switzerland by royalists. After the battle of Sedgemoor she gave refuge to two of Monmouth's adherents. For this she was tried before Jeffrey, and, after much hesitation on the part of the jury, they were terrified by that infamous judge into returning a verdict of guilty. Notwithstanding strong appeals for mercy, on account of her advanced age and high character, she was beheaded for high treason.

Died at Winchester, 1685.

LISLE, JOSEPH NICHOLAS DE. (See DELISLE.)

L'ISLET, lile-ai', a town of Quebec province, Canada, on the right bank of the St. Lawrence, 46 miles N.E. of Quebec. Pop. 3,700.

LISMORE, lis-mor', one of the Western Islands, on the coast of Scotland, in Argyllshire, 6 miles from Oban. It is 10 miles long, and nearly 2 wide. It has the remains of two castles, a cathedral, and a Scandinavian fort. Pop. 703.

LISMORE, a market-town of Ireland, counties of Cork and Waterford, on the right bank of the Blackwater, over which is a stone bridge, 26 miles N.E. of Cork. It was formerly a considerable city, but is now a small, mean place. Its castle is a magnificent pile, and there is an ancient church in the Norman and Gothic style. Pop. 2,000.

LISSA, or LESZNO, lis'-sa, a town of Prussia, province of Posen, near the borders of Silesia, 44 miles S.W. of Posen. It has a castle, one Roman Catholic and three Protestant churches, and a town-house. Manf. Woollens, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 11,000; of whom nearly half are Jews.

LISSA, a mountainous island, belonging to Austria, in the Gulf of Venice, near the coast of Dalmatia, 35 miles S.W. of Spalatro. It produces wine, olives, almonds, and figs. Pop. 5,200.—LISSA, or San Giorgio, is on the north-east side of the island, of which it is the chief town. Pop. 3,300.—From 1810 to 1815 this island was held by the British, when it had a population of 12,000, mostly engaged in English manufactures.

LIST, FRIEDRICH, German writer on economical and industrial subjects. Having attacked the Wartemberg ministry, he was condemned to imprisonment, but contrived to escape, and made his way to America, where he made himself known by discovering beds of anthracite. In 1830 President Jackson sent him to Paris. In 1833 he projected a network of railways in Saxony, and in 1843 founded an industrial journal at Augsburg. His death was caused by suicide.

Born 1789; died 1846.

LISTON, JOHN, lis'-ton, comedian, first attempted tragedy, but failed, and then appeared in low comedy with immense success. A comically grotesque face, and almost unrivalled power of humorous expression, made him for many years the most popular actor of broad, low comedy parts on the London stage. He retired from the stage in 1837.

Born in London, 1777; died 1846.

LISTON, ROBERT, a famous surgeon, was the son of the minister of a parish in Linlithgowshire, Scotland. He studied anatomy and medicine in Edinburgh, and came to London in 1816. Two years later he returned to Edinburgh, and was elected a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in that city. In 1835 he accepted the professorship of clinical surgery at University College, London, and rapidly rose into reputation as one of the first operating surgeons of the day. He wrote "Elements of Surgery," and "Practical Surgery."

Born at Ecclesmachan, Linlithgowshire, 1794; died in London, 1847.

LISTOWEL, lis'-to-el, a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, 15 miles N.E. of Tralee. There are the remains of an old castle. Pop. 2,200.

LISZT, FRANZ, list, pianist, the son of a person in the employ of Prince Esterhazy. In early childhood he exhibited astonishing musical talent, playing in public in his ninth year. He was sent to Vienna, and after less than two years of study gave concerts with brilliant success. At the age of 12 he achieved an astonishing success at Paris, and soon afterwards in England. For 20 years he pursued a course of uninterrupted success, till in 1847 he settled down as leader of the court concerts and operas at Weimar. He had been at various times the subject of strong religious impressions, and in 1865 he took sacred orders, and became a monk in the Vatican at Rome. In 1871 he returned to his native country, and in 1875 was appointed director of the Hungarian Academy of Music. He is, perhaps, the most brilliant performer on the pianoforte ever known, and has written several papers on musical subjects, and composed many symphonies and one oratorio.

Born at Raiding, Hungary, 1811.

LITHGOW, WILLIAM, lith'-go, an extraordinary Scotch traveller, who went through various parts of Europe and the East on foot, and in his travels experienced many singular adventures. At Malaga he was seized by the Inquisition, and put to the torture; but escaped with his life, and on his arrival in England was presented to James I. on a feather bed, being so mangled as to be incapable of standing. On his recovery, he applied to Count Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, who promised him a reparation, but deceived him, which so provoked Lithgow, that he assaulted him at court, for which he was sent to the Marshalsea, where he remained a prisoner nine months. He published a curious account of his travels.

Born in Lanark, 1583; died 1640.

LITIN, lit'-in, a town of European Russia, government of Podolia, on the Sgara. Pop. 5,400.

LITHUANIA, lith'-u-ai'-ne-a, the former name of an extensive tract of country lying between Poland and Prussia, and now partly comprised in the Russian governments of Wilna, Grodno, and Minsk. Another portion is included in the Prussian province of East Prussia. It is very flat, generally sandy, and intersected by vast marshes and bogs.

Shipbuilding is carried on, and there is a trade with America and the Baltic. Pop. 2,350.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway.

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, SIR THOMAS, English judge, a native of Devonshire. His family name, Westcote, was changed by him in compliance with the wishes of his grandfather. After receiving a liberal education, he entered of the Inner Temple. His abilities procured him the place of steward of the court of the palace to Henry VI., and, in 1455, he went the northern circuit as a judge. Edward IV. appointed him one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas in 1466, and in 1475 he was created knight of the Bath. He compiled his famous book on "Tenures," according to Sir Edward Coke, while he was judge; but it was not printed until after his death.

Died 1481.

LIVADIA, a favourite retreat of the Emperor of Russia and other members of the royal family, in the Crimea, near Yalta. The place became of considerable interest at the time of the diplomatic interference in the affairs of Turkey in the autumn of 1876, as important state papers were issued thence. There are several beautiful villas, surrounded by parks and gardens.

LIVENZA, le-vain'-dsa, a river of Italy, rising in the province of Udine, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into the Adriatic Sea, 28 miles from Venice.

LIVE OAK, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 1,000. The chief town is Oakville.

LIVERPOOL, liv'-er-pool, a parliamentary and municipal borough of Lancashire, and, next to London, the principal trading and seaport town in Great Britain, and the second seaport of the world, situated on the slopes of several small hills, on the north-eastern shore of the Mersey, 31 miles W. of Manchester. The borough includes the townships of Kirkdale and Everton, and parts of the townships of West Derby and of Toxteth Park. The docks stretch along the margin of the river for nearly six miles, and have a total area of 1,013 acres, of which 267 are water space, and 764 land, yards, quay, warehouses, &c. The length of the quay is nearly 19 miles. Several of the docks are enclosed by large warehouses, erected at a great expense. The streets are mostly spacious, airy, and some of them elegant. The older and more confined parts of the town have been greatly improved, whilst the public buildings are formed in a style of elegance and splendour suitable to the taste and opulence of its inhabitants. The principal of these are the Town-hall, erected at a cost of upwards of £110,000. The hall, which has a lofty dome surmounted by a statue of Britannia; the Municipal Building, and the new Exchange, occupies the side of a square. St. George's Hall, built in the Corinthian order, contains the assize courts, a concert-room, and a hall for public meetings. The building, one of the finest in England, is 500 feet long, 175 in breadth, and 112 feet high. It was opened in 1854, having cost £230,000. There are more than 100 churches in the town and suburbs, many of them of great architectural beauty. There are many places of worship for almost every denomination. The charitable institutions are also numerous and well conducted. Among these may be noticed the dispensary for dispensing medicines to the sick poor, an hospital for decayed seamen and their widows and children, a fever hospital, a ladies' charity, for the relief of poor married women in childbed, a penitentiary for unfortunate women, the Strangers' Friend society, and several others. The institutions established for literary and scientific pursuits are, the Royal Liverpool Institution, the Free Library and Museum, presented to the town by Sir William Brown, at a cost of £40,000; the Walker Art Gallery, presented by A. B. Walker, Esq., at a cost of £20,000, and opened in 1877. The Picton Library, in connexion with these two institutions, was opened by the Earl of Derby, in October, 1879. A botanic garden was also established in 1801, at an expense of about £10,000. The Collegiate Institution, the Mechanics' Institution, the Athenæum, and the Sailors' Home, are conspicuous buildings. In the centre of the area before the town-hall is a superb group of bronze statuary, supposed to be the largest in the kingdom, to commemorate the death of Lord Nelson. There is also a statue erected to the Duke of Wellington. The hotels and railway stations are noble and extensive buildings. The public markets are among the finest in England; St. John's, 660 feet long and 135 wide. In connection with the cattle-market are public abattoirs. There are five theatres, a noble Philharmonic Hall, and many other places of amusement. The public parks are Sefton Park, of 375 acres, at the south of the town, beautifully laid out with carriage drives, botanical gardens, and ornamental waters, at a total cost of about £400,000; Stanley Park, 160 acres, on the north; and Shiel Park; and there are other parks, which, although private property, are partially opened to the public. There are a botanic garden, and nine public cemeteries. Constant communication is maintained with Birkenhead, and other places on the opposite side of the Mersey, by a large number of ferry steamers.

Docks.—There are 30 wet and half-tide docks, the largest of which are the Brunswick, Queen's, King's, George's, Prince's, Huskisson, Canada, and New North. There are also 20 graving docks and seven gridirons. Besides the ordinary pier approaches, there are two large floating landing stages, one of which is more than 1,000 feet long.

Navigation and Commerce.—There are splendid lines of steamers and sailing vessels between Liverpool and the United States, Canada, South America, the Mediterranean, India, and Australia; and constant steam communication with Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Drogheda, Londonderry, the Isle of Man, Glasgow, Bristol, London, and many other places. The value of the exports average about £240,000,000 annually. The leading imports are cotton (nearly the whole of the arrivals into the country), coffee, grain, timber, and wool. Nearly 80 per cent. of all the emigrants from England embark at Liverpool.

Pop.—552,425; or, including West Derby, 585,708. In Liver,001 alone there are 92,310 inhabited houses.

Railway Communication.—The town has stations of the London and North Western, Great Western, and Lancashire and Yorkshire lines, and is in direct communication by means of the Midland, Great Northern, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, North Staffordshire, Cheshire, and Scotch lines, with almost every part of Great Britain.

Lat. 53° 24′ N. Lon. 0° 12′ W.

History.—The name Liverpool is probably derived from Lyrpool, the lower pool. In the earliest official record, a charter granted by Henry II., in 1173, the town is mentioned as "Lyrpool, or Litherpool." In later documents the name is spelt Leerpool, Leverpole, and Livrepool. A second charter was granted by king John in 1207, and a third in 1227 by king Henry III., making it a free town for ever. Its progress, however, was small, for as late as 1560 it only contained 138 houses, and the merchants of the town only owned twelve ships. In 1636, when Charles I. levied ship-money, Liverpool was only rated at £25, while Bristol was rated at £1,000. In the reign of William III., however, the population increased rapidly, and numbered about 6,000 persons; the number of ships at this time belonging to the town being 84. In the year 1800 the number of inhabitants had increased to 75,000, and 4746 ships were registered as belonging to the port.

LIVERPOOL, a seaport of British North America, on the S.E. coast of Nova Scotia, on the right bank of the river Mersey, 70 miles S.W. of Halifax. There is a good harbour, and the place is of importance as a fishing station. Pop. 3,200.

LIVERPOOL, CHARLES JENKINSON, Earl of, British statesman, was educated at the Charterhouse and at University College, Oxford. He entered the House of Commons in 1761, and held at various periods the offices of Lord of the Admiralty, secretary-at-war, and president of the board of trade. The last office he retained till 1801, when he retired. He was an adherent of Lord North and Mr. Pitt, and the author of several political works. In 1786 he was created Lord Hawkesbury, and in 1796 earl of Liverpool.

Born 1727; died 1808.

LIVERPOOL, ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON, second earl of, son of the preceding, was educated at the Charterhouse and Christchurch College, Oxford. Immediately he attained his majority he took his seat in the House of Commons as member for Rye, and in 1801 became secretary of state for foreign affairs in the Addington ministry. He was afterwards home secretary under Mr. Pitt, and in 1808 was called to the House of Peers, as Lord Hawkesbury, but succeeded to the earldom shortly afterwards. After the death of Pitt, he twice refused to form a ministry, but after the assassination of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, he accepted office, and remained prime minister until 1827. He held high Tory opinions, and was politically unpopular from the part he took against Queen Caroline, and his opposition to Catholic emancipation, but privately was greatly respected.

Born 1770; died 1828.

LIVERPOOL PLAINS, a pastoral district of New South Wales, Australia. Area, 15,625 square miles. Lat. 30° 31′ E. Lon. 149° 151′ E.

LIVINGSTONE, DAVID, liv'-ing-stone, a distinguished African traveller. When a little boy he was employed in a cotton factory, and worked there for several years. He contrived, under considerable difficulties, to pursue the studies of medicine and theology, and after attending lectures at the Glasgow University, was employed as a medical missionary by the London Missionary Society. He requested to be sent to China; but England being at the time at war with that country, he embarked, in 1840, for Africa, where he became acquainted with the eminent missionary Robert Moffatt, and married his daughter. After residing for some time at the Cape of Good Hope, in order to acquire the dialects spoken in the interior, he embarked upon his religious labours, and lived chiefly with the Bechuanas, to whose customs he accommodated himself, and to whom he preached the doctrines of Christianity. In 1849 he set out, and succeeded in verifying the existence of Lake Ngami. He undertook a second expedition in the following year, but was arrested by illness. In 1851 he penetrated beyond the chief city of the Makololo tribe, and found a vast country, fertile, with navigable rivers, and rich in mineral wealth, and, at the same time, inhabited by a friendly and industrious people. Between January, 1853, and June, 1854, he crossed the African continent, undergoing the severest hardships, and reached the Portuguese station of St. Paul, on the west coast of Africa. He afterwards set out to traverse the continent towards the south, and reached Quillimane in 1856, having traversed a vast and beautiful region hitherto unknown to Europeans, and discovered the great Victoria Falls. Returning to England he was rewarded with the gold medals of the Geographical Societies of London and Paris. He published, in 1857, a narrative of his labours and adventures, under the title "Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa," a work which excited considerable interest. In 1858 he left England with the appointment of British consul at Quillimane, and provided with a steam yacht of light draught, to ascend the African rivers, and with scientific apparatus to enable him to accurately determine his observations. He further explored the Zambesi, ascended the Shiré, and discovered Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. In 1866 he set out on his great expedition towards the great lakes Tanganyika, Victoria, and Albert Nyanza, just previously visited by Speke and Grant, Burton and Baker, with the view of discovering the true sources of the Nile. After an absence of two years, nothing more was heard of him for three years, and then Mr. Stanley, in command of an expedition fitted out by the proprietors of the London Daily Telegraph and New York Herald, to search for him, found him at Ujiji, on the eastern side of Lake Tanganyika, in a state of great destitution. Stanley supplied him with provisions and instruments, and the unwearying Livingstone then started on a new exploration, traced the course of several large rivers, and discovered a group of large lakes. He sank under the privations he endured, and his body was brought by his native attendants to Zanzibar, and thence shipped to England. He was interred in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Blantyre, in Lanarkshire, 1817; died at Ilala, Central Africa, 1873.

LIVIUS ANDRONICUS. (See ANDRONICUS.)

LIVIUS, TITUS, liv'-i-us (LIVY, liv'-e), an illustrious Roman historian. Very little is known respecting his life. He appears to have resided at Rome, and to have been on intimate terms with Augustus, who made him tutor to his grandson Claudius. His history was originally produced in 142 books; but out of that number only thirty, and parts of five more, are now extant; the rest are irrecoverably lost. It began with the foundation of Rome, and ended with the death of Drusus, in Germany, B.C. 9. The work is popular on account of its beautiful style.

Born at Patavium (Padua), B.C. 59; died A.D. 18.

There are the ruins of the castle where, in the reign of Louis XI., horrible tortures were perpetrated, and where Francis I. received the emperor Charles V. Manf. Principally woollens. Pop. 3,300.

LOCK, MATTHEW, lok, an eminent English composer, who is supposed, but the claim has been questioned, to have set the music to "Macbeth," the instrumental music to the "Tempest," and wrote many other excellent pieces. He is also stated to have composed the music for the public entry of Charles II. into London.

Born at Exeter, about 1635; died 1677.

LOCKE, JOHN, a celebrated English philosopher, who was the son of a captain in the parliamentary army, and was educated at Westminster school and Christ's Church, Oxford. After taking his degree in arts, he entered on the study of physic. In 1654 he went to Berlin as secretary to the British envoy, and two years afterwards made the acquaintance of Lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, who became his patron, and urged him to apply to the study of politics. Locke followed his advice, and rendered himself serviceable to his lordship and party, who, having obtained the grant of Carolina, employed him in drawing up the constitution for the government of that province. Lord Shaftesbury being appointed chancellor in 1672, made Locke secretary of presentations, which place he lost the year following, when his patron was deprived of the great seal. He continued, however, his secretaryship of the Board of Trade, of which Lord Shaftesbury was president. In 1674 that commission was dissolved, and Locke, being apprehensive of consumption, went to Montpellier, and continued abroad till 1679, when he was sent for by Lord Shaftesbury, who was appointed president of the council; but, in 1682, that nobleman, to avoid a prosecution for high treason, withdrew to Holland, and was accompanied by his friend. In 1684, Mr. Locke was removed from his student's place at Christ Church, by the king's command; and, the year following, the English envoy demanded him of the States of Holland, on suspicion of his being concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, which occasioned him to keep private several months, during which he was employed in finishing his "Essay on Human Understanding," which, however, was not published till after the revolution of 1688, when he returned to England. He spent the latter years of his life at Oates, in Essex, the seat of Sir Francis Masham, who invited him to reside in his family. His "Letters on Toleration" were published to promote the scheme which King William had so much at heart,—of reconciling all sects of Christians. In his retirement he also wrote several of his works. His principal works are an "Essay on Human Understanding," on which his fame chiefly rests, "Letters on Toleration," "Treatise on Civil Government," "Thoughts concerning Education," and letters and miscellaneous pieces.

Born at Wrington, near Bristol, 1632; died 1704.

LOCKE, JOSEPH, an English civil engineer. He studied under George Stephenson, the eminent railway engineer, and acted as one of his assistants during the construction of the Manchester and Liverpool Railway. He was subsequently extensively employed as engineer of various railways, both in England and on the continent of Europe. The Paris and Rouen, Rouen and Havre, Paris and Lyons, Caen and Cherbourg, Barcelona and Mattaro, the Dutch, Rhenish, and several other lines, were constructed under his auspices. In 1847 he was returned to parliament as member for Honiton; whereupon he took his place among the liberals. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and vice-president of the Institution of Civil Engineers.

Born at Attercliffe, near Sheffield, 1805; died 1860.

LOCKERBIE, lok'-er-be, a town of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, 12 miles from Dumfries, noted for having the largest lamb fair in Scotland. Pop. 2,000.—A station on the Caledonian railway.

LOCKHART, JOHN GIBSON, lok'-hart, a modern English writer, author of the "Life of Sir Walter Scott," and other valuable contributions to literature. He was the son of a minister of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and was educated at Glasgow University, and afterwards at Balliol College, Oxford, where he took first-class honours. After a short sojourn in Germany, he went to Edinburgh in 1816, intending to practise the law at the Scottish bar. In 1817, on the establishment of "Blackwood's Magazine," Lockhart was one of its principal writers. The Toryism of the new periodical, and of its writers, caused both to become especial favourites with Sir Walter Scott, whose political views were of the same nature. Lockhart, in a short time, became an intimate friend of the great novelist, who advanced his interests on every occasion. In 1820 he married Sophia, eldest daughter of Scott, and went to reside near Abbotsford. During the succeeding five years he worked with great industry and success in literature. He produced, among others, "Valerius, a Roman story," "Adam Blair, a story of Scottish Life;" the "Life of Burns," the "Life of Napoleon;" and published his translations of the Spanish Ballads. In 1826 he became editor of the "Quarterly Review," and retained the appointment until 1853. In 1843 he was appointed auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall. In biography and biographical sketches he was particularly excellent, as is attested by his "Life of Scott," and the smaller piece, entitled "Theodore Hook." His health becoming delicate, he resigned the editorship of the "Quarterly Review," and went to Rome in 1853; but, after a short stay, he took up his residence in Scotland.

Born at Cambusnethan, Scotland, 1794; died at Abbotsford 1854.

LOCK HAVEN, the capital of Clinton county, Pennsylvania, United States, on a branch of the Susquehanna, 70 miles N.W. of Harrisburg. It is a centre of the lumber trade. Pop. 7,000.

LODGE, THOMAS, lodj, an English author of the 16th century. The records of his life are very obscure, but he is believed to have been, in turns, lawyer, soldier, physician, and author. He was an industrious writer, and translated the works of Josephus and Seneca. Two of his plays have been preserved in Dodsley's Collection. In 1840 Mr. Collier, in his book entitled "Shakspere's Library," reprinted his novel "Rosalynde;" whence it was seen that many of its leading incidents were identical with those in Shakspere's "As you Like it," the great poet, and not the obscure novelist, being, however, the borrower. He died, it is supposed, of the plague.

Born 1555; died 1625.

LODI, lo'-de, a well-built town of Italy, province of Milano, on the right bank of the Adda, 19 miles S. of Milan. Its cathedral and numerous convents claim the attention of the traveller. The most remarkable of its churches is the Duomo, or cathedral, a building of the 12th century, painted partly in fresco and partly in oil, by Calisto, a scholar of Titian. It is the see of a bishop, the seat of a gymnasium, has many churches, a hospital, a theatre, a public library, and numerous schools. Manf. Silk, majolica, porcelain, linens, and chemicals; and it has an active trade in Parmesan cheese, for the production of which an immense number of cows are fed in the vicinity. Pop. 24,399.—This place was founded by the emperor Frederick I., in 1158. In 1796 the bridge of Lodi was carried by Bonaparte, in a most daring manner, with the bayonet, and a decisive victory gained over the Austrians.

LODZ, lods, a town of Russian Poland, in the government of Petrokow, 75 miles S.W. of Warsaw. Manf. Woollens, very extensive. Pop. 113,146, including many Germans.

LOFODEN, or LOFFODEN, lo-fo'-den, a group of islands within the Arctic Circle, in the North Sea, off the north-west coast of Norway, the chain stretching for 175 miles. The principal islands are Hindöe, Andöe, Langöe, Ost Vaagen, West Vaagen, and Flagsladöe. They are all mountainous, some of the peaks, covered with snow, attaining an altitude of 4,000 feet. During the fishing season, the islands are visited by an immense number of boats from the coasts of Norway and Finmark, engaged in the cod, herring, and other fisheries. They are exposed to severe tempests, and near the S. of the group is the Maelstrom, a dangerous whirlpool, occasioned by the swell of the ocean during the N.W. winds. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 67° 30′ to 69° 15′ N. Lon. 12° to 17° E.

LOFTSCHA, or LOVATZ, lofts'-cha, a town of Turkey in Europe, province of Bulgaria, on both sides of the Osma. Pop. 3,000.

LOGAN, JOHN, log'-an, a Scotch divine and poet, who, in 1781, published the "Philosophy of History," which he had delivered as lectures at Edinburgh. The same year he printed his poems in one volume. The "Ode to the Cuckoo" is very well known. His last publication was a pamphlet, entitled, "A Review of the Principal Charges against Mr. Hastings," for which the publisher was tried and acquitted.

Born in Scotland, 1748; died in London, 1788.

LOGAN, a newly-formed county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 1,800 square miles.

LOGAN, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 529 square miles. Pop. 25,000. The capital is Lincoln.

LOGAN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 478 square miles. Pop. 24,000, one fourth being coloured. The capital is Russellville.

LOGAN, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 425 square miles. Pop. 26,000. The capital is Bellefontaine.

LOKI, lok'-i, in Scandinavian mythology, the Spirit of Evil.

LOKMAN, lok'-man, an oriental fabulist, of whom hardly any authentic particulars are known. He appears to have been of low origin, and some say he was a slave. There are so many circumstances related of him that agree with what is said of Æsop, and their fables are so much alike, that both are conjectured to have been one and the same person. Lokman's Fables were printed in a collection by Galland, at Paris, in 1724.

LOLA MONTES. (See Montes.)

LOLLARA, lol-la'-ra, a town of British India, province of Goojerat. Pop. 5,000.

LOLLARD, Walter, lol'-lard, the founder of a religious sect in Germany, about 1315. After gaining many followers on the continent, he went to England, where he also had numerous disciples. The Lollards were, according to some, grossly heretical; but as to this we have only the testimony of their enemies. Lollard himself was burnt at Cologne.
Died in 1322.

LOMBARDO-VENETIAN KINGDOM, lom-bar'-do, the name given, after the congress of Vienna, in 1815, to the whole of Austrian Italy, comprising both Lombardy and the former Venetian territory. By the treaty of Zurich, signed in November, 1859, Lombardy was made over to Piedmont by Austria, and in 1866 Venetia was transferred to Italy.

LOMBARDY, lum'-bar-de (Ital. LOMBARDIA, lom-bar-de'-a), a province of Northern or Upper Italy. The name, though properly applicable only to the vale of the Po, was commonly given to the whole tract of country between the frontiers of Switzerland and Tuscany. It is the country of the Lombards, or Longobards. Pop. 3,793,918.

LOMBLEM, lom'-blem, an island of the Indian archipelago, lying to the E. of Flores. It is 50 miles long, with a breadth of 16, and consists mostly of elevated land, rising into a conical peak. There is a large bay on the northern side, but nothing is known of the interior. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 8° 14′ 8″. Lon. 123° 35′. E.

LOMBOK, lom'-bok, one of the Sunda islands, in the Malay archipelago, separated from the island of Bali by the Straits of Lombok, and from the Sumbhawa by the Straits of Allas. It consists chiefly of a well-watered plain, lying between two ranges of volcanic mountains running along the N. and S. coasts. Rice, cotton, coffee, and maize are cultivated. Area, 1,480 square miles. Pop. with Bali, 1,358,950. Lat. 8° 12′—9° 8. Lon. 115° 44′—116° 40′ E.

LOMOND, LOCH, lo'-mond, the largest lake of Scotland, between Dumbartonshire and the counties of Stirling and Forth, remarkable for the picturesque scenery on its shores. It is 35 miles long, with a breadth of between 7 and 8 at its widest points, and a depth in some parts of 600 feet. It contains 30 islands, and receives several rivers. The river Leven carries off its own superfluous waters, and discharges them into the Firth of Clyde. The loch is overlooked by Ben Lomond.

LOMONOSOV, lo'-mo-no-sof', a Russian poet, and the father of modern Russian literature, was son of a fisherman, and, having fled from his father, he took refuge in a monastery, where he received his education, which he afterwards improved at a German university. In 1741 he returned to his native country, and became member of the Academy of Petersburg and professor of chemistry. In 1761 he was honoured with the title of councillor of state. The odes of Lomonosov are greatly admired for originality of invention, sublimity of sentiment, and energy of language. He also wrote some philosophical treatises.

Born near Kholmazar, Russia, 1711; died 1765.

LOMZA, lom-za', a town of Russian Poland, 70 miles from Sawalki. Manf. Paper, woollens, and linen. Pop. 10,340.

LONDERZEEL, lond'-dair-zail, a town of Belgium, province of South Brabant, 11 miles N.W. of Brussels. Pop. 4,500.

LONDON, lun'-dun, the capital of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, stands on both sides of the river Thames, in the counties of Middlesex, Surrey and Kent. The limits of the metropolis are differently defined in various Acts of Parliament, but it may be popularly described as the Cities of London and Westminster and districts of Finsbury, Tower Hamlets, Hackney, Marylebone, and Chelsea on the north side of the river, and of Lambeth, Southwark and Greenwich on the south. The limits, as generally understood, are those defined by the Local Government Act, which are also adopted by the Registrar-General, and are nearly identical with the limits of the area under the control of the School Board for London, and also of the London County Council. The Metropolitan Police district is considerably larger than that of the County Council, extending for a circle of 15 miles around Charing Cross, and the Post Office fixes the metropolitan radius at 12 miles from the General Post Office. The original London, now the city of London, has well-marked boundaries, and with the districts "without the walls" (that is including districts forming a part of the City, but beyond the limits of the old Roman wall), occupies an area of 600 acres. The area subject to the provisions of the Local Government Act, is 78,200 acres, or about 122 square miles. (The various central and suburban districts will be more particularly described further on.) The length of the metropolis so defined is about 13 miles from east to west, and the breadth, 10 miles from north to south. It occupies the valley of the Thames, between the range of the Hampstead, Highgate, and Hornsey hills, on the north, and the Sydenham and Norwood hills on the south. On the north of the river, the surface rises gradually, to about 200 feet, but on the south there is a level about 3 miles wide, subject, near the river, to frequent inundations. Near the Thames, on the northern side, and about the centre, is a slight elevation on which stands St. Paul's Cathedral, the depression to the west of which is the valley through which the small Fleet river (long since converted into a sewer, and completely hidden from sight) entered the Thames near the spot now occupied by the northern abutments of Blackfriars Bridge. The Thames, flowing from the west, takes a bend northward between Vauxhall and Waterloo Bridge, and thence flows, generally in an eastward direction, forming, opposite Greenwich, a large loop, around the tract known as the Isle of Dogs. On the north side the main lines of thoroughfare run generally nearly parallel to the river. One of the most important lines is that which enters the metropolis from Hammersmith, passes through Kensington, Knightsbridge, to Hyde Park Corner, thence known as Piccadilly as far as the Regent Circus, where it joins Regent-street, and, taking a direct southward course enters Pall-Mall, from which it continues eastward, past Charing Cross, beyond which it is known as the Strand, Fleet-street, St. Paul's Churchyard, Cheapside, Cornhill, Leadenhall-street, and Whitechapel, where it divides into the Mile-end and Commercial-roads, leading to the extreme eastern districts of the metropolis. Another main artery is the great western, or Oxford road, north of the former, and continuing through Bayswater, past the northern side of Hyde Park, along Oxford-street and Holborn, uniting with the previously mentioned route at Cheapside. Still farther north is the Marylebone-road, which is continued, as the Euston-road and Pentonville-road, to Islington, beyond which it is known as the City-road, and about a mile farther takes a bold curve, and under different names reaches the eastern end of Cheapside, at the Bank and Royal Exchange. The new Victoria Embankment, skirting the river, affords a magnificent road between Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges, and the route is continued by a noble new thoroughfare, Queen Victoria-street, to the Mansion House, in the very heart of the City. The more important lines of road in a north-western, northern, and north-eastern directions are, beginning at the west, the Edgeware-road, running north-west from Oxford-street, through the suburb of Kilburn; the Tottenham Court-road and Hampstead-road, from the eastern end of Oxford-street (and communicating, with some interruptions, with Charing Cross), to Hampstead, and by a branch to Highgate; two roads, diverging at Islington, the most westerly being the old "north road" of the coaching time, through Holloway and Finchley to Barnet, and the more easterly, the Essex-road, giving access to Stoke Newington and other northern and north-eastern suburbs; the Kingsland-road, from Shoreditch (the old coach road to Cambridge) to Kingsland, Tottenham, and Enfield; and in the extreme north-east, the Cambridge Heath and Lea Bridge-roads, connecting Hackney, Clapton, and other important suburbs with the metropolis. Almost the only direct routes from north London to the south are the Farringdon-road, from King's Cross, at the junction of the Euston and Pentonville-roads, to Blackfriars Bridge, continued on the southern side by a broad thoroughfare, the Blackfriars-road, about a mile long; and by a line of road variously named Shoreditch High-street, Bishopsgate-street, and Gracechurch-street, to London Bridge, and so through Southwark to the southern suburbs. A short wide street connects the Strand with Waterloo Bridge, and Westminster Bridge has a handsome opening to Westminster, near the Houses of Parliament, Palace Yard, and the Abbey. Between the older portions of Southwark and Lambeth, and the western bend of the river, the streets are laid out with great regularity, broad straight roads diverging from circuses and other centres, and leading to Waterloo and Westminster Bridges. The most important of these centres are the circus at the southern end of the Blackfriars-road, whence diverge the Borough-road, giving access to Southwark; St. George's-road, leading to the Westminster Bridge-road, and the London-road connecting the circus with another great centre, at the point where the Newington Causeway (a continuation of the Borough, the principal street of Southwark), the New Kent-road, and the Walworth and Kennington roads unite. At Kennington is another centre, with lines of road radiating to Westminster, Brixton, Clapham, and other southern suburbs. On the northern side of the river, the principal centres of divergence are Hyde Park Corner and Knightsbridge, the Regent Circus, at the eastern end of Piccadilly; Charing Cross, where Pall Mall, Whitehall, the Strand, and St. Martin's-lane unite; Holborn Circus, and the great nucleus around which are clustered the Bank of England, the Exchange, and the Mansion House, where Cheapside, Queen Victoria-street, Princes-street (leading northward to Moorgate-street), Threadneedle-street, Cornhill, Lombard-street, and King William-street, giving access to London Bridge, unite. Further east, at the end of King William-street, is the point where Gracechurch-street, Eastcheap, and Bridge-street unite. Further north, the chief centres are at the meeting of the Marylebone and Edgware-roads; King's Cross, at the foot of Pentonville Hill, the point of junction of Gray's-inn-road, leading southward to the Holborn line of route and the broad Farringdon-road (mentioned above); "the Angel" at Islington at the junction of St. John's-street and, Goswell-road (from the City), and the Pentonville-road, Islington High-street, and City-road; and at Shoreditch Church, where Old-street, the Kingsland-road, and the Hackney-road meet. In the older portions of London, especially in the City, Southwark, Whitechapel, Finsbury, Shoreditch, and Bethnal Green, the streets are narrow and irregular, except where, in the course of metropolitan improvements, actively progressing, they have been swept away to make room for new, wide, and comparatively straight lines of thoroughfare. The squares, or large gardens of the metropolis, are almost peculiar to London, being rivalled only by the large squares of Dublin. Other great cities have open spaces, but nothing comparable to the planted and enclosed squares, many of them of great size, and laid out with lawns, flower-beds, and gravel walks, which are so valuable as "lungs" to the enormous town. Even in the City there is one of the finest open places of the kind, Finsbury-square; and further west, just beyond the City limits, is the largest of all the London squares, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; while between Holborn and the Euston-road, are Bloomsbury, Queen, Russell, Tavistock, Mecklenburg, and several other squares. Between Pall-Mall and Piccadilly, is St. James's-square; north and south of Oxford-street, is a region of beautiful squares, among them Cavendish, Grosvenor, Hanover, Portman, and Berkeley-squares; and in Belgravia, west of St. James's Park, and to the south of Knightsbridge, are Belgrave, Eaton, Warwick, Eccleston, and other squares; and in each of the new suburban districts squares are numerous. By far the greater number of the houses are built of brick, many faced with stucco; but in the City stone has been generally used in the erection of public and commercial buildings, a large number of which possess considerable architectural merits. The finest streets in the City are New Cannon-street, Queen Victoria-street, and King William-street; and at the West end, the Strand, Whitehall, immediately adjoining which are the famous Banqueting House, the only portion erected of the superb palace designed by Inigo Jones, the Admiralty, Horse Guards, Treasury buildings, and the Foreign and India Offices); Victoria-street, Westminster, (leading from the Abbey to the Victoria railway station); Piccadilly, where are many fine aristocratic residences; Regent-street, a noble thoroughfare; Waterloo-place, leading from Regent-street to Pall-Mall; and Pall-Mall, in or near which are the chief of the splendid club houses. Nearly all the streets in the narrower and more crowded parts are paved with granite blocks; but in the leading streets of the City and at the West end, asphalte and wood have been recently used. The breadth of the Thames varies from 900 to 1,200 feet, the narrowest part being at Southwark bridge, and it is crossed by 12 bridges and 5 railway viaducts. Of these bridges, four are suspension bridges. (They will be more particularly described further on.) Near the Tower is a subway for foot passengers. The river is embanked, on the northern and western side by the Chelsea and Victoria embankments, and on the eastern or Lambeth side by the Albert embankment. The Chelsea embankment, commenced in 1871, extends from the gardens of Chelsea Hospital to Battersea bridge; the river wall is 4,130 feet long, and the roadway 70 feet wide, and planted with trees. The Victoria embankment was constructed in accordance with an Act of Parliament passed in 1862, and was opened to traffic in July, 1870, and the ornamental grounds in the following year. The river wall, of granite, is 8 feet thick, more than 40 feet in height, 7 feet above high-water level, and nearly a mile and one-third long, extending from Westminster to Blackfriars bridges, and the roadway, planted with trees, is 100 feet wide. There are six noble landing piers, adding greatly to the appearance of the river frontage, and the whole line of the embankment is traversed by the underground line of the Metropolitan Extension railway. The Albert embankment extends from Westminster bridge to Vauxhall, about 4,300 feet. The metropolitan districts and the principal suburban districts are separately described below, and it will only be necessary to sketch briefly the relative positions of the various great divisions of the metropolis. The City of London is in the centre, on the northern side of the river, communicating with Southwark, on the opposite side by London and Southwark bridges. The City of Westminster lies to the west of the City of London, following the bend of the river; the district of Finsbury is to the north and north-west of the City, with the borough of Marylebone farther west; the borough of the Tower Hamlets is to the east of the City, with the borough of Hackney on the north; and in the extreme west, on the north side of the river, is the borough of Chelsea (including the suburban towns of Chelsea, Kensington, and Hammersmith). On the southern or Surrey side of the Thames, are the borough of Lambeth, on the west; farther east the borough of Southwark, and still farther east the borough of Greenwich, which includes the towns of GREENWICH and DEPTFORD. The City of London, its immediate outlying districts, and Southwark, are the great centres of commercial activity; the royal palaces, Houses of Parliament, the chief government offices, and the leading club-houses, are in Westminster; the residences of the nobility and the most fashionable districts are mostly in Westminster, Marylebone, and Kensington; the older royal parks, Hyde Park, Kensington Gardens, St. James's, and the Green Park, are at the "West end;" Regent's Park, in the north-west, in Marylebone; Finsbury Park, in the north; Victoria Park, at the "East end;" and Battersea Park, in the south-western district, on the southern bank of the river. The docks stretch eastward from the Tower, on the northern side of the river, to Blackwall, about six miles, and, on the southern side from Rotherhithe nearly to Deptford, also in an eastward direction. Some districts of London are especially connected with particular branches of industry: Clerkenwell, between the City and Islington, on the north, with watch-making and jewellery; Spitalfields, on the north-east of the City, with silk-weaving; Bermondsey, on the southern side of the river, in Southwark, with tanning; Lambeth, with pottery; and in the centre of the City, between St. Paul's cathedral and the Royal Exchange, are the noble warehouses, the centre of the Manchester, hosiery, and fancy trades. The streets, lanes, and courts of the metropolis have a total length of more than 7,000 miles.

CITY OF LONDON.—The City and Liberties of London comprehend the City of London within the Walls and the City of London without the Walls. London within the Walls is limited to the area formerly inclosed by the walls, erected by the Romans (see History). London without the Walls extends westward to Holborn Bars and Temple Bar, northward some distance beyond Bishopsgate, eastward to the Minories, and southward over London Bridge so far as to include a small portion of ground on the Surrey side of the river. The City is divided into 26 wards, each of which elects an alderman and other persons, known as Common Councilmen (206 in number), to represent the wards in the Court of Common Council, which, with the Court of Aldermen, forms the Corporation, or governing body of the City. The Common Councilmen are elected annually; but the Aldermen for life, one of their number—generally, but not imperatively, chosen in rotation—is selected to fill the office of Lord Mayor, which dignity he retains for a year. The Aldermen are ex-officio magistrates, presiding at two police-courts, the Mansion House and the Guildhall, and a police force, independent of the Metropolitan police, of about 700 men, is maintained at an annual expense of nearly £85,000. There are in the City 63 parish churches. Several others have recently been pulled down, in the course of the construction of new streets, and other improvements, and the parishes, some of them very small, have been united with others. The principal line of street in the City, eastward of St. Paul's, is named Cheapside, from the Saxon word chepe, a market, and another street, leading from near the foot of London Bridge to the Tower, is Eastcheap. The names of several of the streets, north and south of Cheapside, as Bread-street, Milk-street, Wood-street, and of the busy thoroughfare, Cornhill, preserve associations of the old markets. The modern markets, bridges, and railway-stations within the City will be described under the proper headings. The depression of the valley of the Fleet, in the western part of the City, is spanned by the Holborn Viaduct, which extends from Newgate-street to the end of Hatton Garden, and provides a nearly level road, 1,400 feet long and 80 feet wide, instead of the former steep inclines of Holborn Hill and Snow Hill. At the west end of the Viaduct is a circus 170 feet in diameter, from which six lines of thoroughfare diverge. Broad streets run to the new meat market and to the low level streets. Farringdon-street is crossed by an oblique bridge of three Gothic arches supported on twelve hexagonal columns of polished red granite. On the viaduct are memorial statues of Sir William Walworth, Sir Thomas Gresham, Henry Fitz-Alwyn (the first mayor), and Sir Hugh Myddelton, and emblematical statues of Commerce, Science, Art, and Agriculture, and at the western end is an equestrian statue of Prince Albert.

Chief Public Buildings.—The Guildhall, at the northern end of King-street, Cheapside, retains little more of the original structure (erected in the 15th century, but nearly all destroyed by the Great Fire of London in 1666, than the crypt and some portion of the old walls. It was almost entirely rebuilt in 1789, and has been recently restored, and a new roof constructed. The great hall, in which the civic banquets and public meetings are held, is 152 feet long, 48 feet wide, and 55 feet high. There are at each end large painted windows, one a memorial of the late Prince Consort, and the other commemorating the exertions made by the City of London to assist Lancashire in the cotton famine of 1861-5. The famous figures of Gog and Magog are at the western end, and on the walls are large groups of sculpture in memory of the Earl of Chatham, William Pitt, Alderman Beckford, Lord Nelson, and the Duke of Wellington. A magnificent building, containing a free public library and museum, in connexion with Guildhall, was opened in 1872. The Mansion House, the official residence of the Lord Mayor during his year of office, at the eastern end of Cheapside, was erected by Dance between 1739 and 1753. Near it is the Royal Exchange, on the site of the old Royal Exchange, destroyed by fire in 1838. It was erected by Mr. Tite; the first stone was laid by Prince Albert, January 17th, 1842, and the structure was opened by Queen Victoria, October 28th, 1844. The length from the portico at the west end to the columns of the east entrance is 308 feet; the width of the west end is 119 feet, of the east end 174 feet. The interior quadrangular area is 170 feet by 112 feet, of which 111 feet by 53 feet is uncovered, leaving 21 feet for the width of the ambulatory clear of the plinths. The height of the bell-tower to the top of the vane is 177 feet. In the centre of the quadrangle is a statue of the Queen, by Gibson, and in front of the grand or western entrance is a bronze equestrian statue, by Chantrey, of the Duke of Wellington. The Bank of England, almost immediately adjacent, was originally erected from a design by Mr. George Sampson, 1732 to 1734. The east and west wings were added by Sir Robert Taylor between 1766 and 1786; and the remainder of the structure was completed by Sir John Soane, 1788, and the whole of the exterior appearance has since been improved by Mr. Cockerell. It now covers an irregular space of four acres. The General Post Office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, near St. Paul's, was built between 1824 and 1829 from the designs of Sir Robert Smirke. The building is of the Ionic order, 389 feet long, 130 feet wide, and 64 feet high. A new and larger building, on the opposite side of the street, containing the offices of the administrative department, and the telegraphic department, was completed in 1874. The Custom house in Lower Thames-street was built 1814-17, but the present front towards the Thames was erected at a later period. The Corn Exchange is in Mark-lane; the Coal Exchange in Lower Thames-street; the Stock Exchange near the Royal Exchange. It is impossible within the present limits to describe the many banks, insurance offices, and other business establishments in the City, many of which are noble and extensive buildings. Of the halls of the City Companies, the most conspicuous from an architectural point of view are the Fishmongers' at the foot of London bridge; the Goldsmiths', near the Post Office; and the Drapers' in Throgmorton-street, near the Bank of England. Christ's Hospital, or the Bluecoat School, occupies a stack of buildings of varied architecture and dates, near Newgate-street. The Record Office, between Fetter and Chancery-lane, is an extensive edifice with a massive Tudor tower.

Churches.—St. Paul's Cathedral stands on the summit of a small hill between Ludgate hill and Cheapside, on the highest ground in the City. It was built by Sir Christopher Wren on the site of a former St. Paul's Cathedral, of Gothic architecture, which was burnt by the great fire in 1666. Sir Christopher laid the first stone June 21st, 1675; and he completed it in 1710. It is the only English cathedral built in the classic style. It is built in the usual form of a cross. The length from east to west is 500 feet; the length of the transept is 285 feet. Over the intersection of the nave and transept rises a dome surmounted by a lantern, globe, and cross. The height to the summit of the cross is 404 feet from the floor of the crypt, but 365 feet from the level of St. Paul's Churchyard. Two campaniles towers, 220 feet high, flank the great western portico. In the interior are many monuments and statues erected in honour of naval and military commanders, and others in honour of philanthropists, literary men, and artists. In the crypt the remains of Nelson and Wellington are deposited—those of Nelson in the sarcophagus originally prepared by Cardinal Wolsey, and intended by him for his own interment in the chapel at Windsor; those of Wellington lie about 20 feet east of Nelson's. A considerable amount has recently been expended in restoration and decorations. About 50 of the early churches in the City were built from designs by Wren, after the great fire. Several of them have very beautiful towers and spires. Of the older churches, most interesting for historical association are the Temple Church, the most ancient part of which is one of the few circular churches built in this country in imitation of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and the church of the Knights Templars; St. Bartholomew's in Smithfield; St. Giles's, Cripplegate; and St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate-street. Conspicuous for size or architectural merit, are St. Bride's, Fleet-street; St. Andrew's and St. Sepulchre's, near the Holborn Viaduct; St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside; St. Mary Aldermary; St. Michael's, Cornhill; St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and St. Mary Woolnoth, near the Royal Exchange. There is a large Roman Catholic chapel at Moorfields, east of the Exchange; a Greek church near the same spot, and many chapels belonging to various bodies of Dissenters.

Public Monuments.—The Monument, on Fish Street Hill, near the foot of London Bridge, marks the spot where the great fire of 1666 broke out. It is a fluted Doric column, standing on a massive plinth, sculptured with bas-relievos. There are a statue of William IV. at the junction of King William Street and New Bridge Street; of Sir Robert Peel at the eastern end of Cheapside; of the Duke of Wellington in front of the Exchange; of the Queen in the quadrangle of the Exchange; of Queen Anne, in front of St. Paul's; and of Mr. Peabody, the American merchant, near the Exchange. A memorial, with statues of the Queen and Prince of Wales, marks the site of Temple Bar, removed in 1879.

The Tower.—Immediately adjoining the eastern limit of the City, but not included within the civic boundaries, and close to the Thames, is the famous historical fortress, the Tower of London. It consists of a number of structures inclosed within a wall and a ditch. The oldest part is the White Tower, which stands nearly in the centre of the quadrangle, and is known to have been built by Gundulph, bishop of Rochester, for the Conqueror, about the year 1078. The area within the walls of the Tower exceeds 12 acres. The ditch is now dry, and ornamentally laid out as a pleasure ground, with flower beds. Round the quadrangle are several towers which have distinctive names, and at the north-western corner is the church of St. Peter-ad-Vincula. The horse armoury, Queen Elizabeth's armoury, and the regalia are now exhibited in the Tower. Large portions of the Tower buildings have been rebuilt within the last few years.

The Temple.—This extensive collection of buildings, now occupied by the Inns of Court, the Middle and Inner Temple, between Fleet-street and the river, in the western part of the City, besides the interesting church mentioned above, has Halls and Library, and beautiful gardens reaching to the Embankment. Middle Temple Hall, 100 feet long, and 47 feet high, is one of the finest Elizabethan structures in London. A new Inner Temple Hall was opened by the Princess Louise in 1870. The Library of the Middle Temple, a beautiful building, was opened in 1861. The residents are principally barristers, solicitors, and others connected with the profession of the law.

Westminster.—The City and Liberty of Westminster extends from Fleet Street, on the east, to Kensington and Chelsea on the west, and from the Thames on the south to Marylebone on the north. The metropolitan borough of Westminster includes, in addition to the city and liberty, the district of the Savoy and the lordship of the duchy of Lancaster, which are situated between the Strand and the bank of the Thames.

The Abbey and Church.—The most ancient public building is Westminster Abbey. A church was built here, on a small island (known as Thorney Island, formed by a small creek, of which no trace now exists, running into the Thames,) by Sebert, king of the East Saxons, and dedicated to St. Peter. It was known as the West Minster, to distinguish it from St. Paul's, or the East Minster; but the first Westminster Abbey was erected by Edward the Confessor, 1049 to 1066. Henry III., in 1220, commenced the building of a chapel dedicated to the Virgin at the east end of the church. In 1245 he began to take down and rebuild the church. He died in 1272. The parts of the present structure erected during his reign are not exactly known; but he is supposed to have completed the choir and transepts, besides erecting the chapel to the Virgin and the chapel of Edward the Confessor. The building was afterwards carried on by successive abbots. Henry VII. took down Henry III.'s chapel to the Virgin, in order to make room for his own Lady Chapel, which is now called Henry VII.'s Chapel, a beautiful building, containing the tombs of many royal personages. The upper parts of the two western towers were added by Sir Christopher Wren. The beautiful octagonal chapter-house was built in 1250, and there the first Parliament met. In Poets' Corner, in the south-eastern transept, are tombs of many of the most eminent men connected with English literature, and in the cloisters are numerous interesting tombs. The interior length of the Abbey, including Henry VII.'s Chapel, is 511 feet; entire breadth, across the transepts, 203 feet; length of the nave, 166 feet; length of the choir, 155 feet; breadth of the nave and aisles, 79 feet; breadth of the choir, 38 feet; height of the roof, 102 feet; height of the western towers, 224 feet. Henry VII.'s Chapel is 103 feet long, 70 feet wide, and 60 feet high. There are in Westminster nearly 30 other churches belonging to the Established Church, among which the most conspicuous are St. Martin's-in-the-Fields and St. Mary-le-Strand, both built by Gibbs; Whitehall Chapel, erected by Inigo Jones as the banqueting-hall for the intended palace of Whitehall; St. Margaret's church, (near Westminster Abbey), which possesses a very fine window of painted glass; St. James's, Piccadilly; and St. Paul's, Covent Garden. Westminster School, one of the great public schools of England, immediately adjoins the abbey, and is entered from Dean's Yard.

Royal Palaces.—St. James's Palace, an old and irregular brick structure opposite the bottom of St. James's-street, was originally built in 1532 by Henry VIII., after a design by Holbein. Many of the kings and queens of England up to the time of George III. resided in it. Buckingham Palace, at the west end of St. James's Park, is the town residence of Queen Victoria, and used for drawing-rooms, concerts, and other state occasions. It was commenced by Nash for George IV.; a new front towards St. James's Park was subsequently added. Behind the palace is a large garden.

Westminster Hall and the Houses of Parliament.—These together form the New Palace of Westminster, between the Abbey and the river. Westminster Hall, erected in the latter part of the 14th century, on the foundations of the banqueting-hall of the palace built by William Rufus, is 270 feet long, 74 feet wide, and 90 feet high. The roof is of timber, and is perhaps the largest roof in Europe unsupported by pillars. The splendid hall now forms a vestibule to the Houses of Parliament, and on the western side were situated the old Law Courts, now pulled down, the proceedings being transferred to the Royal Courts of Justice. The New Palace of Westminster is one of the finest in Europe. It was erected, after destruction of the old Houses of Parliament by fire, in 1834, and the range of buildings occupies a site 900 feet long and 300 feet wide, with a terrace along the bank of the river. The House of Lords, a most richly decorated chamber, is separated from the House of Commons by the Octagon Hall, 70 feet in diameter. Over this hall is a richly-crocketed gothic spire, the summit rising to the height of 300 feet. The Victoria Tower, which stands at the south-western angle is 346 feet high, 75 feet square, and rises over four magnificent pointed arches 60 feet in height. The Clock Tower, which stands at the north-western angle of the building, is 40 feet square, and has an eight-day clock with four faces, each nearly 30 feet in diameter, striking the hours on a bell weighing 9 tons, and chiming the quarters on eight bells. It is surmounted by a richly-decorated belfry spire, the summit of which is 320 feet above the ground. To afford light to the interior parts of the structure there is a long series of courts connected together by groined archways under the chief buildings. Sir Charles Barry was the architect of this splendid structure.

Public Offices.—On the south side of Whitehall are some of the most important government offices—the Treasury, extending from Downing-street to the Horse Guards, and including the Board of Trade; the Horse Guards, where are some of the military departments of the War Office; and the Admiralty, containing the offices of the First Lord of the Admiralty and the four Junior Lords. The new Foreign Office covers a large area south of the Treasury; with it is united, as the southern portion of the edifice, the India Office. The building is lofty as well as large, and has the principal front towards St. James's Park. The style is palatial Italian of two orders, the lower Tuscan, the upper Corinthian, the general effect being heightened by polished granite, coloured marbles, and other polychromatic decorations, sculpture, and well-executed carving. An Inner Court, 250 feet by 170, is treated with the same refinement and finish as the exterior façades, and adorned with numerous statues. The India Office has also its inner court, smaller, but much more floridly decorated, and covered with a glass roof. The state-rooms of both are exceedingly splendid. The architect was Sir G. G. Scott, R.A., but the inner court and interior of the India Office were completed from the designs of Mr. M. D. Wyatt, the architect to the India Board. The War Office is in Pall Mall. Other public offices, including the Inland Revenue, Stamps and Taxes, Registrar General's, and Probate department, are in Somerset House, a very large building, enclosing a quadrangle, between the Strand and the Thames, with a long terrace overlooking the river. This noble structure was erected in 1780, from the designs of Sir William Chambers, on the site of the fine residence of the Protector Somerset, who was executed in 1552.

Club Houses.—The most important of these superb establishments are in Pall-Mall, St. James-street, and the immediate vicinity. The finest of them architecturally are the Carlton, Reform, Athenæum, United Service, Junior United Service, and Conservative.

Statues and Memorials.—At Charing Cross is an equestrian statue of Charles I.; in Trafalgar-square, an equestrian statue of George IV., statues of Sir Charles Napier and General Havelock, and the Nelson column, a lofty pillar, surmounted by a statue of the hero, and with four colossal lions, modelled by Sir Edwin Landseer, at the base; at the eastern end of Pall-Mall is an equestrian statue of George III., and near at hand the memorial erected to the Guards who fell in the Crimea, and a statue of Lord Herbert of Lea. Near the Abbey and the Houses of Parliament are statues of George Canning, the Earl of Derby, and Lord Palmerston; opposite the western façade of the Abbey, a pillar commemorating Lord Raglan, and other Crimean heroes educated at Westminster School. A tall column at the head of a flight of steps leading from Carlton Gardens to St. James's Park, is surmounted by a statue of the Duke of York, second son of George III.; in Carlton Gardens are statues of Lord Clyde and Sir John Franklin; on the Embankment, near Northumberland Avenue, leading to Charing Cross, statues of Sir James Outram, Brunel the Engineer, and Robert Raikes, founder of Sunday schools. Facing the entrance to the House of Lords is an equestrian statue of Richard I. by Marochetti. In front of Charing Cross station is a reproduction of the old Charing Cross (one of the famous Eleanor crosses); and there are memorial statues in some of the squares.

LAMBETH.—The greater part of this extensive parish lies low, and was at one time little more than a marsh, but the parish extends to the elevated districts of Norwood. The church, St. Mary's, is an ancient structure, and contains some interesting monuments. The most interesting edifice is Lambeth Palace, the town residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the river side. It was founded in 1197. There are a chapel, great hall, and library, and at the entrance gate, the famous Lollards' Tower, where so many of the early Protestants were imprisoned. Included in the parish is Kennington, and the old borough included Camberwell, the new parish church of which, St. Giles's, erected from the design of Messrs. Scott and Moffatt, and opened in 1844, has a spire 207 feet high, and is one of the finest churches in the suburbs of the metropolis.

SOUTHWARK.—This borough lies on the southern side of the Thames, immediately opposite the city of London. It is one of the most irregularly built, crowded, and busy parts of the metropolis; but a handsome new street, Southwark-street, extending from the foot of Blackfriars-bridge to the Borough High-street, contains extensive and handsome warehouses and business establishments. The most interesting church is that of St. Saviour's, formerly known as St. Mary Overies, near London bridge. It was rebuilt towards the end of the 14th century, and the beautiful lady's chapel restored about 1830. This is one of the largest and finest parish churches in England, and is especially interesting as containing the tombs of Gower, Fletcher, and Massinger, the poets, and of Edmund, a younger brother of Shakespeare. In this church, in 1424, James I., of Scotland, married Joan Beaufort, niece of the great Cardinal. St. George's church at the corner of Great Dover-street was erected in 1735 on the site of a very old church.

GREENWICH. (See GREENWICH and DEPTFORD.)

MARYLEBONE.—This borough takes its name from the church of St. Mary-at-the-Bourne, so called from its position near one of the little bournes, or streams, which flowed into the Thames. The present parish church, in the Marylebone-road, was built in 1817. The parishes of Paddington and St. Pancras are included in the district. There are several district churches. Marylebone and Paddington were suburban villages until the middle of the last century. In the western part of the district is the splendid locality popularly known as Tyburnia, where some of the finest residences in the metropolis have been erected within the last 30 years. In some of the older parts are noble mansions, mostly built in the last century. Cavendish-square was laid out in 1715; Wigmore-street commenced about 15 years later, Portman-square begun in 1764; the New-road (now the Marylebone-road) connecting the manor of Lisson or Lillstone, formed in 1757; and Nash, the architect, under the patronage of the Prince Regent, formed the famous Regent-street and its eastern termination, the Quadrant.

FINSBURY.—This large district, including the parishes of Clerkenwell, St. Luke's and Islington, is named from the fens which formerly existed at the north of the city walls, and it extends northward from the civic boundary to the foot of the hill on which is situated the pretty suburban village of Hornsey. Clerkenwell is, as we have mentioned above, the great seat of the watch and jewellery manufacture in London. It derives its name from a well, near which the clerks, or secular clergy, used to assemble for the representation of miracle plays, and for other purposes. The famous priory of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, or Hospitallers, founded in 1100, stood here, and the old gatehouse yet remains. Near it is the Carthusian monastery, founded in 1371, by Sir Walter Manny, and converted, in the early part of the 17th century, by Sir Thomas Sutton, into the Charter House, famous for its great school (recently removed to Godalming, in Surrey, and superseded here by the Merchant Taylors' School, for which a noble new building has been recently erected), and for the liberal asylum offered to gentlemen upon whom misfortune has come. St. Luke's parish contains a large asylum for the insane, in Old-street, near the City-road. Islington occupies an elevated site, north of Clerkenwell, and includes Barnsbury, Holloway, Canonbury, Highbury, a portion of Stoke Newington, and other pleasant and rapidly-increasing suburban districts. Until the commencement of the present century, Islington was almost a rural village, with many pleasant places of entertainment. Now it is a large and thriving town, with long streets, handsome shops, and about 300,000 inhabitants. The old church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, built in 1483, was pulled down in 1751, and a new church erected. There are now a large number of district churches, and chapels for almost every denomination of Dissenters. In the southern part of the parish, near the Green, is the Agricultural Hall, perhaps the largest hall in the kingdom, opened in 1862. The great cattle show is held here annually, and horse shows and other exhibitions requiring large space are frequently held here. The parish is traversed by the New River, constructed by Sir Hugh Myddelton early in the 17th century, for the purpose of bringing water into London from Amwell, in Hertfordshire, a distance of about 30 miles, and still, with the addition of filtered water from other springs and the river Lea, the main source of the water supply of the north of London. Finsbury Park, occupying the summit of one of the Hornsey hills, is within the limits of the district. Stoke Newington is a very pleasant suburb. There are two parish churches, the old one being retained, and a very handsome and large church near it having been recently erected.

TOWER HAMLETS AND HACKNEY.—These boroughs were united as the Tower Hamlets previous to the Reform Act of 1868, by which Hackney was constituted a separate parliamentary borough. The Tower Hamlets include the eastern district of the metropolis beyond the Tower, and extend along the river, containing the parishes of Whitechapel, Spitalfields, Stepney, Limehouse, Shadwell, and Poplar. The three latter are riverside districts. Important manufactures are carried on, and other principal industries are in connexion with the docks and the shipping trade. Limehouse church, a large and massive structure, was erected early in the last century. The church, a handsome edifice, with a lofty steeple, on the site of an older edifice, was built by the East India Company in 1776. Shadwell, another riverside district, derives its name from St. Chad's Well. The parish church, dedicated to St. Paul, was rebuilt in 1821. Whitechapel lies directly beyond Aldgate, the eastern limit of the City. It is a busy place, with many narrow and irregular streets, and inhabited by a poor working-class population, including many Jews and Germans. The old church, dedicated to St. Mary Matfellon, was superseded in 1673 by a parish church, and a very handsome new structure was opened in February, 1877, but destroyed by fire in 1880, and rebuilt very handsomely. Spitalfields lies to the north of Whitechapel, extending between Bishopsgate-street and Bethnal-green. The silk manufactured here is famous throughout the world. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, a large number of French Huguenots settled here, and introduced silk-weaving, and there are still very noticeable traces of French origin in the names of many of the inhabitants. It is one of the poorest but most industrious districts of the metropolis. The district of Hackney includes the parishes of Hackney, Bethnal-green, and Shoreditch. Hackney is a pleasant suburb, including Clapton, inhabited by many opulent persons. There are a town-hall and many fine shops. The parish church was built in 1798 upon the site of an older edifice, the tower of which still stands. Bethnal Green is between Hackney and Stepney, of which it formed a portion previous to 1743. The parish church is on the Green, once a favourite place of suburban residence. There are 10 district churches, and many other places of worship. It is a poor but busy place, in which many manufactures and humble industries are carried on. Shoreditch, the name derived from Soerdich, the name of the old lords of the manor, extends from the Kingsland-road to Hackney, and lies to the north-west of Bethnal Green, and includes the suburb of Haggerston. The parish church is a large structure, and there is a handsome town-hall, or, more properly, vestry-hall, near it.

CHELSEA.—The district of Chelsea, including Kensington and Hammersmith, is in the extreme west of the metropolis. CHELSEA and HAMMERSMITH are noticed under their respective headings. Kensington, "the old Court suburb," as it has been named, lies beyond Knightsbridge, and between the parishes of Chelsea and Paddington. It includes the suburbs of Brompton in the south, and Notting Hill in the north. Kensington Palace, an unpretending but spacious edifice, at the western side of Kensington Gardens, was purchased from Lord Chancellor Finch by William III., and was a favourite residence of that monarch and his successors. It was the birthplace of Queen Victoria. Farther west, between the Hammersmith and Uxbridge roads, is Holland House, the finest private residence near London, and famous for literary and political associations connected with Addison, the Fox family, and many other eminent names in literature. Kensington parish church, a very large and handsome structure, has been recently rebuilt, the old church, which contained some interesting monuments, having been found to be inadequate. There are several district churches, and numerous chapels. A very handsome town-hall, designed by Mr. R. Walker, was opened in 1880. Kensington Gardens are mentioned farther on.

SUBURBS OF LONDON.—The most interesting suburbs of London, on the northern side, are Kilburn, Hampstead, Highgate, Hornsey, Muswell Hill, Wood Green, and Tottenham. (See HAMPSTEAD and HIGHGATE.) On the summit of Muswell Hill is the Alexandra Palace, a very large and attractive building, standing in the midst of beautiful grounds, and commanding an extensive prospect. The first structure, in the erection of which the materials of the Exhibition building of 1862 were employed, was destroyed by fire in 1873; the present building was opened in 1875. On the south side of the Thames, the principal suburbs are Battersea, with a fine park, Clapham (where is a large common), Streatham, Dulwich (where is Dulwich College, founded by Edward Alleyn, a comedian, and including a large school, located in very fine buildings recently erected, and residences for "poor brothers," and a gallery of paintings, bequeathed in 1810 by Sir Francis Bourgeois), and Norwood and Sydenham, beautiful elevated districts, adorned with many handsome residences, and with the Crystal Palace, the famous structure of iron and glass, designed by Sir Joseph Paxton, and opened by the Queen in 1854. The gardens are very beautiful, and the palace is famous for the interior courts and other attractions, and for the many musical festivals and the receptions of royal and other eminent personages held there. Peckham, where is a large open space, the Rye; Lewisham and Blackheath, an elevated tract near Greenwich, historically famous, are other interesting places of resort.

Parks and Pleasure Grounds.—St. James's Park (90 acres), to the west of Whitehall, has an enclosure, attractively laid out, with a large sheet of water. On the northern side are St. James's Palace; Marlborough House, the residence of the Prince of Wales; Clarence House, the residence of the Duke of Edinburgh; and other fine mansions. At the western end is Buckingham Palace; on the eastern side the Horse Guards, Admiralty, Foreign, and other government offices; and on the southern side, the Wellington Barracks. The Green Park (60 acres) is between St. James's and Piccadilly, and to the north-west is Hyde Park (390 acres), beyond which are Kensington Gardens, famous for the noble trees and avenues. The Serpentine river, a broad sheet of water, is in Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park. In Kensington Gardens is the National Albert Memorial. The design, by Sir G. G. Scott, is based on that of an Eleanor Cross. The gilt statue of the Prince is by Foley. The shrine which rises above it is supported by clustered columns of polished granite, and is "crowned by a lofty spire of rich tabernacle work in partially gilt and enamelled metal, terminating in a cross." At the base are four groups of sculpture, emblematical of the great divisions of the world. Regent's Park is on the north-west, beyond the Marylebone-road. It is the largest of the London parks, three miles in circuit, beautifully laid out, with a large lake, and contains the gardens and collections of the Zoological Society and the Botanic Gardens. The park is nearly surrounded by terraces of splendid houses. Near the northern end is Primrose Hill, also enclosed as a park. Victoria Park (290 acres), near Bethnal Green, opened in 1847, is one of the finest of the parks, beautifully laid out with lakes and flower-beds, and open spaces for cricket. Battersea Park (180 acres) is on the south side of the Thames, nearly opposite Chelsea. It is laid out with great taste, and has cricket and other recreation grounds. The following are the parks and open spaces laid out and under the care of the Metropolitan Board of Works:—Finsbury Park (115 acres), on an elevated site, whence extensive views are obtained; Southwark Park (63 acres), a recreation ground for a very crowded district; Hampstead Heath (240 acres); Blackheath (267 acres); the Hackney Commons, including Hackney Downs and the London Fields (altogether 180 acres), Shepherd's Bush Common, west of Notting Hill (8 acres), and Tooting Beck Common in Surrey (144 acres).

Bridges.—London Bridge, opened 1831, 54 feet wide, with five arches, the middle one of 152 feet span, built at a cost, including the approaches, of more than £2,000,000. Southwark Bridge, an iron bridge of three arches, opened in 1819. Blackfriars Bridge, a very fine new bridge, with a length of 922 feet, width 80 feet, and the incline a gradient of about 1 foot in 40. The abutments and piers are of granite, four having on them columns of polished red granite 12 feet high and 7 feet in diameter, with carved bases and capitals of Portland stone. There are 5 wrought-iron arches, Venetian Gothic in character. Each of the shore arches is 152 feet in span, the next 175 feet each, and the centre arch 186 feet. Immediately east, is the massive iron bridge of the London, Chatham, and Dover railway. Waterloo Bridge was opened in 1817, on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. It consists of nine equal arches, each of 120 feet span; the piers are 20 feet thick, and adorned with Tuscan columns; the width within the parapets is 42 feet. It cost upwards of £1,000,000, which was raised by subscription. Farther west is the fine bridge of the South-Eastern railway, communicating with Charing Cross station. It is of iron, and has side passages for foot passengers. Westminster Bridge, opened in 1863, is a noble structure of 7 low segmental arches of wrought and cast-iron borne on solid granite piers; is in all 1,160 feet long, with a roadway 85 feet wide and nearly level throughout—a greater width than that of any other bridge in Europe. Lambeth Bridge, near Lambeth Palace, is a suspension bridge, for foot passengers only. Vauxhall Bridge, opened in 1816, is an iron bridge of nine arches. Chelsea New Bridge is an elegant suspension bridge, opened in 1858, and further west is Albert Suspension Bridge, opened in 1874.

Principal Churches.—The most remarkable churches in the City have been mentioned. In the other parts of the metropolis are 48 parish, and a very large number of district churches. Among the largest and most conspicuous for architectural merits, or historical and other associations, are St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Trafalgar Square, noted for the beautiful portico; St. Giles-in-the-Fields; St. James's, Piccadilly; St. George's, Hanover Square; St. George's, Bloomsbury; new St. Pancras church, Euston-road; St. Marylebone church, Marylebone-road; St. Margaret's, near Oxford-street; St. Alban's, Baldwin's Gardens, near Grays' Inn; St. Dunstan's, Stepney, a very old church, with interesting monuments, and several other churches mentioned in the proper connection. Many of the churches are remarkably spacious and beautiful structures. There are a Roman Catholic cathedral in St. George's Fields, Lambeth, and several other edifices belonging to the same church. Dissenters' chapels are numerous, and the Jews have several fine synagogues. In Gordon-square, St. Pancras, is a large church of the Irvingites.

The River and Docks.—The port of London extends for general purposes from London Bridge to a little below Blackwall, about 8 miles. That part of the river where ships lie, between the bridge and Deptford, is known as the Pool. Nearest to the Tower, on the north side of the river, are the St. Katherine's Docks, which include an area of 23 acres, 11 acres of which are water. The London Docks are three:—London Dock, with an area of 20 acres, East London Dock, with an area of 7 acres, and Shadwell Basin, with an area of 3 acres. The warehouses are large, the tobacco warehouse alone occupying 75 acres. The West India Docks are about one mile and a half east from the London Docks. The entire area occupied by these docks, including the canal cut to avoid the bend of the Thames at the Isle of Dogs, is 295 acres. The East India Docks are below Blackwall. The import dock has an area of 19 acres; the area of the export dock is 10 acres. These docks, since the opening of the trade to India, have been purchased by the proprietors of the West India Docks, and are now open to vessels from all parts. The Millwall Docks have an area of 33 acres. On the south side of the river are the Commercial Docks (six in number), the Grand Surrey Docks, the great emporium of the timber trade, and some smaller docks.

Markets.—The new Cattle Market, Caledonian-road, Islington, opened in 1855 to supersede the old and inadequate Smithfield, has a central building, with a tall clock-tower, extensive ranges of slaughter-houses, and ample accommodation as a market for live stock. It occupies an area of 74 acres, and cost nearly £60,000. On the site of the old Smithfield a new meat market has been erected, and was opened in 1868. Externally it is an immense parallelogram, 631 feet long by 246 wide; is constructed of red brick and stone; in a modification of the Italian style, the walls having a series of recessed arcades between Tuscan pilasters, and at the angles octagonal towers, rising from a square base and surmounted with pointed octagonal cupolas. The interior is crossed from north to south by a main road 56 feet wide and 54 feet high, and from east to west by six avenues each 25 feet wide; it contains 162 shops, besides a tavern or restaurant in the base of each tower, a post-office, telegraph station, &c., and is light, well ventilated, and well fitted. An upper story, borne on iron columns, contains rooms for the salesmen. A remarkable feature of the market is that it is entirely supported on immense girders borne on 180 wrought-iron columns, the basement, an area of nearly 3½ acres, being a great railway depôt, with the Metropolitan Railway passing through it, and there being sidings and platforms for the Great Western, Midland, Great Northern, and London, Chatham, and Dover railways; stages for the delivery of meat, hydraulic lifts for raising it into the market above, and winding roads of easy gradients into the streets. Its construction cost about £200,000, exclusive of a large amount for site and approaches. A market for poultry has since been added, built in a corresponding style. Covent Garden Market, the great fruit and vegetable market, is on the north of the Strand, on the site of the garden of the old nunnery of St. Mary Rounceval, whence the name, Covent, or Convent, Garden. The market buildings were erected in 1830. Billingsgate, the market for fish, is between Thames-street and the river, adjoining the Custom House; Farringdon Market, for vegetables and fruit, in the City, near Farringdon-street; Leadenhall, poultry and meat; Spitalfields, vegetable market; the Borough Market, vegetables, especially potatoes in Southwark, near St. Saviour's church, and there are several other less important markets.

Museums and Art Galleries.—The British Museum, in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, near New Oxford-street, contains vast collections of antiquities (the former natural history collection being transferred to South Kensington), a library of over a million books and immense numbers of valuable manuscripts and many other literary treasures, open to the public under certain necessary restrictions. The South Kensington Museum an immense range of buildings at the west of London, near the site of the Great Exhibition of 1862, at Brompton, is chiefly devoted to artistic and scientific collections. The Bethnal Green Museum, at the east end of the metropolis, is an offshoot of the great institution at South Kensington. There are also the Museum of Practical Geology, in Jermyn-street, Piccadilly; the Museum of the College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields; and various other smaller museums. The National Gallery, containing a noble collection of paintings of every school of art, occupies an extensive building in Trafalgar-square, Charing Cross; the Royal Academy exhibition is held in a magnificent suite of rooms in Burlington House, Piccadilly. There are various other galleries, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Pall Mall; and a list of scientific societies would include the leading institutions of England in connexion with every department of science.

Education.—The University of London occupies a very handsome building adjoining Burlington House; it is an examining body, not educational, and confers degrees. A large school, under its auspices, is in Gower-street, near the Euston-road. King's College occupies the east wing of Somerset House. It was founded in 1828 for imparting a university education in accordance with the principles of the Church of England. A hospital is attached to the college, and it has museums and libraries. The School Board for London was established in 1870, under the Education Act. There are about 190 board schools in operation, at which 170,000 children are being educated.

Theatres and Halls.—The two Italian opera houses one at Covent Garden Theatre, in Bow-street, Covent-garden, and sometimes at Drury-lane Theatre, in Brydges-street, near the same locality. Her Majesty's Theatre, in Pall-mall, erected in the place of the famous edifice destroyed by fire in 1867, has not been re-opened for operatic performances. A new opera house is being built on the Embankment. Besides these there are generally about 30 theatres open in the metropolis. The Royal Albert Hall, at Kensington, adjoining the large gardens of the Horticultural Society, was erected as a memorial of the late Prince Consort, and opened in 1871. It is the most superb edifice of the kind in Europe, forming an immense oval, with many tiers of seats; the decorations are of the most magnificent character. There is a very large organ, and musical performances on a great scale are occasionally given. Exeter Hall, in the Strand, is well known as the place of meeting of various religious bodies, especially in May—it belongs to the Christian Young Men's Society; St. James's Hall, in Regent-street and Piccadilly, is a very handsome concert hall; and there are many other halls of a lower artistic grade.

Hospitals.—The principal hospitals are St. Bartholomew's, in Smithfield, founded in 1546, superseding a priory of Black Canons established in 1102, by Rahere, a minstrel or jester to Henry I. St. Thomas's (founded at Southwark in 1213), on the Lambeth bank of the Thames, opposite the Houses of Parliament, occupying a splendid series of detached buildings, opened by the Queen in 1871; Guy's Hospital, Southwark, founded in 1723 by Thomas Guy, a bookseller; St. George's Hospital, Hyde Park corner; the Middlesex Hospital, near Oxford-street; the Westminster Hospital, near the Abbey; King's College Hospital, near Lincoln's-inn-fields; the London Hospital, Whitechapel; the Consumption Hospital, Brompton; New Bethlehem for lunatics, on the Surrey side, and several others. There are also special hospitals for almost every kind of disease and infirmity.

Railways.—The terminal station of the London and North-Western railway is near Euston-square, in the Euston-road; the Great Western, at Paddington; the Great Northern, at King's Cross. At each of these stations are large and handsome hotels. There are stations of the South-Eastern, London, Brighton and South Coast, North Kent, and London and Greenwich, at the Surrey foot of London bridge. The South-Eastern railway has been extended into the centres of City and West-end activity at an enormous outlay. It crosses the river by two substantial iron bridges, and has its West-end terminus at Charing Cross, its City terminus at Cannon-street, at each there being a splendid hotel. The London, Brighton, and South Coast railway has a West-end terminus at Pimlico, close to which the Grosvenor hotel has been built. The North London railway company formed in 1866 a direct line from their old line at Kingsland to Broad-street, where they erected one of the most elegant and appropriate stations yet built in London. This new line gives the North-Western railway direct access to the City, and the company has formed here a large goods depôt. An extension of the Midland railway has been constructed from the main line at Bedford to the Euston-road. The St. Pancras terminus is said to be the largest extant; the roof which covers the platforms, a surprising example of engineering skill, is a single span of 240 feet. The Euston-road front of the station is a magnificent Gothic hotel, 340 feet long and 7 stories high, designed by Sir G. G. Scott, R.A. The Great Eastern railway has extended beyond the original station in Bishopsgate-street to Liverpool-street, in the City. There is another terminus in Fenchurch-street, which is also the terminus of the London and Blackwall and the London, Tilbury, and Southend lines of railway. The London, Chatham, and Dover has a terminus at Bridge-street, near the junction of Ludgate-hill with Fleet-street, and a short connecting line unites it with the Metropolitan and other northern railways. The Metropolitan railway is remarkable as running throughout its course beneath the streets of London. Its construction required great engineering skill, and was very costly, but it carries a number of passengers beyond parallel. An extension of it has been opened from Paddington westward to Brompton, and is carried thence to Westminster, and along the north side of the Thames into the City, near the Mansion House, so as to form a nearly unbroken circular line. Another extension northwards to St. John's Wood was opened in 1868. The Metropolitan railway is connected with the Great Western, Great Northern, and Midland railways, thus affording those companies access to the City terminus, Moorgate, and further east to Aldgate. The East of London, is carried through the Thames Tunnel, thus uniting the northern and southern sides of the Thames.

Inns of Court.—Lincoln's Inn, between Chancery Lane and Lincoln's Inn Fields, with a noble hall and library, in the Tudor style, opened by the Queen in 1845; Gray's Inn, north of Holborn, with a Gothic hall and chapel, and large gardens, and the Inner and Middle Temples, in Fleet-street.

Canals.—The principal canals are the Paddington and Regent's, on the north side, and the Surrey Canal on the south.

Drainage.—The Metropolitan Main Drainage is the most complete as well as the most costly scheme for the sewerage of a great city which has ever been accomplished. The works consist of two entirely distinct series of intercepting sewers: one for London north of the Thames, the other for London on the south, each being carried to an outfall in the Thames about 13 miles below London bridge. On the northern side about 10 million cubic feet of sewage, and on the south side 4 million, are carried down per day, but provision is made for a much larger quantity, in addition to a rainfall of 28½ and 17¼ million cubic feet per day respectively, or a total of 63 million cubic feet per day. The cost of these sewers has exceeded £4,200,000. In all there are about 1,300 miles of ordinary sewers in London, and 82 miles of main intercepting sewers, the area drained being about 117 square miles.

Gas and Water Supply.—Gas is supplied by 9 companies, and water by 8.

Police and Fire Brigade.—Outside of the City there are 11 police courts at which stipendiary magistrates preside. The Metropolitan Police Force consists of about 11,000 men, under one Chief Commissioner, two Assistant Commissioners, and four district superintendents. The City police is an independent force. There are 49 land and 4 floating stations of the Fire Brigade, and 400 firemen.

Prisons.—Newgate; Holloway Prison, a large castellated structure; the Model Prison at Pentonville; the Middlesex House of Correction at Coldbath Fields; Westminster House of Correction, near the Abbey; and the Wandsworth House of Correction, are the largest.

Sessions Houses.—The sessions of the Central Criminal Court are held in the Sessions House, Old Bailey, adjoining Newgate; the Middlesex Sessions are held at Clerkenwell and Westminster; and the Surrey Sessions, at the Sessions House, Newington Causeway, Southwark.

Cemeteries.—The principal are Kensal Green, Paddington, Brompton, Highgate, Abney Park, Stoke Newington, the Great Northern Cemetery at Colney Hatch, Bethnal Green and Tower Hamlets, in the east, and Nunhead and Norwood in the south of London. The old Bunhill Fields burying ground, at Finsbury, a short distance beyond the City boundary, is memorable as the resting-place of John Bunyan, Daniel Defoe, and many other eminent Nonconformists.

Means of Conveyance.—Beside the railways, there are about 1,800 omnibuses and 6,000 cabs continually plying in the streets, and a large number of river steamers. Tram-lines are laid on many of the leading roads outside the City, which they are not allowed to enter.

Population.—The population of London within the city boundaries is 50,506, residing in 6,493 inhabited houses The central portions of the whole metropolis are included in what is officially called the "Inner London" of the Registrar General's Weekly Returns. The registered population of that area is 3 814,571, and the inhabited houses 486,286. The Metropolitan Police District is called "Greater London." It includes all the suburban districts as well as the centre, the entire population being 4,764,312, and the number of inhabited houses 645,818. The district included in the Local Management Act, subject to the local management of the various metropolitan vestries and district boards, has a population of 3,832,441, and 488,095 inhabited houses. The district under the control, for educational purposes, of the School Board for London, is precisely the same as that assigned to local management.

History.—The name of London is variously derived from the Celtic "Llyn-din" (town on lake)," "Llhwndinas" (town among the woods), or "Lhong-dinas" (town of ships). At a very remote period, one Belinus, described by Geoffrey of Monmouth as a king, is said to have formed a gate at the river side, and from that the modern name Billing's (or Belinus) gate is supposed to have been derived. From that gate the original British town of mud huts probably extended westward as far as the point then known as the Dwrgate, or "Watergate," now Dowgate, and backwards to what is now Fenchurch-street and Lombard-street. The river at that time expanded into a large lake, extending as far as the base of what are now known as the Camberwell and Greenwich hills, the latter standing out as bold headlands. To the north of the town was a forest, in which were deer, wild boars, and other fierce animals. On the north-east were extensive fens, from which Finsbury, or Fens-bury, took its name; eastward by the river-side were swamps and marshes. Cæsar makes no mention of London in his "Commentaries," unless, as some suppose, on very inadequate grounds, the Civitas Trinobantium of which he speaks was identical with the place. Verulam (St. Alban's) was then a place of far greater importance, and to that Cæsar marched, having passed through Surrey, and not having crossed the Thames till he reached a ford not far from Chertsey. When the Romans invaded England, for the second time, they gave the name Londinium to the town they had conquered. Queen Boadicea at the head of the Iceni attempted to drive them out, but was defeated with terrible slaughter near the place where now stands the station of the Great Northern Railway, and which was known, until a very few years since, as Battle Bridge. Under the Roman sway, Londinium grew to be a splendid city, one of the nine colonies of Britain. In the 3rd century the town was famous for its commerce, and several hundred ships were engaged in the export of corn From London great military roads radiated to various parts of Britain, and distances were measured from the lapis milliaris, in the forum of Agricola, in the heart of the Roman city. This stone, now known as London Stone (and referred to by that name by Shakspeare), still exists, and may be seen in the wall of St. Swithin's Church, opposite the Cannon-street station of the South-Eastern Railway. In the first half of the 4th century, London became a walled city. There is some uncertainty whether the wall was constructed by the empress Helena or by Theodosius, but the direction it took is well known, and can be traced by the aid of the modern names of streets, and considerable fragments remain. At the eastern end, by the river side, where the Tower of London now stands, was a strong fort; thence the wall followed the line of the Minories to Aldgate, and then curved to the north-west, between Bevis Marks and Houndsditch (a ditch beyond the wall) to Bishopsgate, whence it followed the line still known as London Wall to Cripplegate. It then took a southern course to Aldersgate, and behind St. Botolph's church and Christ's Hospital to Newgate, and thence to Ludgate and along Little Bridge-street to the Fleet river (which then flowed in the valley now known as Farringdon-street), which it skirted to its junction with the Thames, where another strong fort was erected. This line corresponds almost exactly with the present boundaries of the City of London, with the exception of the "liberties," or wards still known as "without," added at a later time. The largest of these additions is the ward of Farringdon Without, which includes Fleet-street, at the western end of which is the famous portal, the last of the City gates, Temple Bar. The extent of this wall was nearly two miles and a quarter. The river bank was also protected by a wall with three gates. On the land side the wall, 22 feet high, was defended by 15 strong towers, 40 feet high, and there were three gates, Aldgate, Aldersgate, and Ludgate; and afterwards a postern-gate (Postern-row still marks the spot) on Tower Hill. On the northern side was an outer work, or barbacan (the modern street Barbican preserves the memory). Fragments of the wall, composed chiefly of Kentish ragstone and large Roman bricks, may still be seen near Tower Hill; in the churchyard of St. Giles', Cripplegate; in the basements of some of the houses in Falcon-square and at Aldersgate-street, and at the top of Little Bridge-street, at the corner of St. Martin's-court, Ludgate-hill. Roman London was a magnificent city, as is proved by the beautiful tesselated pavements, altars, and other remains so frequently found at from 15 to 20 feet beneath the surface of the present city. On the summit of the small hill where now stands St. Paul's, was a large temple of Diana; there were numerous luxurious villas by the river side, and many more were on the south side of the Thames, some built on piles, and approached by causeways raised above the level of the surrounding low grounds. There were embankments on each side of the river. A field for martial exercises was established near Bishopsgate; and strong camps were formed at Islington, Highbury, and near the Old St. Pancras-road, and there were large extramural cemeteries. The cold springs, which underlie London, supplied the Roman baths, and some of them (especially one near the Strand, still fitted with the old Roman marble) remain. After the departure of the Romans, London was made the metropolis of the kingdom of Essex. In 610 a church was erected on the site of the present cathedral of St. Paul, and a Witenagemote, or council of wise men, was held here in 833. It was afterwards constituted, by Alfred the Great, the capital of England. In 994 the first bridge across the Thames was built. It was of wood and was replaced by another of stone in 1176, which remained until 1832, when it was superseded by the present London bridge. In 925 King Athelstan had a palace here, and, during successive reigns, the dimensions of the city were gradually extended. The White Tower, in the Tower of London, was erected by William I. in 1078; and William Rufus, in 1097, founded Westminster Hall. In 1255 a conduit in Cheapside was supplied with water by leaden pipes, and in 1340 tolls were imposed for paving the streets in and near the city. The streets were first lighted with lanterns in 1416; and, in 1443, the supply of water being found insufficient, pipes were laid from Paddington. A statute was passed in 1542, for paving some of the streets; and it appears that the Strand was then only partly built. At this time London was a very picturesque city, famous for the number of ecclesiastical establishments, and in the Strand, between London and Westminster, were many splendid residences of the nobility, mostly with fine gardens reaching to the Thames. The names of some of the streets in the Strand, as Essex, Norfolk, Cecil, Burleigh, Buckingham, and Northumberland, still preserve the old aristocratic associations. The last of the fine mansions, Northumberland House, was removed in 1875, to make room for the broad avenue connecting Charing Cross with the Victoria Embankment. So rapid in the 16th and 17th centuries had become the increase of London, that queen Elizabeth and king James each issued proclamations against any farther extension of the city. About 1661 a great many streets in St. James's parish were built, and finished, particularly St. James's-street, Pall Mall, and Piccadilly; and other streets ordered to be widened. In 1665 London was almost desolated by the great plague; and, in the following year, a dreadful conflagration broke out, and destroyed 13,000 houses, St. Paul's cathedral, and most of the churches and corporation halls. About five-sixths of the city was destroyed by the Great Fire, so named to distinguish it from numerous disastrous conflagrations from which at various periods the City suffered. Property to the value of £10,000,000 was destroyed. The place where it broke out is marked by the Monument, near London bridge; where it ceased, by an inscription near Smithfield. In rebuilding the city, many important improvements were effected, by the widening of the streets, and by constructing the houses of more substantial materials. The old City gates, nine in number, with the exception of Temple Bar, were removed in 1761, and the famous structure was taken down 1879. The following are some memorable events in the history.

LONDON, a city of Ontario province, Canada, capital of the county of Middlesex, at the junction of two branches of the river Thames, 114 miles S.W. of Toronto. There are a Westminster and a Blackfriars bridge, and the names of several of the principal streets are identical with those of streets in the English metropolis. It is the centre of a rich agricultural district, and, being connected with most of the leading American lines of railway, carries on a large trade. Manf. Iron, machinery, musical instruments, chemicals, leather, and petroleum. Pop., including suburbs, 19,746.

LONDON, EAST, the seaport of British Kaffraria, South Africa, at the mouth of the Buffalo river. The trade of the place is rapidly improving.

LONDON, NEW, a city and port of entry in New London county, Connecticut, United States, on the right bank of the Thames, 3 miles from its entrance into Long Island Sound. Its harbour is one of the best in the States, and is defended by a fort. The coasting trade and fisheries are important. Pop. 10,000.

LONDONDERRY, or DERRY, lun'-dun-der'-re, a maritime county of Ireland, province of Ulster, bounded S. by Tyrone, W. by Donegal, N. by the Atlantic Ocean, E. by the county of Antrim, from which it is separated by loughs Neagh and Beg. It is mountainous in the centre and in the south, where an elevation of more than 2,000 feet is attained, elsewhere generally low. The coastline on the Atlantic is steep and rugged. Potatoes are the principal crop. In some parts oats, barley, wheat, and flax are cultivated, and rye on the higher soils. Poultry is abundant, and eggs are exported Rivers.—The Foyle, navigable as far as Londonderry; the Bann (or White river), famous for salmon; the Faughan, and the Roe (or Red river).

Manf.—Principally linen.

Area.—810 square miles.

Pop.—164,714; more than half Protestants, the majority Presbyterians.

Chief Towns.—LONDONDERRY, COLERAINE, MAGHERAFELT, and NEWTON-LIMAVADY. The principal ports are Derry and Portrush.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county and one for the city of Londonderry.

History.—After the defeat and flight of Tyrone and O'Donnell, on the suppression of the great Irish rebellion early in the 17th century, the forfeited lands in this part of Ireland were given to the corporation of London. It is still managed by a committee of the corporation, which received a charter in 1619, and the district was formed into a county with the name London prefixed to the older Derry.

LONDONDERRY, the capital of the above county, a city, municipal and parliamentary borough, and seaport, is pleasantly situate on the Foyle, 125 miles N.W. of Dublin. It contains, within the walls, four main streets, which diverge from a square, named the Diamond; but the town has spread considerably beyond the old walls; and there is a large suburb, Waterside, on the opposite bank of the river. The ground on which the town stands is hilly. The old walls, flanked with bastions, which were built in the year 1614, still remain in fine repair, and are an ornament to the place. The principal buildings are a cathedral, a Gothic structure, built in the year 1633, and having a tower and a spire 178 feet high, a handsome and more modern Roman Catholic cathedral, a fine court-house, a bishop's palace, a deanery, various places of worship, a mechanics' institute, gaol, an infirmary, a small theatre, a linen-hall, district lunatic asylum, union workhouse, custom-house, and barracks; a triumphal arch, erected in 1789, and a column in honour of the Rev. George Walker, who defended the city during its memorable siege. Among the educational institutions is Magee College, founded in 1865. There is an extensive trade with the West Indies and America, and there is steam communication with Liverpool, Glasgow, and Belfast. The harbour is deep, wide, and tolerably secure, and there are large docks and extensive quays. Pop. 20,162. Lat. 54° 59′ 6″ N. Lon. 7° 19′ W.—A station on the Belfast and Northern Counties railway.—This town is of great antiquity. Derry, or Derry Calgach, took its rise from a monastery founded by St. Columba in 546. It was frequently pillaged by the Danes. The English, under De Courcy, captured it in 1198. It was besieged by King James II. from December, 1688, till August, 1689. An iron bridge across the Foyle was opened on New Year's day, 1878, having cost £80,000.

LONDONDERRY, ROBERT STEWART, second marquis of, English diplomatist and minister, more generally known as Lord Castlereagh. He was educated at Armagh and St. John's College, Cambridge, sat in the Irish Parliament in 1789, and the British parliament in 1794. In 1796 he became Viscount Castlereagh, and in 1798 was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, and made himself very unpopular by the severity with which he took part in the suppression of the rebellion. During the Pitt and Addington administrations he was in office as either privy councillor, president of the Board of Control, or secretary of state for war and the colonies. In 1807 he joined the Portland ministry, and being generally believed as answerable for the conduct of the war, he became, after the disastrous Walcheren expedition, perhaps the most unpopular of public men. His policy led, in 1809, to a duel between himself and Mr. Canning, at that time secretary for foreign affairs, in which the latter was severely wounded. He resigned shortly afterwards, and remained out of office until 1812, when he received the appointment of secretary of state for the foreign department, and on the death of Mr. Perceval he became ministerial leader of the House of Commons. At the peace of Paris, May, 1814, he represented the king of England, as he also did at the congress of Vienna some months later, at Paris, in 1815, after the battle of Waterloo, and at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1818. For these duties his dignified person and manners peculiarly fitted him. As leader of the government in the House of Commons, he was responsible for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in 1817, and for the "Six Acts," or "gagging bills," as they were popularly named, in 1819. In 1818 he was created knight of the Garter, and on the death of his father, three years afterwards, he became Marquis of Londonderry. As a statesman, his views were narrow and unphilosophical; his oratory was unequal, sometimes approaching brilliancy, but often inelegant and involved; but his great talents for business, combined with his firmness and charm of manner, caused him to achieve higher things than more richly-gifted men. He committed suicide at his residence, Foot's Cray, Kent, his mind having given way. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and the mob which followed the funeral procession shouted to show their pleasure. If one of the ablest, he was certainly one of the most disliked of British ministers.

Born in Ireland, 1769; died 1822.

LONDONDERRY, CHARLES WILLIAM STEWART VANE, third Marquis of, distinguished British soldier and diplomatist. He entered the army and served in the Netherlands at the age of 16. He was in the expedition to Egypt under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and under-secretary of state for the war department in 1803, but resigned office to serve in the Peninsula, under Sir John Moore, and covered the famous retreat to Corunna. He was afterwards adjutant-general to the Duke of Wellington, and distinguished himself at Talavera and in other engagements, for which he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1814 he was appointed ambassador to Austria, and afterwards to Prussia, and in 1815 he was one of the British plenipotentiaries at the congress of Vienna. He had represented Londonderry in the House of Commons from 1801 to 1814, when he was raised to the peerage as Lord Stewart; in 1822 he succeeded his brother as Marquis of Londonderry, and in 1823 was created Earl Vane. He reached the rank of general in 1837, and in 1852 received the order of the Garter vacated by the death of the Duke of Wellington. He wrote a history of the Peninsular war, and edited the correspondence of his brother.

Born in Dublin, 1778; died in London, 1854.

LONG, LOCH, long, a branch of the Firth of Clyde, extending for 24 miles between Dumbartonshire and Argyleshire. It averages a breadth of between 1 and 2 miles, and there is very beautiful scenery on the banks.

LONG ISLAND, an island belonging to the state of New York, United States, and including three counties. It extends from the city of New York, in an easterly direction, to New York Bay, is 114 miles long and 12 miles in average width; level in the south, and hilly in the north. Area, 1,682 square miles. Pop. 542,000. The principal towns are BROOKLYN, FLUSHING, JAMAICA, and LONG ISLAND CITY. There are many places of pleasant summer resort on the coast.

LONG ISLAND CITY, at the west end of Long Island, opposite the upper part of New York, separated from Brooklyn by Newtown Creek. It extends 3 miles from east to west, and 5 miles from north to south. The northern portion is finely situated, and there are fine residences and broad avenues. Manf. Oil, chemicals, machinery, carriages, and carpets. It is the great depôt for petroleum consigned to New York. Pop. 17,000.

LONG ISLAND SOUND divides Long Island from New York and Connecticut. It is 110 miles long, with a breadth ranging between 2 and 20, the narrowest part being near New York, where it is known as East River. The Connecticut, Housatonic, Thames, and Mystic rivers flow into it on the northern shore.

LONG KEYS, the name of three islands in the West Indies, in the Bay of Honduras, and one in the Bahama group, S. of Crooked Passage.

LONGARONE, lon-ga-ro'-ne, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, 56 miles N. of Venice, on the right bank of the Piave. Pop. 2,900.

LONGBEARD, long'-beerd, the name given to William Fitzosborne, a priest in the reign of Richard I., who excited an insurrection in London, in 1195; and, by his eloquence, irritated the people against the government, for which he was torn in pieces by horses, with some of his companions.

Died 1196.

LONGFELLOW, HENRY WADSWORTH, long'-fel-lo, an eminent American poet. While quite a youth at Bowdoin College (where he graduated with high honours, in 1825), he wrote verse for the "United States Literary Gazette;" and, although intended for the law, his tastes were, from the earliest period, decidedly literary. Accordingly, he eagerly embraced the proposal of making him professor of modern languages in his college, and set out for Europe in order to qualify himself for the post. He travelled in France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Holland, and England, and studied the language and literature of each country. He returned to his native country in 1829, and entered upon his duties; commencing his literary career about the same period, by contributing biography and criticism to the "North-American Review." His first important prose work was produced in 1835, with the title "Outre-Mer, or a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea." In the same year, on the resignation of Mr. Ticknor, the professorial chair of modern languages and literature in Harvard University was offered to him; upon which he again visited Germany, and, on this occasion, extended his travels to Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland. In 1836 he entered upon his duties at Harvard University, and soon afterwards gave to the world those works upon which his reputation chiefly rests. His prose romance "Hyperion" was published in 1840; "Kavanagh," a poetico-philosophical tale, in 1849. His principal poems were published in the following order:—"Voices of the Night," 1841; "Ballads," and translated verse, 1842; "Evangeline," 1847; "The Golden Legend," 1851; "The Song of Hiawatha," 1855; "Miles Standish," 1858; "Tales of a Wayside Inn," 1863; translation of Dante, 1867; "Aftermath," 1873; "Pandora," 1875; and "Ultima Thule" in 1880. In 1869 he revisited Europe, and received the degree of D.C.L. from Oxford. His verse is that of a polished and refined man; intensely national, he is yet imbued with a lofty appreciation of the great efforts of European genius. Goethe, Jean-Paul, and other German writers have had an especially marked influence on his writings. His sympathies are too universal to be bounded by mere nationality, and of all American poets he is far the most popular in England; his exquisite clearness, tenderness, and musical cadences having literally made his poems "household words." He possesses a remarkable power of picturesque description, and appears to have been greatly influenced in his taste by the mediæval German poets.

Born 1807; died 1882.

LONGFORD, long'-ford, an inland county of Ireland, province of Leinster, bounded W. by Roscommon, N. by the counties of Leitrim and Cavan, and E. and S. by Westmeath. It is generally fertile, though much interspersed with bogs, morasses, and fens. There is a central range of hills of moderate elevation. Grazing farms are numerous.

Rivers.—The Shannon forms the western boundary of the county. It is, besides, intersected by the Inney, the Camlin and the Fallen, with numerous smaller streams. There are several lakes, of which Lough Gownagh is the largest.

Area.—421 square miles.

Pop.—60,790.

Chief Towns.—LONGFORD, BALLYMAHON, and GRANARD.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

History.—The county was formed in 1564 out of the ancient kingdom of Meath. After the rebellion of 1641 a large portion of the county was distributed as confiscated lands to colonists.

LONGFORD, a town of Ireland, and capital of the above county, on the river Camlin, 75 miles N.W. of Dublin. It has a church, a fine new Roman Catholic cathedral. Pop. 4,300, chiefly Roman Catholics.

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS CASSIUS, lon-ji'nus, a celebrated Platonic philosopher and rhetorician. He was related to Plutarch, and spent the early part of his life in travelling, after which he settled at Athens, where he taught the Platonic philosophy and rhetoric with great reputation; but was called thence by Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, to be tutor to her children. The queen was then at war with the emperor Aurelian, and, being defeated by him near Antioch, was compelled to shut herself up in Palmyra. The emperor summoned her to surrender, and she returned an answer, drawn up by Longinus, which filled him with anger; he laid siege to the city, which was surrendered to him. The queen and Longinus endeavoured to fly to Persia, but were overtaken and made prisoners. The queen, intimidated, laid the blame of vindicating the liberty of her country on its true author, and the brave Longinus was carried away to immediate execution. He composed critical remarks on the ancient Greek authors, but only a part of his inestimable "Treatise on the Sublime" exists; and was a man of extraordinary acquirements.

Born 210; died 273.

LONGJUMEAU, long-joo-mo', a small town of France, department Seine-et-Oise, on the Ivette, 12 miles S. of Paris. It is an ancient place, and the church has a Gothic porch. There is a large court-house, and a fountain. A trade is carried on in corn, flour, wine, leather, and cattle. Pop. 2,300.

LONGLAND. (See LANGELAND, Robert.)

LONGNI, long'-ne, a town of France, department Orne, 33 miles N.E. of Alençon. Manf. Leather, iron, and agricultural implements. Pop. 2,500.

LONGOBUCCO, lon'-go-book'-ko, a town of Italy, in the province of Calabria Citeriore, 11 miles S.W. of Rossano. There are lead mines in the vicinity. Pop. 5,300.

LONGTON, long'-ton, a market town of Staffordshire, 4 miles S.E. of Newcastle-under-Lyne. It is composed of two townships, Longton and Lane-end. There are two parish churches, one a fine stone building; several other places of worship, a townhall, and two large market halls. Manf. China and earthenware. Pop., including the suburbs of Blenton and Normicott, 18,615.

LONGUÉ, lon'-gai, a town of France, department Maine-et-Loire, on the Laton, 9 miles N. of Saumur. Manf. Linen, leather, and oil. Pop. 4,300.

LONGUEVILLE, ANNE GENEVIÈVE DE BOURBON, Duchess de, long'-ai-veel, "the soul of the Fronde," daughter of Henri II., Prince de Condé. Her beauty attracted great attention, and at an early age she was betrothed to the Prince de Joinville, but he dying, she married the Duke de Longueville, a middle-aged widower. In 1647 she took an active part in the insurrection of the Fronde, for which her husband and brother were arrested by Anne of Austria, the regent, in 1650. She escaped to Holland, took the command of the citadel of Stenay, on the Meuse, and succeeded in inducing Turenne to join the Fronde, and accept the assistance of the king of Spain. Her husband was released, but, as he continued loyal to the king, she refused to join him, and endeavoured to excite an insurrection in Bordeaux. After the amnesty of 1653, she lived chiefly in convents, latterly in the Carmelite convent of Paris, in the practice of rigid austerities, which are supposed to have hastened her death.

Born 1619; died 1679.

LONGUS, lon'-gus, a Greek author, of whom we have four books of pastorals in prose, entitled "The Loves of Daphnis and Chloe," much admired for their elegance and simplicity.

Lived about the 4th or 5th century.

LONGWY, lawng'-ve, a strongly fortified town of France, department Moselle, on the Belgian frontier and the right bank of the Cher, 16 miles S.W. of Luxembourg. Manf. Cotton fabrics, lace, leather, and earthenware. There is a considerable trade in hams and lard. Pop. 2,400.—This is called the "iron gate of France," and was, in 1792, taken by the Prussians, again by the allies in 1815, and capitulated to the Prussians in 1871.

LONIGO, lo-ne'-go, a town of Italy, province Vicenza, 12 miles S.E. of the town of that name on the Goa. It is protected by three strong towers of great antiquity. There are several handsome palaces. Pop. 8,000.

LONNEKER, lon-nai'-ker, a village of the Netherlands, province of Overijssel, 14 miles S.E. of Almelo. Manf. Calico. Pop. 10,000.

LONOKE, lo-noke', a new county of Arkansas, United States. The ascertained population is 12,146. The chief place is of the same name.

LONS-LE-SAULNIER, lawngs le(r) sole'-ne-ai, a town of France, department Jura, on the Selle, 55 miles S.E. of Dijon. Salt-works of considerable extent are established here, taking their origin from a salt well, which is always full, and which was discovered in the 4th century. Manf. Bonnets and stockings. It has, besides, both tanneries and dye-works. Pop. 9,400.

LONTAR, or PULO LONTAR, lon-tar', an island in the Indian archipelago, separated by a narrow strait from the west coast of Malacca. It is 21 miles long and 6 broad. The inhabitants are an inoffensive race, known as Orang Laût, or "men of the Sea." Lat. 7° 30' N. Lon. 90° E.

LOOCHOO, or LU-TCHU ISLANDS, loo-tchoo' a group in the North Pacific Ocean, lying to the S. of Japan, and about 400 miles to the east of China. They consist of 92 islands, of which, however, only one, called the Great Loochoo or Okinawu, is of importance. It is about 65 miles long, with an average breadth of 15. The climate and soil seem to be among the happiest on the globe; the fruits and vegetable productions are of the most exquisite nature. Minerals. Iron, coal, and sulphur. The inhabitants are diminutive in their stature; they are, however, strong, well made, and athletic, and appear to be of the Japanese and Chinese races, the former preponderating. The capital of Great Loochoo, and of the archipelago, is Kintching, situate about 5 miles from its port of Napakiang. Pop. 167,000. Lat. 24°—29° N. Lon. 127°—129° E.

LOO CHRISTY, loo kris'-te, a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, 6 miles N.E. of Ghent. Pop. 3,500.

LOODIANA, or LUDHEEANA, lod'-de-a'-na, a town of British India, in the Punjab, district of Ambala, on a stream which joins the Sutlej, about 15 miles below the town. It is an important military station, and there is a railway-bridge over the Sutlej. Manf. Cotton, cloth, and shawls of the Cashmere kind. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 30° 55 N. Lon. 75° 54′ E.

LOOE, EAST and WEST, loo, a market, borough, and seaport town of Cornwall, at the mouth of the river Looe, 14 miles W. of Plymouth. East Looe is on the left bank, and West Looe on the right bank of the river, which is crossed by a fine bridge. Pop. 1,200. There is a small but good harbour; copper and lead are exported, and the pilchard fishery is carried on.

LOONEE, loo-ne', a river of Western India, rising in lat. 26° 37′ N.; lon. 74° 46′ E.; and, after a course of 320 miles, falling into the Runn of Cutch, in lat. 24° 42′ N.; lon. 71° 11′ E.

LOPE DE VEGA. (See VEGA.)

LOPEZ, CARLOS ANTONIO, lo'-pez, president of Paraguay, successor to Francia. During his administration he greatly advanced the material prosperity of the country, but he was involved in diplomatic controversies with England, France, Brazil, and the United States.

Born in Asuncion, 1790; died 1862.

LOPEZ, FRANCISCO SOLANO, president of Paraguay, son of the preceding. At the age of 18 he was appointed commander-in chief of the Paraguayan army, and in 1854 was sent on a diplomatic mission to Europe, and on his return was appointed minister of war. On the death of his father he was elected president for ten years. He soon engaged in war with Brazil, which formed an alliance with the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, the result being a long and sanguinary war. Lopez, suspecting that his ministers were engaged in negotiation with the enemy, arrested the vice-president and several others, and put them to cruel tortures; and more than 500 persons were either executed or died under torture. The American minister, who was accused, escaped, but two of the attachés were tortured, but afterwards surrendered to an American squadron. Lopez sustained repeated defeats, and was killed, while attempting to escape across a river, by a troop of Brazilian cavalry. His eldest son was also killed.

Born near Asuncion, 1827; died 1870.

LOPEZ, NARCISO, Cuban revolutionist, who served for some time in the Spanish army; but in 1849 went to the United States, and organised three unsuccessful expeditions for the purpose of wresting Cuba from the Spanish government. In the last he was captured and executed.

Born in Venezuela, 1799; died at Havana, 1851.

LORA (DEL-RIO), lo'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 28 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Woollens, linens, and chocolate. An important annual fair is held. Pop. 4,600.

LORCA, lor'-ka, an ancient town of Spain, province of Murcia, on the right bank of the Sangonera, 40 miles S.W. of Murcia. It is beautifully situated on a hill, on the summit of which is a fortified castle, and is divided into the Upper and Lower town, of which the former has narrow, crooked, and ill-paved streets; the latter being regularly and neatly built. It contains eight churches and nine monasteries, a bishop's palace, a college, and two hospitals. Manf. Saltpetre, gunpowder, and cotton cloth. There are lead mines in the vicinity. Pop. 52,934.

LORD HOOD'S ISLAND, in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 21° 30′ S. Lon. 135° 33′ W.

LORD HOWE'S ISLANDS, a group in the South Pacific Ocean. Lat. 5° 30′ S. Lon. 159° 31′ E.—The name of another group in the Pacific, off the east coast of Australia, 300 miles E. of Macquarie. Lat. 31° 37′ S. Lon. 159° 14′ E.—Also the name of one of the Society Islands. Lat. 16° 50′ S. Lon. 154° 21′ W.

LORENZO DE' MEDICI. (See MEDICI.)

LORETO, lo-rai'-to, a town of Italy, 4 miles S.E. of Civitâ di Penne. There are eight churches, a Benedictine monastery, and three convents. Manf. Paper; and there are dye-works. Pop. 3,000.

LORETO, or LORETTO, lo-rait'-to, a city of Italy, province of Macereta, 12 miles from Ancona. This town is famous for possessing the Santa Casa, or "holy house," in which it is believed the Saviour resided with the Virgin Mary and Joseph, and which was the scene of the Annunciation, and which was miraculously transported hither in the 13th century. The house, a small brick edifice, is cased in white marble, and stands in the centre of a splendid church, remarkable for three bronze doors, a bronze statue of the Virgin, and for the richness of decoration in mosaic, frescoes, and carving. There are a governor's palace and public fountains deserving of notice; but the sacred shrine is the principal object of attraction. Rosaries and relics for the use of the numerous pilgrims constitute the only trade of the place. Pop. 8,000.

LORGUES, lorg, a town of France, department Var, on the right bank of the Argens, 7 miles S.W. of Draguignan. Manf. Woollen, linen, leather, and tiles. There are marble quarries in the neighbourhood, and six annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,300.

L'ORIENT, lor'-e-a, a fortified and regularly-built seaport of France, department of Morbihan, on the bay of Port Louis, 40 miles W. of Vannes. The harbour is ample, secure, and of easy access, and bordered by fine quays, on which are large and commodious buildings. There are a college, and schools of navigation and marine artillery. The dockyard and arsenal are complete and extensive. Manf. Hats, gold lace, and earthenware; and there is an active trade and pilchard fisheries. Pop. 37,812.—The town was established in 1666, by the French East India Company, whence the name, signifying "the East."

LORIOL, lo'-re-ol, a town of France, department Drôme, 13 miles S.W. of Valence, on the left bank of the Drôme, near its confluence with the Rhône. It is connected by a handsome bridge with Livron, a small town on the opposite side of the river. There are large nursery grounds in the neighbourhood. Manf. Silk; and a trade in skins is carried on. Pop. 3,500.

LOT, lot, the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham, by whom he was brought up. He afterwards settled at Sodom, where he was taken prisoner by the king of Edom, but was rescued by Abraham. It is recorded in the book of Genesis, that when Sodom was about to be destroyed, two angels came to Lot and obliged him to quit the place, with his wife and daughters, the former of whom, for looking back, was converted into a pillar of salt.

LOTBINIERE, lot-bé'-ne-aire', a county of Quebec province, Canada, bounded N.W. by the St. Lawrence river. Pop. 21,000, about four-fifths of French descent. The capital is Lotbiniere.

LOTHAIRE I., lo-thair', emperor of Germany, was eldest son of Louis-le-Débonnaire, and was associated with him in the empire in 817, named king of the Lombards in 820, and crowned emperor 823. In 830 he dethroned his father, and imprisoned him in a monastery, upon which his brothers, Louis and Charles, joined their forces against him, and defeated him at Fontenay, in 841. Two years afterwards a treaty was concluded between the three brothers, by which Lothaire retained the title of emperor, with Italy and some French provinces beyond the Rhine and the Rhône. Louis had a tract of country bordering on the Rhine, and Charles became king of France. In 1875 the remains of the emperor were removed from the sacristy of the church of Prüfhm, where they had been preserved and deposited in a black marble sarcophagus, erected by the Emperor William of Germany. The size of the bones confirmed the tradition of the gigantic size of Lothaire.

Born 796; died 855.

LOTHAIRE II., duke of Saxony, elected emperor 1125. He died in Italy, on his return from an expedition against Roger, king of Sicily.

Born 1075; died 1125.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, was the son of Louis IV., whom he succeeded in 954. He made war against the emperor Otho II.
Born 941; died 986.

LOTHAIRE, king of Lorraine, was son of the emperor Lothaire I.
Born 825; died 869.

LOTHIANS, THE, lo'-the-ans, an extensive and fertile district of Scotland, divided into three shires; viz., East-Lothian, or Haddingtonshire; Mid-Lothian, or Edinburghshire; and West-Lothian, or Linlithgowshire.

LOUHANS, loo'-han, a town of France, department Saône-et-Loire, 30 miles N.W. of Macon. There are a remarkable church and a college. It is a commercial depôt for goods passing between Switzerland and Lyons. Pop. 3,800.

LOUIS, ST., loo'-is, a river of North America, in Wisconsin. After a course of 120 miles, it falls into Lake Superior, at its western extremity.

LOUIS, ST., capital of Missouri, United States, on the right bank of the Mississippi, 18 miles below the junction of the Missouri. It has a Roman Catholic cathedral, 76 churches, convent, orphan-asylum, episcopal college, a city hall, theatre, concert-hall, museum, arsenal, the St. Louis and the Washington Universities, a medical college, and numerous academies and schools. Manf. Leather, machinery, cordage, beer, brandy; and it has numerous corn, saw, and oil mills. The town is the principal depôt of the American fur company; and buffalo tongues and pork are important articles of trade. An immense river traffic is carried on. Pop. 350,518. This place was founded by the French, in 1764.

LOUIS, ST., loo'-ee, an island, town, and port, the capital of the French possessions in Senegambia, at the mouth of the river Senegal, W. Africa. The town has a population of about 13,000. Lat. 16° 2′ N. Lon. 16° 30′ W.

LOUIS, ST. (See MARANHAM.)

LOUIS, loo'-e, the name of several kings of France, and other sovereign princes mentioned below.

FRANCE.

LOUIS I., surnamed le Débonnaire, emperor of the West, and king of France, succeeded his father Charlemagne in 814. In 817 he associated his eldest son, Lothaire, with himself in the empire, and gave to his other two sons, Pepin and Louis, the kingdoms of Aquitaine and Bavaria. This division gave such offence to Bernard, king of Italy, the illegitimate son of Pepin, eldest son of Charlemagne, that he raised an army against the emperor, who put himself at the head of his troops, and marched into Italy. On his approach, the soldiers of Bernard fled, and the king was taken prisoner by Louis, who deprived him of his eyes, Bernard dying during the operation. In 829 Louis created his younger son, Charles, whom he had by Judith of Bavaria, king of Germany; on which his other sons rose against him, and, depriving him of his crown, shut him up in a monastery, where he died.
Born 778; died 840.

LOUIS II., the Stammerer, so called from a defect in his speech, was the son of Charles the Bald, crowned king of Aquitaine in 867, and succeeded his father as king of France in 877. He was obliged to deliver up Provence to Boson, by whom it was erected into a kingdom. His children were Louis and Carloman, who divided the kingdom between them, and a posthumous son, who was afterwards Charles the Simple.
Born 846; died at Compiègne, 879.

LOUIS III., the son of the preceding, enjoyed the kingdom with his brother, Carloman. He defeated Hugh the Bastard, son of Lothaire, marched against Boson, king of Provence, and opposed the progress of the Normans. He died without issue.
Born 864; died 882.

LOUIS IV., D'Outremer, was son of Charles the Simple, and was brought up in England until 14 years of age, whence the surname. He ascended the throne in 936. He invaded Normandy, but was defeated and taken prisoner in 945. He regained his liberty the following year, after being obliged to concede Normandy to Richard, son of Duke William, and Laon to Hugh, father of Hugh Capet.

He afterwards recovered the latter territory, and died of a fall from his horse.

Born 921; died 954.

LOUIS V., surnamed the Fainéant, or Do-nothing, succeeded his father Lotharius in 986, and soon after took the city of Rheims. He was preparing to march to the assistance of the count of Barcelona, who was pressed by the Saracens, but he is said to have been poisoned by his queen. After his death, the crown devolved by right to his uncle Charles, duke of Lower Lorraine; but that prince being disliked by the French, it was conferred on Hugh Capet.

Born 966; died 987.

LOUIS VI., called Le Gros, the son of Philip I., succeeded to the throne in 1108. His reign was disturbed by wars with the Normans, and also by feuds among his vassals. He also quarrelled with Henry I. of England, and thus was commenced the wars between the English and French, which lasted three centuries.

Born 1078; died 1137.

LOUIS VII., Le Jeune, was the son and successor of the preceding. He had a dispute with Pope Innocent II. on the right of presenting to benefices, and was excommunicated by that pontiff, who also laid his kingdom under interdict. Thibault, count of Champagne, being devoted to the pope, Louis declared war against him, and ravaged his country. A reconciliation afterwards took place between them, and Louis, by the persuasions of St. Bernard, engaged in a crusade, but was defeated by Saladin, and, on his return to Europe, was taken at sea by the Greeks, and delivered by the general of Roger, king of Sicily. Having divorced his queen, Eleanor, she married Henry of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England, to whom she brought, as her dower, the provinces of Poitou and Guienne. This produced a new war between England and France, which lasted, with a little intermission, twenty-one years, until the peace of Montmirail. In 1179 he made a pilgrimage to the tomb of Thomas à Becket (whose cause he had supported against Henry) at Canterbury.

Born 1119; died 1180.

LOUIS VIII., surnamed Cœur-de-Lion, was the son of Philip II. He signalised himself in several expeditions during the lifetime of his father, especially the invasion of England to assist the barons against John, in 1216, and ascended the throne in 1223. He took Avignon and several places from the English; but died of a pestilential disease in his camp at Montpensier, in Auvergne, while engaged in an expedition against Raymond of Toulouse.

Born 1187; died 1226.

LOUIS IX., called Saint Louis, the son of the preceding, by Blanche of Castile, ascended the throne in 1226. He maintained a successful war against Henry III., king of England, which ended in a peace favourable to Louis, who, having been seized with a dangerous illness, made a vow that, if he recovered, he would take the cross for the purpose of regaining the Holy Land from the infidels. Being restored to health, he spent four years in preparing for this expedition, and, in 1248, embarked for the East with 40,000 men, leaving his kingdom to the care of his mother. After taking Damietta, he passed the Nile, and obtained two great victories over the Saracens. At length famine and disease attacked his army, and the king, with his nobles, fell into the hands of the infidels. Louis, to recover his liberty, consented to pay a ransom of 100,000 marks of silver, to deliver up Damietta, and to conclude a truce for ten years. He was released with the small remains of his army, in 1250. After spending two years in Palestine, he returned to France. In 1270 he undertook another expedition against the infidels, but died of pestilence in his camp before Tunis, in Africa, the same year. He was canonised in 1297.

Born at Poissy, 1215; died 1270.

LOUIS X., surnamed Hutin, an old French term for "quarrelsome," succeeded Philip the Fair, his father, in 1314, being already king of Navarre, in right of his mother. He recalled the Jews to his kingdom, and made a successful war against the count of Flanders.

Born at Paris, 1289; died at Vincennes, 1316.

LOUIS XI., son of Charles VII. He distinguished himself in his youth in several military expeditions, particularly against the English, whom he compelled to raise the siege of Dieppe, in 1443. He joined the duke of Bourbon and Alençon against his father; but, being unsuccessful, took refuge in Burgundy, where the duke protected him. His father having starved himself to death from fear of being poisoned, he succeeded to the throne in 1461. On ascending the throne he treated France as a conquered country, for which several of the nobility formed a league against him, and some of his own family joined the malcontents. After a severe but indecisive battle at Montlhéri, in 1465, a peace was concluded, by which Louis gave to the leaguers all their demands; but not fulfilling his engagements, the war was rekindled, and he was made prisoner by the duke of Burgundy, who compelled him, in 1648, to make a peace still more disadvantageous than the former. In 1474, the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany formed a league with Edward IV., king of England, against Louis, who, by negotiation, contrived to disengage the English monarch from the alliance, by a treaty at Amiens, in 1475. The duke of Burgundy was, in consequence, obliged to conclude a peace for nine years. Louis was a singular compound of firmness, unscrupulousness, and abject superstition. His most prominent trait was, however, duplicity of disposition; his constant maxim being "He who cannot dissemble knows not how to reign." It is estimated that during his reign he put 4,000 peasants to death, many of them by a summary process nearly resembling assassination. But, by protecting the middle classes and favouring industry, he was a benefactor of his country. A striking portraiture of Louis is given by Sir Walter Scott in "Quentin Durward."

Born at Bourges, 1423; died 1483.

LOUIS XII., surnamed the Father of his People, was the son of Charles, duke of Orleans. He succeeded Charles VIII. (against whom he had conspired) in 1498, and took Milan, Genoa, and Naples; but, after ravaging Italy (for which he was excommunicated by pope Julius II.), the French were expelled in 1513. Henry VIII. of England, the Venetians, and the Swiss attacked Louis in his own dominions, and he was obliged to sue for peace, and he married the princess Mary, sister of Henry VIII.

Born 1462; died 1515.

LOUIS XIII. was the son of Henry IV. Being only nine years old at the death of his father, the kingdom was placed under the regency of his mother, Mary de Medici. A proposed marriage of the young king with Anne of Austria, daughter of Philip III. of Spain, led to a war with the Huguenots, but peace was concluded in 1614, and the edict of Nantes confirmed. He married Anne in the following year. The Marshal d'Ancre had an uncontrolled sway at court till 1617, when he was assassinated with the king's consent, and his wife was condemned to death as a sorceress. Vitri, the perpetrator of this act, was made a marshal of France, and the bishop of Luçon, afterwards Cardinal Richelieu, became prime minister in 1624. Rochelle, the stronghold of the French Protestants, was taken, after a long siege, in 1628. Gaston of Orleans, only brother of the king, revolted, out of dislike to Richelieu, and was assisted by the duke de Montmorency, who, being wounded and taken prisoner in 1632, was beheaded at Toulouse. Gaston took refuge with the duke of Lorraine, who, for protecting him, lost his whole dominions. This was followed by a war with Spain, which lasted twenty-five years, and was attended with various success; but greatly impoverished the nation, and discontented the people. In 1638, after a married life of twenty-three years, a son was born.

Born at Fontainebleau, 1601; died 1643.

LOUIS XIV. (Dieu-donné, "gift of God," or the Great), son of the preceding, being only five years old on the death of his father, the regency was intrusted to the hands of the queen-mother, Anne of Austria, under whom Mazarin acted as prime minister. The nation was then involved in a war with Spain and the emperor of Germany, which was maintained with glory to the French arms by the prince of Condé and the famous Turenne. France pushed her conquests into Flanders, Artois, Lorraine, and Catalonia. The Swedes, who were in alliance with Louis, gained a great victory over the imperialists in Bohemia; Turenne took Treves and re-established the elector; Condé gained the battle of Nordlingen, took Furnes and Dunkirk, and defeated the archduke on the plains of Sens, in 1648, after reducing Ypres. The Spanish fleet was defeated on the coast of Italy by the French. This year a separate peace was made between Louis, Ferdinand III., Christina, queen of Sweden, and the states of the empire. By this treaty, Metz, Toul, Verdun, and Alsace were attached to France; but while Louis was successful abroad, his kingdom was distracted by internal divisions: the Parisians, irritated against Mazarin and the queen-mother, and headed by the duke de Beaufort and the prince of Condé, took up arms. During this revolt, known as the civil war of La Fronde, the king, his mother, and the cardinal were obliged to fly. The Spaniards, profiting by these troubles, made several conquests in Champagne, Lorraine, and Italy. In 1651, the king assumed the government, and released Condé, who had been imprisoned by the cardinal. Mazarin returning to power the year following, the civil war was renewed. Condé headed the malcontents, and defeated the marshal d'Hocquincourt at Blenau, but soon afterwards he was attacked by the royal army and made prisoner. In the meanwhile, the archduke Leopold took from the French Gravelines and Dunkirk, and Don John of Austria made himself master of Barcelona; but domestic tranquillity being restored, these losses were repaired. Turenne gained several battles, and took a number of places, which produced a peace between France and Spain in 1659. The principal article in this treaty was the marriage of the king with the infanta Maria Theresa. The minister of finance, Fouquet, being condemned to banishment for peculation, was succeeded by Colbert, one of the ablest ministers and financiers that ever lived: arts and commerce were cherished and flourished; foreign colonies were established; and at home was founded the Academy of Sciences and another of painting and sculpture. On the war breaking out between England and Holland, Louis joined with the latter; but after a few naval actions, peace was concluded in 1668. On the death of Philip IV., father of the queen, Louis laid claim to the vacant throne, and in 1667 marched into the Low Countries, where he took a number of towns, particularly Lisle. His progress gave such alarm, that a treaty was entered into between England, Holland, and Sweden, to check his ambition; but, just as the treaty was completed, peace was restored between Louis and Spain. In 1672 the French king made an attack on Holland, and reduced some of the provinces in a few weeks. This invasion produced a new confederacy against Louis, between the emperor of Germany, Spain, and the elector of Brandenburg, in which all the allies were unsuccessful, and which terminated, in 1678, by the treaty of Nimeguen. Amidst all his glory, Louis committed an act of impolitic cruelty by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, granted by Henry IV. in favour of the Protestants. This measure drove from France a vast number of ingenious mechanics and others, who settled in England and Holland. About this time another league was formed against France by the prince of Orange, the duke of Savoy, and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg. To this league were afterwards added the emperor of Germany and the king of Spain. The dauphin had the command of the French army, and opened the campaign by taking Philipsburg, in October, 1688; but he was soon forced to retreat before a superior force. In 1690 the French were more successful; but were defeated in the naval action off La Hogue, by Admiral Russell, in 1692. Louis, in person, took Namur, and Luxembourg gained the battles of Steenkirk and Neerwinde. In 1696, Savoy made a separate peace with France, which was followed by a general one at Ryswick, in 1697. The tranquillity of Europe, however, was again broken by the death of Charles II., king of Spain, in 1700. He left his crown to Philip of France, duke of Anjou, who assumed the title of Philip V. In opposition to him, the archduke Charles laid claim to the throne, and was supported by the emperor of Germany, by Holland, and England. Prince Eugene had the command of the imperial forces, with which he took Cremona. In 1704, Eugene and Marlborough gained the great battle of Blenheim; the year following, Nice and Ville-Franche were taken by the French, who also gained a dearly-bought victory at Cassane, over Eugene; on the other hand, Barcelona surrendered to the archduke, and Gironne declared in his favour; the battle of Ramilies was gained by the duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene saved Turin by defeating the duke of Orleans. In 1708, Lisle was retaken by the allies, who also gained the battle of Oudenarde, and the imperialists made themselves masters of Naples. The year following, the French lost Tournay, and suffered a defeat at Malplaquet. In 1713, a treaty of peace was signed at Utrecht by France, Spain, England, Savoy, Portugal, Prussia, and Holland; and the next year peace was concluded with the emperor at Radstadt. Louis, by his first wife, had issue one son, Louis, dauphin of France, who died in 1711, leaving three sons, Louis, Philip, and Gaston. Louis XIV. had several illegitimate children by his mistresses. He was an intense egotist, but had the art of influencing much greater men than himself, who served him with unflinching fidelity, although he claimed the merit of their greatest exploits. No monarch was ever more flattered, and his vanity led him to appropriate with complacency the adulation poured upon him as only his due. He thought of none but himself. "L'état c'est moi"—I am the state, was the ruling principle of his life. His reign of 72 years was a brilliant epoch. It gave birth to Condé, Turenne, and Vauban; to Colbert and Louvois; to Corneille, Racine, Molière, La Fontaine, Boileau, Bossuet, Fénelon, Lebrun, and Perrault. Charles II. and James II. of England stooped to receive money allowances from him; and he bribed English and other statesmen in the most unscrupulous manner. He assisted James II. against the English people, and gave him a refuge at St. Germains when driven from the country. The most celebrated of Louis' many mistresses were Mesdames de la Vallière, de Montespan, Fontanges, and de Maintenon; with the latter of whom he, at the close of his life, when he professed to be serious and devout, engaged in a secret marriage. The best works to consult relative to this remarkable reign are, Voltaire's "Lé Siècle de Louis XIV.;" some pieces of the king, published in 1806, under the title of "Works of Louis XIV.;" the "Memoirs of De Retz," and those of Saint-Simon.

Born at St. Germain-en-Laye, 1638; died 1715.

LOUIS XV. (Le Bien-aimé, well-beloved), was the great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded him in 1715, at the age of five years, under the regency of Philip, duke of Orleans. In 1723 he was declared of age. The beginning of his reign was troubled by the Mississippi scheme of the famous Law, which ruined thousands of people. (See LAW.) On the death of the duke of Orleans, in 1723, he was succeeded, as prime minister, by the duke of Bourbon, who was displaced in 1725, and Cardinal Fleury entered upon that station. The same year the king married Maria Leszynski, the daughter of Stanislaus, the dethroned king of Poland. Louis supported his father-in-law against the elector of Saxony, which occasioned a war, known as the War of the Polish Succession, between France, Austria, and Russia. Stanislaus, however, was forced to abandon the throne; but the French were successful in Italy, on which a peace was concluded in 1738. On the death of the emperor Charles VI., in 1740, the succession of the house of Austria was disputed by four persons, and Louis declared himself against Maria Theresa, daughter of the late emperor, contrary to his own engagements. He supported the pretensions of the elector of Bavaria, who called himself Charles VII. That prince took Prague, where he was crowned king of Bohemia; but, in 1742, the city was retaken, and the allies, with the king of Great Britain at their head, gained the battle of Dettingen. In 1744, Louis took the field in person, and captured Courtray, Menin, and Ypres; he was also present at the battles of Fontenoy and Lawfeld. These advantages were accompanied by the taking of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other places. On the other hand, the troops of the duke of Saxony and of the queen of Hungary ravaged Provence, and the English completely ruined the French commerce at sea; which effected the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1755 a new war broke out between France and England, in which the latter power had Prussia for an ally, while Austria leagued with France. At first the French were very successful, by taking Port Mahon, defeating the duke of Cumberland at Hastenbeck, and forcing the English general and his army to capitulate at Closter-seven. The electorate of Hanover was conquered; but, in 1757, the French and Austrians were defeated at Rosbach: this was followed by other losses, both by land and sea, particularly of Canada. Nor was the face of affairs altered for the better by the famous family compact in 1761, by which all the families of the house of Bourbon allied as in a common cause. A treaty of peace was signed at Paris in 1763. Louis was a debauched monarch, and to his acts was chiefly due the storm that broke over the head of his unfortunate successor. His successive mistresses, the Duchesse de Châteauroux, the Marquise de Pompadour, and Madame du Barry, who survived him, and on whom he lavished immense sums, although the finances of the country were in a crippled condition, ruled him. De Pompadour assisting him in the most infamous licentiousness (especially in the establishment of the notorious Parc aux Cerfs, or harem of very young girls), for the purpose of securing her influence. She was easily bribed by the emperor of Russia; and at her instigation the Jesuits, with whom she had a personal quarrel, were expelled from France. His death was the result of abominable debauchery, and was made the occasion of popular festivals of rejoicing.

Born at Fontainebleau, 1710; died 1774.

LOUIS XVI., AUGUSTE, grandson of the above, the son of Louis the Dauphin and of Maria Josephine, daughter of Frederick Augustus, king of Poland. His first title was the Duc de Berri. On the death of his father, in 1765, he became the heir to the throne, and, in 1770, he married Marie Antoinette, archduchess of Austria. In 1774 he succeeded to the crown of France. At that period the finances were in an exhausted state, commerce was nearly ruined, the marine dismantled, and the national debt enormous. To repair the condition of public affairs, Vergennes was made secretary of state, and Turgot had the direction of the finances; Malesherbes was appointed a member of the council, Sartine had the management of the marine department, and Maurepas was placed at the head of the administration. The first act of Louis was very popular; he dispensed with the customary tax paid by the people at the beginning of every new reign. In 1774 the parliament was recalled, and affairs began to assume a favourable aspect, when, unfortunately, the French government, always jealous of England, took part with the revolted Americans, and a ruinous war ensued between the two countries, which, though it terminated in the loss of the colonies to the English, brought about a bloody revolution in France. The finances of the latter country were completely exhausted, and the Cardinal de Brienne, who succeeded Calonne as minister, framed imposts which laid such intolerable burdens upon the people, that the parliament refused to register them. For this the members were exiled to Troyes, and in 1788 a new court, named the Cour Plénière, was formed to supersede parliament. This excited popular indignation, greatly increased by the cessation of cash payments by the treasury, except to the army. The king was compelled to convene the States-General of three orders,—clergy, nobility, and commons. This assembly met in May, 1789. The public mind became violently agitated; the people of Paris arose, and, the 14th of July of that year, stormed the Bastille. In October the armed mob, with a prodigious number of women, marched to Versailles, which palace they forced, murdered the guards, and searched in vain for the queen, who would have shared the same fate, had she not escaped from her bed. The result of this insurrection was, the leading of the king and his family in triumph to Paris, amidst all the insults of a lawless rabble. In February, 1790, Louis was forced to accept the new constitution; but, notwithstanding all his concessions, finding himself a mere prisoner at Paris, and exposed daily to new injuries, he resolved to escape. Accordingly, in the night of June 21, 1791, he and his family quitted the Tuileries; but, at Varennes, his person was recognised, and he was conducted back to Paris, where he became a prisoner in his own palace, and suffered the vilest indignities. War was declared against France by the emperor and the king of Prussia, and the duke of Brunswick marched into the country, but was forced to retreat. In the meantime, the people were wrought up to a pitch of savage ferocity by factious leaders, and assaulted the Tuileries. The king and family sought refuge in the National Assembly, who ordered them to be sent to the Temple. The Legislative Assembly gave way to the National Convention, which brought Louis to a mock trial. His defence was conducted by Malesherbes, Tronchin, and Deseze; and his own deportment was, as it had uniformly been during his confinement, firm and modest, dignified and resigned. In January, 1793, he was adjudged to death for conspiring against the public good, and, on the 21st of the same month, ascended the scaffold on the Place Louis XV., and would have addressed the people, but was prevented by the noise of drums purposely placed there. Louis XVI. had all the virtues that adorn private life; but he was deficient in firmness and, perhaps, even singleness of purpose. He possessed many accomplishments, and was fond of mechanics; as a locksmith, he was particularly skilful.

Born 1754; died 1793.

LOUIS XVII., CHARLES, second son of the preceding, was at first styled Duc de Normandie, and after the death of his elder brother, Louis-Joseph, in 1789, became dauphin of France. Imprisoned in the Temple with his relatives, he was, after his father's death, styled monarch by the royalists and foreign powers. A cobbler, named Simon, was appointed his gaoler, with the derisive title of tutor. He died, it is suspected, of poison, but it is more probable that his life was brought to a premature close by the harsh treatment to which he had been subjected in prison. Many impostors have sought to pass for the veritable Louis XVII., but have succeeded in obtaining but a small number of dupes.

Born 1785; died 1795.

LOUIS XVIII., STANISLAS XAVIER, brother of Louis XVI. He married, in 1771, Maria, daughter of Victor Amadeus III., of Sardinia. As count de Provence, he had, during the first period of the Revolution, shown a liberal disposition, and voted both in the Assembly of Notables and in the States-General against the government of his brother. Observing, however, the violent tendencies of the Jacobins, he resolved to quit France, and took his departure on the same night as did Louis XVI., in June, 1791. More fortunate than his brother, he succeeded in effecting his escape out of France, and reached Brussels. In 1792, he placed himself at the head of 6,000 men, and joined the Prussian army that was marching on France; but the defeat of Valmy destroyed all his hopes. On the death of Louis XVII., in 1795, the count of Provence assumed the title of king, as Louis XVIII., and was recognised by the foreign powers. After residing at various places on the continent of Europe, he went to England, in 1807, and lived at Hartwell, in Buckinghamshire, until the events of 1814. On the fall of Napoleon I., in May of that year, Louis was placed on the throne of France by the allies. His first act was to declare himself a constitutional and not an absolute monarch. In June, 1814, he laid before the legislature a charter, which afterwards became the base of the law of the kingdom. The sudden return of Napoleon from Elba, in March, caused Louis to be abandoned by the army and a considerable portion of the nation. At this juncture he fled, and took refuge at Ghent; but after the battle of Waterloo, in June, 1815, he was once more placed upon the throne, which he retained till his death. Louis XVIII. was, for a Bourbon, a sufficiently enlightened and liberal prince: he was a witty and cultivated man. He left no children, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles X.

Born at Versailles, 1755; died 1824.

LOUIS NAPOLEON. (See NAPOLEON III.)

LOUIS-PHILIPPE, king of the French, was eldest son of Louis-Philippe-Joseph, Duc d'Orléans, styled Philippe-Egalité. (See ORLEANS.) Louis-Philippe bore the title of Duc de Chartres until the death of his father, in 1793, after which he was usually styled Duc d'Orléans. His early education was conducted by Madame de Genlis. Between the years 1785 and 1792, he served in the French revolutionary army, and signalised himself at Valmy and Jemappes. Being cited, together with his faithful friend General Dumourier, to appear before the Committee of Public Safety, and well knowing the sanguinary nature of that tribunal, which had, seven months before, sent his father to the guillotine, he fled across the Belgian frontier, and took refuge in the Netherlands, then under the sway of Austria. He was cordially received by the latter power, and a commission was offered to him, but he refused to fight against his native country. After travelling through Germany in disguise, he went to Switzerland, and at Zurich met his sister Adelaide, known as Mademoiselle d'Orléans, whom he shortly afterwards placed with Madame de Genlis, in a convent near Baumgarten. His funds being now exhausted, he sought and obtained the post of professor in the College of Reichenau, where, under the assumed name of Chabaud, he taught mathematics and geography during eight months. Thence he went to Baumgarten; but, being discovered by the French authorities, he set out for Hamburg, in the hope of obtaining a vessel for America. Disappointed in this expectation, he travelled on foot through Norway, Sweden, and Finland, as far as the North Cape. The Directory having offered to release his two brothers, the Duc de Montpensier and the Count de Beaujolais, if Louis would consent to emigrate to America, he went on board a vessel, and sailed for the United States in 1796. After an adventurous life in the New World, the three Orleans princes returned to Europe in 1800, and took up their residence in England. The Duc de Montpensier died at Twickenham in 1807, and his brother, the Count de Beaujolais, in the following year, at Malta, whither he had been accompanied by the Duc d'Orléans. In the same year Louis went to reside with his mother and sister at Palermo, at which place the king of Naples and Sicily was dwelling, under British protection, Murat occupying the throne at Naples. In 1809 he married the king's daughter, the Princess Amélie. With the exception of a visit to Spain in 1810, he continued to live at Palermo till 1814, when, on hearing the news of Napoleon's fall, he immediately set out for Paris. On Napoleon's return from Elba, Louis Philippe sent his family to England, and himself took the command of the Army of the North, in obedience to the command of Louis XVIII. He again went to Twickenham, and remained there during the Hundred Days, but was recalled to Paris to take his seat in the Chamber of Peers. Being regarded with peculiar jealousy by Louis XVIII., he quitted Paris, and did not return to France until 1827, when he went to reside at Neuilly, where he lived in seclusion till he was summoned to the throne as king of the French, in 1830. His life was four times attempted. During seventeen years he enjoyed his elective throne, France, in the meanwhile, growing wealthy and tranquil. He maintained peace with Europe, and added the colony of Algeria to France. But although he had obtained and earned the title of the "Napoleon of Peace," his rule was characterised by a policy of selfishness, the marriage of his son the Duc de Montpensier to the sister of the Queen of Spain, being a notable instance; while at home, his restless subjects, harassed by illiberal restrictions, burst out into a revolution in 1848. He fled from Paris in disguise, and reached Newhaven in March, 1848. The queen of England assigned Claremont as his residence, and there he continued to dwell till his death. He was buried in the Roman Catholic chapel at Weybridge, Surrey, and in June, 1876, his remains, with those of his queen and other members of the Orleans family, were exhumed and taken to France, there deposited in the family mausoleum at Dreux.

Born at Paris, 1773; died 1850.

LOUIS, dauphin of France, son of Louis XIV. The famous Bossuet was appointed his tutor, and the famous series of Delphine classics were edited for his use, but he showed little inclination for study. At the age of 18 he married Maria Christina of Bavaria; and afterwards distinguished himself in military service. He died of small-pox.

Born 1661; died 1711.

LOUIS, dauphin of France, was son of Louis XV. He was father of Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X.

Born 1729; died 1765.

EMPERORS.

LOUIS I. (See LOUIS I., of France.)

LOUIS II., surnamed the Young, was only son of Lothaire I., and was created king of Italy in 844, and ascended the imperial throne in 855.

Born 822; died 875.

LOUIS III., called the Blind, was the son of Boson, king of Provence, and Ermengarde, daughter of the emperor Louis the Young. He succeeded his father at the age of 10, and in 900 contested the imperial throne with Berenger, who, having surprised him at Verona, deprived him of his eyes.

Born 880; died 929.

LOUIS IV., the son of the emperor Arnulph, whom he succeeded in 900. The empire was a scene of desolation during his reign, being constantly ravaged by the Hungarians. He was the last prince in Germany of the Carlovingian race.

Born 893; died 911.

LOUIS V., commonly called Louis of Bavaria, was the son of Louis the Severe, duke of Bavaria. He was elected emperor in 1314, and at the same time Frederick le Bel was chosen at Cologne by another party of electors, which occasioned a war between them. Frederick was taken prisoner, but gained his liberty by renouncing his claim in favour of his rival. Pope John XXII. being opposed to that arrangement, in 1322 issued his bull of deposition against Louis, who, in return, appealed to a general council, and marched into Italy, where he procured the election of Peter de Corbiere (Nicholas V.), and by whom he was crowned at Rome. Five electors, on the other hand, chose Charles of Luxemburg to be emperor; on which the civil war was about to be renewed, when Louis was killed by a fall from his horse.

Born 1287; died 1347.

GERMAN KINGS.

LOUIS I. (or LUDWIG), Le Germanique, son of Louis I. of France. He was made governor of Bavaria when only nine years of age. He rebelled against his father in 838, acquired part of Germany in 843, convoked the council of Mentz, to protect ecclesiastics, in 847. In 865, he divided his states among his sons, and five years afterwards obtained part of Lorraine.

Born 806; died at Frankfurt, 876.

LOUIS II. (See EMPERORS.)

LOUIS III., son of the preceding. On the division of the states by his father, he received Franconia. He was continually at war with his relatives, and suffered from Norman invasions.

Died 882.

KINGS OF NAPLES.

LOUIS OF TARENTO, married his cousin Joanna, queen of Naples, after the murder of her first husband, 1346 (see JOANNA), was crowned king 1352, but experienced great opposition from the nobles.

Born 1320; died 1362.

LOUIS I., the son of John, king of France, was adopted by queen Joanna as her successor in 1380, and crowned two years afterwards. He invaded Naples, but was successfully opposed by Charles Durazzo.

Born 1339; died 1384.

LOUIS II., son of the preceding, was crowned in 1389, and held possession of Naples for ten years, till expelled by Ladislas, whom he defeated at Rocca in 1411, but, being unsuccessful, retired into France.

Born 1377; died 1417.

LOUIS III., son of the above, was adopted by Joanna II. in 1423, but vainly endeavoured to obtain possession of the kingdom.

Born 1403; died 1434.

LOUIS I. and II. of Bavaria. (See LUDWIG.)

LOUIS I., king of Spain, son of Philip V., succeeded to the throne 1724. Two years previously, when only 15 years of age, he had married Elizabeth, duchess de Montpensier, a dissolute woman, whom he afterwards imprisoned. He reigned only for a few months.

Born 1707; died 1724.

LOUIS, LOUIS DOMINIQUE, Baron, French statesman and financier. He was employed by Napoleon I., and was for two years finance minister after the revolution of 1830.

Born 1755; died 1837.

LOUISA, loo-é'-sa, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 542 square miles. Pop. 14,000. The capital is Wapello.

LOUISA, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 18,942, two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Louisa Court-house.

LOUISE AUGUSTA, loo-eese', queen of Prussia, daughter of the duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, married Frederick William, crown prince of Prussia, in 1793, and became queen in 1797. She was a woman of great beauty and amiable character, and is still spoken of as the beloved queen. She was energetically opposed to Napoleon, who when he entered Prussia as conqueror, treated her with marked rudeness.

Born 1776; died 1810.

LOUISE OF SAVOY, daughter of duke Philip. At the age of 14 she married Charles of Orleans, count d'Angoulême, and became mother of Frances I. of France, during whose Italian campaign in 1515 she was regent. She caused the disgrace and flight of the constable de Bourbon in 1523, and negotiated the peace of Cambrai in 1529.

Born 1476; died 1531.

LOUISE CAROLINA ALBERTA, Princess, third daughter of Queen Victoria. She married the Marquis of Lorne, eldest son of the Duke of Argyle, in 1871.

Born 1848.

LOUISBURG, loo'-is-berg, a seaport of British America, Cape Breton, on the S.E. side of the island. It was once a fine town, regularly laid out with broad streets, but is now in a ruinous condition. The principal, if not the only, trade, is the cod fishery. Pop. Only a few fishermen.—Louisburg was taken from the French by the English in 1745, but restored in 1748, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. It was again taken by the English in 1758, and its fortifications demolished.

LOUISIADE, loo-is'-i-ad, an archipelago in the South Pacific Ocean, lying to the S.E. of New Guinea, and extending about 400 miles in length, by about 160 in breadth, where broadest. The chief islands are Rossel, South-east Island, Piron, Joannet, Pig, and St. Aignan, and there are nearly eighty others. They are very mountainous, an elevation of over 3,000 feet being attained in some parts. The inhabitants are of the Papuan race. Lat. 10° 40'—11° 40' N. Lon. 151°—154° 30' E.

LOUISIANA, loo'-e-se-a-na, one of the United States, bounded S. by the Gulf of Mexico, and W. by Texas. The south-eastern part is mostly included in the delta of the Mississippi, and the south-western part is generally level prairie, and much of its area very productive. The north-western part is a thick forest, with low alluvial soil upon the rivers (protected from inundations by banks or levées), which is of great fertility; but at a distance from the streams, the land is high, broken, and sterile.

Rivers.—The Mississippi, which has a course of 800 miles in the state, with its numerous branches. The lakes mostly consist of expansions or overflowings of the rivers; and Pontchartrain is the largest.

Zoology.—Panthers, deer, immense numbers of birds; and the rivers swarm with alligators.

Pro.—Corn, cotton, sugar, indigo, rice, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, plums, cherries, figs, peaches, grape vines, and most kinds of garden vegetables. Oranges, and the fruits of southern climates generally, flourish. On the prairies, cattle and mules are extensively reared.

Area.—41,346 square miles.

Pop.—939,946. As a state in the extreme south of the Union, the proportion of negro descent is large, and seems likely to remain so for a considerable period.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The state is divided into 53 counties (or parishes, as they are styled in this state.) The principal towns are NEW ORLEANS and BATON ROUGE.

History.—This country was, in 1682, named by the French, after Louis XIV., and was purchased by the United States in 1803. In 1812 it was admitted into the Union. A large portion of the population are of both Spanish and French descent.

LOUISVILLE, chief city of Kentucky, United States, is pleasantly situate on an elevated and beautiful plain, on the southern bank of the Ohio, immediately above the rapids, 130 miles below Cincinnati. It is well built, and the principal street is 3 miles long. It has 30 churches, a court-house, city-hall, custom-house, and 10 orphan asylums. Manf. Woollens, leather, and tobacco, and there are flour-mills, iron-foundries, and large pork-packing establishments. Pop. 123,758, of whom 15,000 are coloured, and 26,000 foreigners, especially Germans.—The city was named in honour of Louis XVI., who assisted the Americans in the War of Independence.

LOULÉ, loo'-lai, a thriving town of Portugal, in Algarva, on a river of the same name, 9 miles N.W. of Algarve. Pop. 12,500.

LOURCHES, loorsh, a town of France, department Nord, 7 miles from Valenciennes. Pop. 3,600.

LOURDES, loord, a town of France, department Hautes-Pyrénées, 11 miles S.W. of Tarves, situated at the convergence of four valleys. The town is dirty and crowded. There is a picturesque fort on a rock. Recently the town has become a great place for pilgrimages, it being alleged that the Virgin Mary has appeared there. Manf. Linen, handkerchiefs, crape, and hosiery. Pop. 4,700.

LOURICEL, loo'-re-kal, a town of Portugal, province of Estremadura, 26 miles S.W. of Coimbra. There are five churches and four convents. Pop. 5,000.

LOURINHA, loo'-rin-ka, a town of Portugal, province of Estremadura, near the sea coast, 12 miles N.W. of Torres Vedras. An annual fair is held. Pop. 3,000.

LOUTH, louth, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, bounded on the S. and S.W. by Meath, on the W. by Monaghan and Cavan, N. by Armagh, and N.E. by the Bay of Carlingford, which separates it from the county of Down, and on the E. by the Irish Channel. It is in general a rich and well-cultivated tract, in which there is little waste ground, and the surface is generally level, with the exception of a lofty range of mountains in the north, the highest point of which, Carlingford Mountain, has an elevation of 1,935 feet. There are many interesting ruins in the county, especially in the neighbourhood of Dundalk, and at Melligont and Drogheda. At Monaster-boyce are some famous sculptured stones of great size, and near the same place is a round tower.

Rivers.—The Boyne, which forms the southern boundary; the Fane, the Glyde, and the Dundalk river, which falls into the Bay of Dundalk.

Manf.—Linen to a great extent.

Area.—315 square miles.

Pop.—78,238.

Chief Towns.—DROGHEDA, DUNDALK, and ARDEE.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, one for Drogheda, and one for Dundalk.

History.—The county was formed by King John in 1210, having formerly been a portion of the territory of Or-gial.

LOUTH, a market-town and municipal borough of Lincolnshire, 25 miles N.E. of Lincoln. The church, erected in the 14th century, has a beautiful spire 300 feet high. The chief public building is a town-hall, containing a court-house and assembly room. Manf. Iron, leather, oilcake, and carpets. Pop. 10,500.—A station on the Great Northern railway.

LOUTHERBOURG, PHILIP JAMES DE, loo'-tair-boorg, an eminent landscape-painter, who, after obtaining considerable success in his profession at Paris, went to London, in 1771, and was for some time engaged as scene-painter at the Opera-house; a branch of art in which he surpassed all his contemporaries.

Born at Strasburg, 1740; died in London, 1814.

LOUVAIN, loo'-va, löwen in German, leuwen in Flemish, a city of Belgium, province of Brabant, on the Dyle, 16 miles N.E. of Brussels. It was formerly a place of much greater importance than at present. The capital of the duchy of Brabant, with six times its present number of inhabitants, and renowned for its cloth factories. The town-hall is admired as a fine specimen of Gothic architecture, and the collegiate church is inferior to few in Belgium. The great Hôpital des Invalides, and the buildings of the university, founded in 1426, and which has survived many vicissitudes, being now the best attended in Belgium, are also objects of interest. Manf. Linen and woollens, lace, cotton twist, tobacco, bells, and glass. It is noted for its beer, and has a trade in corn and hops. Pop. 37,490.

LOUVEN, loo'-ven, a river of Norway, rising in the district of Christiana, expanding into several lakes, and, after a course of 100 miles, falling into the Skager-rack.

L'OUVERTURE, TOUSSAINT, loo'-vair-toor, a negro, who, in 1795, assisted the French general Laveaux in driving the English and Spanish from the island of St. Domingo. He subsequently became commander-in-chief of the army of St. Domingo, and, in 1800, he caused himself to be named president. In 1812 he refused to recognise General Leclerc, who was sent to re-establish French authority, but was compelled to capitulate, and was transported to France, where he died in prison.

Born at St. Domingo, 1743; died 1803.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, JOHN BAPTIST, lou-vai de(r) koov'-rai, a French writer, and one of the members of the National Convention. He had the courage to oppose Robespierre when at the height of his power, yet escaped the vengeance of the tyrant. He wrote a romance, entitled the "Amours of the Chevalier Faublas," a political journal called the "Sentinel," a "Justification of Paris," and an account of himself, and the dangers which he passed through.

Born at Paris, 1764; died at Paris, 1797.

LOUVIERS, loo'-ve-ai, a town of France, department Eure, 16 miles S. of Rouen. The old town on the left bank of the river is chiefly built of wood, the new town is on the opposite bank of the river, which is crossed by three bridges. It has a cathedral. Manf. Cloth (very extensive), cotton goods, machinery, and soap. Pop. 10,000.—This place was sacked both by Edward III. and Henry V. of England.

LOUVOIS, FRANÇOIS MICHEL LETELLIER, Marquis de, loo-vwaw', minister to Louis XIV. To him are principally attributable the devastations of the Palatinate, the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and the terrible persecution of the Protestants. After having served the "Grand Monarque" during 36 years, he fell under Louis XIV.'s displeasure, and was only saved from disgrace by a sudden death. The Hôtel des Invalides was founded by him.

Born at Paris, 1641; died 1691.

LOUZA, loo'-za, a town of Portugal, province of Douro, at the foot of Mount Louza, which supplies Lisbon with snow and ice, 12 miles S.E. of Coimbra. Manf. Paper of excellent quality. Pop. 4,500.

LOVAT, SIMON FRASER, Lord, luv'-at, a Scottish chieftain, who, in 1715, took Inverness from the rebels; but, on the breaking out of the second rebellion in 1745, declared for the Pretender, for which he was taken prisoner, and sent to London, where he was sentenced to be beheaded. He was an unscrupulous and double-dealing man.

Born near Inverness, 1676; died 1747.

LOVAT, lo-vat', a river of Russia, flowing through the governments of Pskov and Novgorod into Lake Ilma. It is 267 miles long.

LOVATZ, lo-vatz', a town of European Turkey in Bulgaria, on the Osma, 95 miles S.E. of Widin. Pop. 15,000, partly Christians and partly Turks.

LOVER, SAMUEL, Irish novelist and song writer, was the son of a stockbroker in Dublin. He studied art, and in 1828 was elected a member of the Royal Hibernian Society of Arts, and practised as a portrait and miniature painter. But literature had greater attractions, and he devoted the remainder of his life to the pen. His "Legends and Stories of Ireland," "Rory O'More," "Handy Andy," and other novels, and his songs, "Rory O'More," "Molly Bawn," "The Low-backed Car," and many others, gained great popularity. Later in life he gave musical and literary entertainments.

Born in Dublin, 1797; died 1868.

LOVELACE, RICHARD, luv'-laice, an English poet. He was a zealous royalist, and suffered much for his attachment to Charles I., dying in great poverty in a wretched lodging near Shoe-lane, Fleet-street. In one of his poems occurs the famous line,

> "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage."

His poems are elegant, and he wrote also two plays —"The Scholar," a comedy, and "The Soldier," a tragedy.

Born in Kent, 1618; died 1658.

LOVICZ, lo'-vich, an old town of Poland, in the Russian government of Warsaw, on the Bzina, a tributary of the Vistula, 45 miles S.W. of Warsaw. It was at one time the residence of the primates of Poland. Six fairs are held annually. Pop. 6,200.

LOVISA, lo-vi'-sa, a maritime town of Russia, in Finland, on the Gulf of Finland, 140 miles N.W. of St. Petersburg. There is a good export trade in iron bars, tobacco, and salt, and there is regular steam communication with Helsingfors. Pop. 2,600.

LOVTCHA, lovt'-cha, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, on the left bank of the Osma, 40 miles S. of Nikopol. Pop. 3,000.

LOW ARCHIPELAGO, or PAAMUTOS, about 90 coral islands in the Pacific, between the Society, Marquesas, and Friendly Islands. The principal are Anhar, the Gambier Islands, and Pitcairn. Pop. about 10,000.

LOW COUNTRIES. (See NETHERLANDS.)

LOWE, SIR HUDSON, lo, entered the army at an early age, and after the peace of Amiens was military commander in the island of Capri, which he was compelled, in 1808, to surrender to the French. He afterwards served in the German army. In 1815 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general, and appointed lieutenant-governor of St. Helena. In that capacity he was intrusted with the surveillance of the exiled Emperor Napoleon; with whom he was involved in continual petty quarrels, and the impression generally prevailed that he treated the distinguished captive with unnecessary severity; this opinion was strengthened by the publicity of a book, by Dr. O'Meara, who was the medical attendant of Napoleon. The charges were by no means substantiated, and there can be no doubt that Sir Hudson occupied a deeply responsible position, and that the ex-emperor was not only peevish and quarrelsome, but very regardless of truth. In 1825 Sir Hudson was appointed military commander of Ceylon, and after his return lived in poverty and obscurity.

Born at Galway, 1769; died in London, 1843.

LOWE, ROBERT, Right Hon., Lord Sherbrooke, the son of a Nottinghamshire clergyman, was educated at Winchester and University College, Oxford, and became a fellow of Magdalen College. He was called to the bar, and in 1842 went to Australia, and obtained considerable practice at Sydney, for which he was elected member. In 1852 he returned to England, and entered Parliament for Kidderminster. In 1859 he was returned for Calne, and in 1868 for the London University. He held office under Lord Aberdeen, as secretary to the Board of Control, in 1853; as vice-president of the Board of Trade, in Lord Palmerston's government of 1855, and was chancellor of the exchequer in the Gladstone administration from 1868 to 1873, and was afterwards for a few months secretary of state for the Home Department. At the general election of 1880 he was again returned for the London University, but shortly afterwards raised to the peerage as Viscount Sherbrooke. Born at Bingham, Nottinghamshire, 1811.

LOWELL, JAMES RUSSELL, lo'-el American poet and humorist. He was educated at Harvard University, where, in 1854, he succeeded Longfellow as professor of modern languages. He was for several years editor of the Atlantic Monthly, and of the North American Review. In 1874 he received the degree of LL.D. from the English University of Cambridge. His serious poems display grace and power; and "The Biglow Papers" place him in the first rank of American humorists. He was appointed minister to Great Britain in 1880.

Born at Boston, 1819.

LOWELL, a city of Massachusetts, United States, 25 miles N.W. of Boston, on the Merrimac river, near the Pawtucket Falls. It has 30 churches, a lyceum, literary and mechanics' institutions, and a great number of schools. Manf. Cottons principally. It is the chief seat of that manufacture in the United States. There are besides, powder-mills and bleach-fields. Pop. 59,475, about 15,000 being foreigners.

LOWENBERG, le(r)en-bairg, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the left bank of the Bober, 27 miles S.W. of Leignitz. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, and vinegar. Pop. 5,200.

LOWESTOFT, lo'-stoft, a market-town, seaport and watering-place of Suffolk, the most easterly town of England, on a hill looking down upon the sea, 25 miles S.E. of Norwich. There are many fine residences, and the usual accompaniments of a fashionable seaside resort. The principal street is nearly a mile long, and there are a handsome parish church, three other churches, several chapels, a town-hall, and a theatre. There are two lighthouses, and it has its harbour defended by forts and a battery. Manf. Ropes: but the trade depends chiefly on the herring, cod, sole, mackerel, and sprat fisheries. Pop. 19,597.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

LOWNDES, lounds, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 31,000, four-fifths being coloured. The capital is Haynesville.

LOWNDES, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 11,000, one-half being coloured. The capital is Troupville.

LOWNDES, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 569 square miles. Pop. 28,000, two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Columbus.

LOWTH, WILLIAM, louth, a learned English divine, who wrote "Commentaries on the Four Greater Prophets," "Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures," "A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testaments," in answer to Leclerc, and other important works.

Born in London, 1661; died 1732.

LOWTH, ROBERT, a learned English prelate, son of the above. He was educated at Winchester School, and at New College, Oxford, where, in 1741, he was elected professor of poetry at Oxford, and in that capacity delivered his admirable lectures, which were printed at Oxford in 1753, under the title of "Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews." After passing through various minor grades of the Church, he became bishop of St. David's in 1766; of Oxford a few months afterwards; and, in the following year, of London. Besides the above well-known work, Bishop Lowth published a translation of Isaiah from the Hebrew, an English Grammar, the "Life of William of Wykeham," the Life of his Father, in the "Biographia Britannica," a translation of Isaiah, a poem on the Genealogy of Christ, some controversial letters with Bishop Warburton, and sermons on public occasions.

Born 1710; died 1787.

LOXA. (See LOJA.)

LOYALTY ISLANDS, loi'-al-te, a group of five, in the Pacific Ocean, lying to the N.E. of New Caledonia. The three largest are inhabited. Pop. unascertained.

LOYOLA, IGNATIUS, loi-o'-la, the founder of the order of Jesuits. He was youngest son of a Spanish nobleman of high birth, was brought up to the military profession, and obtained a commission in the Spanish army; but, breaking his leg at the siege of Pampeluna, he made a vow to the Virgin, that if he recovered he would go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and devote himself to a religious course of life, which resolution he fulfilled. He first entered a convent at Montserrat, and devoted himself to the service of the sick and poor in the adjacent town of Manreza, and afterwards retired to a cavern, where he nearly killed himself by his austerity. After studying Latin a short time at Barcelona, he went begging his way to Jerusalem, from which he returned in 1521. To qualify himself for what he considered the work of his life, he studied assiduously at the universities of Alcola and Salamanca, and commenced preaching, and began to gather disciples, for which he was imprisoned. He afterwards went to Paris, where he continued to study, and persevered in adding to the number of the brethren of the Order of Jesus, as they were called, and for which, at length, he obtained a confirmation by Pope Paul III. This order increased prodigiously during the lifetime of Loyola. He was canonized in 1622.

Born in the Basque provinces, 1491; died at Rome, 1556.

LOZÈRE, lo-zair', a department in the south of France, bounded by the department of the Cantal, the Upper Loire, the Ardèche, the Gard, and the Aveyron. It is generally infertile, but vines, olives, and mulberries are cultivated on the south slope of the Cévennes mountains, which traverse the south and south-eastern parts of the department, and from one of the summits of which, Mount Lozère, it takes its name. Some of the peaks are about 5,000 feet high. Chestnuts, potatoes, and wine; sheep are reared in large numbers, and the greater portion of the inhabitants subsist on potatoes and chestnuts.

Rivers.—The Allier, Tarn, Lot, Gard, and Truyère.
Minerals.—Iron, lead, copper, antimony, silver, marble, and granite.
Area.—1,994 square miles.
Pop.—143,565.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 3 arrondissements and 194 communes. The chief towns are MENDE, the capital; Florac, and Marvejols.

LUARCA, loō-ar'-ka, a town and port of Spain, province of Oviedo, on the Negro, 37 miles N.W. of Oviedo. Manf. Woollens, chocolate, and soap. Pop. 2,700.

LUBANG, loo-bang', a town on an island of the same name, one of the Philippines. Pop. 6,000.

LUBAR, loo-bar', a town of Russia, government of Volhynia, on the Slutah, 70 miles S. of Jitomir. Pop. 3,500.

LÜBBECKE, le(r)'-bek-ke(r), a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, 12 miles W. of Mindon. Manf. Leather and tobacco. Pop. 2,800.

LUBBEN, loob'-ben, a town of Prussia, province Brandenburg, on an island formed by the Spree and the Birste, 40 miles S.W. of Frankfort. Manf. Linens, woollens, tobacco, beer, and brandy. Pop. 5,600.

LUBBENAU, loob'-be-nou, a town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Spree, 40 miles S.W. of Frankfort. Manf. Linens, woollens, and distilling. Pop. 3,200.

LUBECK, loo'-bek, a free city and state of Germany, on the Trave, a navigable river, which joins the Baltic about 14 miles below the town. The town is the capital of a territory of 127 square miles, and is situated on a slightly elevated peninsula, between the Trave and a smaller stream, the Wackenitz, which unites with it. On the opposite side of the Trave, which is crossed by four bridges, are ornamental promenades, on the site of the old fortifications. The two main streets traverse the summit of the hill, and there are cross streets on the slopes. Many of the houses are very ancient and picturesque. The Dom, or cathedral, built between 1170 and 1341, is highly ornamental, and, although now a Lutheran church, contains an old crucifix of great size and beauty, and is highly decorated. Among the interesting monuments is a figure of Bishop von Buchholz, a prelate of the 14th century. The eyes of the statue and an ornament of the pastoral staff were gems of considerable value, which were abstracted by the French in 1806. The finest ecclesiastical edifice is the Marienkirche, completed early in the 14th century, a splendid specimen of Gothic architecture, with three naves, two spires 382 feet high, and a highly enriched interior. St. Katharine's is a noble church, with a lofty choir; and St. Anne's, partly in ruins, is a beautiful specimen of architecture. The Rathhaus, or town-hall, is a picturesque old building, and the large hospital of the Holy Ghost has a striking front, with a range of small spires. The two gates—the Holstein gate, with massive round towers and spires, and the Burg Thor, at the northern end of the town, with a large square tower—are interesting. There are remains of three monasteries, a large public library, and, in the town and suburbs, more than 90 educational establishments. About 4,000 vessels enter and clear at the port annually.

Manf.—Woollens, silk, cotton, tobacco, machinery, soap, and playing-cards; ship-building is carried on. The harbour is at Travemünde, several miles lower down the Baltic, but the river having recently been deepened, ships of considerable size can now reach the town.
Pop.—55,498; of the state, 69,800.
Lat. 53° 52′ 1″ N. Lon. 10° 41′ 5″ E.
Constitution.—The free city and state are governed according to a constitution established in 1851. There are two representative bodies, the Senate, of 14 members, elected for life; and the House of Burgesses, or Bürgerschaft, of 120 members.
History.—Lubeck was built on its present site about the year 1140. In 1220 it was declared a free city of the empire, and in 1241 it entered into a treaty with Hamburg, which laid the foundation of the Hanseatic League. In 1806, Blucher, after the battle of Jena, took refuge in Lubeck, which was carried after a sanguinary action. Between 1810 and 1813 it was a portion of the French empire. It is now a member of the German empire.

LUBECK, a post-township of Maine, United States, 180 miles from Augusta. It has a good harbour. Pop. 3,000.

LUBEN, loo'-ben, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Katzrbach, 14 miles from Liegnitz. Manf. Woollen weaving. Pop. 4,300.

LUBIANA (See LAYBACH.)

LUBLIN, loob'-lin, a town of Russian Poland, on the left bank of the Bystricza, 96 miles S.E. of Warsaw. It is the capital of a government of the same name. Its principal public buildings are a cathedral, the Sobieski palace, a town-hall, a synagogue, and a college. There are very interesting ruins of the church of St. Nicholas (founded in 936), and of a royal castle built by Casimir the Great. Manf. Woollens and linen. An extensive trade is carried on, and three large fairs are held. Pop. of the gov., 882,616; of the town, 36,760.

LUBNI, or LUBNU, loob-ni', an old town of Russia, government of Pultowa, on the Sula, 80 miles from Pultowa. Large annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,600.—Charles XII. of Sweden besieged this place for a considerable time, but was unsuccessful in taking it.

LÜBZ, le(r)bz, a town of Germany, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, on the Elde, 30 miles S.E. of Schwerin. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 2,600.

LUC, LE, look, a town of France, department Var, 27 miles N.E. of Toulon. Manf. Woollens, worsted, cork, leather, and glass. There is a trade in chestnuts. Pop. 3,300.

LUCAN, or LUCANUS, MARCUS ANNÆUS, lu-kan'-nus, a Latin poet. Going at an early age to Rome, his verses caused him to become the favourite of the Emperor Nero; but being foolish enough to enter into competition with his imperial patron, who was desirous of being considered the first poet of his time, he was forbidden to publish any more poetry. He was subsequently condemned to death for conspiring against the life of Nero, and was base enough to endeavour to save his own life by denouncing his mother, but without success, for he was compelled to destroy himself by opening his veins. The only poem of his at present extant is an epic in 10 books, the "Pharsalia," which describes the war from the commencement to Cæsar's meeting with Cleopatra in Egypt.

Born at Corduba (Cordova), in Spain, 38; died at Rome, 65.

LUCAS, lu'-cas, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 14,530. The capital is Chariton.

LUCAS, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 67,377. The capital is Toledo.

LUCCA, luk'-ka, or look'-ka, formerly a duchy of Italy (see ITALY), now a province of the Italian kingdom; mountainous, being traversed by the Apennines. The only river is the Serchio, which is not navigable. The soil is not naturally fertile, but highly cultivated. Olives, chestnuts, figs, citrons, and the mulberry are cultivated. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 292,435.

LUCCA, formerly the capital of the above duchy, and now of the Italian province of the same name, stands in a plain watered by the Serchio, 12 miles N.E. of Pisa. It has a circuit of about 3 miles, and its ramparts are planted with trees. The Ducal Palace and the Palazzo Borghi are large and interesting buildings. Several of the 40 churches are built of Carrara marble. The cathedral, which has a magnificent façade, contains some fine paintings. The church of San Michele is an ancient and massive structure, and the church of San Frediano, founded in the 7th century, is an interesting specimen of early Christian architecture. The Piazza del Mercato, a large square, in which the market is held, occupies the site and preserves the form of a Roman amphitheatre of immense size. The town is supplied with water by a very fine aqueduct of modern construction. The celebrated baths are on the banks of the Serchio, 15 miles from the town. Manf. Cloth and silk; and it trades in olive-oil, for which it is particularly famous. Pop. 66,469.—In the time of the Romans this place was frequently the head-quarters of Julius Cæsar. In 1805, Napoleon I. made it a principality, and gave it to his sister Eliza and her husband.

LUCE, BAY OF, or GLENLUCE BAY, a spacious bay in Wigtonshire, Scotland. It is about 19 miles broad at its entrance, and 7 at its head. Its length is about 17 miles. Its quicksands are frequently destructive to shipping.

LUCENA, loo-thai'-na, a city of Spain, province of Cordova, 40 miles S. of Cordova. Manf. Soap, linen, and cloth, besides saltworks near it. Its neighbourhood is famed for fruit, especially apricots, and for a fine breed of horses. Pop. 19,519.

LUCERA, loo-chair'-a, a town of Italy, province of Capitanata, 10 miles N.W. of Foggia. There are a cathedral, a royal college, museum, and a bishop's palace. A large trade in cheese and cattle is carried on. Pop. 14,760.

LUCERNE, loo-sairn', a canton lying almost in the centre of Switzerland, and enclosed by the cantons of Zürich, Schweitz, and Unterwalden. It is level in the north, but mountainous in the south, the Alps in that part attaining an altitude of nearly 7,000 feet, with a generally fertile soil, producing fruits and wine; but cattle-rearing and dairy husbandry are the principal branches of industry. The principal river is the Reuss. Lakes Lucerne and Zug form part of the eastern border of the canton. Area, 474 square miles. Pop. 134,000, nearly all Roman Catholics.

LUCERNE, capital of the above canton, stands on both sides of the Reuss, at the north-western extremity of the Lake of Lucerne. It is built on a gentle eminence, surrounded by a wall and towers, and contains several handsome edifices, with neat groups of houses on the lake. Of the public buildings, the principal are the town-hall, the watch-tower (supposed to have been anciently a light-house, lucerna, whence the name of the town), the arsenal, gaol, theatre, and several covered bridges. The churches are of Gothic architecture; and there are both monasteries and convents. Manf. Silk, cotton, flax, hemp, and gloves. Pop. 17,850.

LUCERNE, a lake of Switzerland, between the canton of Unterwalden, Lucerne, Schwyz, and Uri. It is about 22 miles long, with a breadth of from half a mile to 2 miles. Its scenery is remarkably picturesque, and steamers ply on the water.

LUCHON. (See BAGNERES DE LUÇON.)

LUCIA-IN-MELAZZO (SANTA), a town of Italy, province of Napoli, 5 miles N.W. of Salerno. There is an abbey. Pop. 3,000.

LUCIA, ST., lu'-she-a, one of the Windward Islands, in the West Indies, about 30 miles to the S. of Martinique. It exhibits a variety of hills; amongst others, the Sulphur Mountain, an active volcano. Two remarkable cones, the Great and Little Pitons, are on the south-western shore. There are fine valleys having a good soil, and well watered. The elevated parts are covered with thick forests; but the climate is not generally healthy. There are several commodious bays and harbours, with good anchorage. The great article of export is sugar. Area, 248 square miles. Pop. 32,000, of whom only about 800 are white. Lat. 13° 41′ N. Lon. 61° W.—The English first settled in this island in 1637; in the year 1763 it was ceded to France. The English took it in the year 1779, but restored it at the peace in 1783. It has been in the possession of the English since 1803.

LUCIAN, lu'-she-an, a celebrated Greek satirist and rhetorician. His father, who was poor, placed him with a sculptor; but disliking that business, he applied himself to the law, which profession he also abandoned, and devoted himself to philosophy and eloquence. He travelled much, and for some time taught rhetoric in Gaul. The latter part of his life was passed in an official capacity in Egypt. He lived to an advanced age. His works, which are written in the Attic dialect, consist mostly of satirical dialogue, abounding with witticisms, but in some parts very coarse. The best editions of Lucian are those of Lehman and Dindorf. Tooke, Blount, and Franklin have given English translations of his writings.

Died about 200 A.D.

LUCIAN, SAINT, early Christian theologian, who taught at Antioch, and was thrice excommunicated for heresy, but finally submitted to the authority of the church. He was tortured in Nicomedia in the persecution under Maximin, and died in prison. He may be considered as the founder of Arianism.

Died about 310.

LUCILIUS, CAIUS, lu-sil'-e-us, a Roman satirist, who served under Scipio in his expedition against the Numantians. He is considered by some as the author of a poetical satire; but only a few of his verses remain, which are in the "Corpus Poetarum" of Maittaire.

Born B.C. 148; died at Naples, B.C. 103.

LUCINA, lu-ci'-na, in Roman mythology, the goddess who presided at the birth of children, sometimes considered as identical with Juno. In the Greek mythology the name is Ilithyea.

LUCIUS I., Pope, lu'-she-us, succeeded Cornelius in 252, and was martyred the year following.

Died 253.

LUCIUS II. (Gerardo de' Caccianamici), a native of Bologna, succeeded Celestin II. in 1144, and died a few months afterwards of a blow which he received in a popular commotion.

Died 1145.

LUCIUS III. (Ubaldo Allucingoli), succeeded Alexander III. in 1181. The Roman people having risen against him, he retired to Verona, but afterwards returned to Rome, and, by the help of the Italian princes, subdued his enemies. A new commotion compelled him, however, to retire again. He made a constitution for the extirpation of heresies, which laid the foundation of the Inquisition.

Died at Verona 1185.

LUCIUS, a legendary king of Britain in the 2nd century. He is said to have desired to be instructed in Christianity, to have received teachers from Pope Eleutherius, and to have founded the see of Llandaff.

Lived in the 2nd century.

LUCKAU, loo'-kou, a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, 48 miles S.W. of Frankfort. Manf. Woollens, linens, tobacco, and gunpowder. Four annual cattle-markets are held. Pop. 4,600.

LUCKENWALDE, look-en-vald', a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, on the river Nuthe, 30 miles S.W. of Berlin. A suburb, Little Gera, is inhabited by Russians. Manf. Woollen cloth, among the largest in Prussia. Pop. 14,000.

LUCKIPOOR, or LOCKSHMIPUR, luk-e-poor', a town of British India, in Tipperah, province of Bengal, a few miles from the mouth of the Great Megna, here 10 miles wide, and 60 miles S.E. of Dacca. Manf. Coarse cotton stuffs. Lat. 20° 55′ N. Lon. 90° 55′ E.

LUCKNOW, luk'-nou, a city of British India, and capital of a district of the same name, in the province of Oude, on the right bank of the Goomtee, which falls into the Ganges. A bridge of stone, one of iron, and another of boats cross the river. The streets are narrow and very irregular; but it has an imposing appearance, the gilt domes of the imaumbarah, or chief mosque, and the mausoleum of the Vizir Asoph ud Dowlah, imparting to it, from a distance, an appearance of splendour. There are five royal palaces, the principal being the large Fureed Buksh and the Kaiserbagh. There is a monument to the memory of the native soldiers who fell in defending the Residency, in the great mutiny, the first stone of which was laid by the Prince of Wales in January 1876. The town is of great antiquity, but the older portion consists mostly of mud huts with straw roofs. The newer part has many good houses. Pop. 261,303.—In 1857, this place was besieged by the rebels, but was bravely defended by the troops under Brigadier Inglis, who had the command of the garrison. Sir Colin Campbell came, relieved the garrison, and effected one of the most masterly retreats on record. Pop. of district of same name, 696,824.

LUCKPUT, or LUCKPUT-BUNDER, look-poot', a town of British India, in Cutch, on the Koree, or east branch of the Indus. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 23° 47′ N. Lon. 68° 56′ E.

LUCO, loo'-ko, a walled town of Italy, on the west bank of Lake Fucino, 26 miles S. of Aquila. Pop. 2,750.

LUCON, loo'-kawng, a town of France, department Vendée, 20 miles N. of Rochette. There is a very fine Gothic cathedral. Manf. Porcelain, and it has an active export trade, chiefly in grain and timber. Pop. 6,000.

LUÇON, LUZON, or LUCONIA, loo-thon', the principal of the Philippine Islands, in the Eastern archipelago, on which stands Manilla, the metropolis. It is extremely irregular in shape, consisting of two portions connected by an isthmus, the northern portion being much the larger, and having the bay of Longayen on the west and the bay of Manilla on the south-west. The smaller part has a coast indented by many bays. The country is, for the most part, mountainous, being intersected in its whole length by elevated ridges, the Sierra Madre and Cordillera de Caravallos, which unite near the centre of the island, and spread over the whole island. In some places the detached mountains assume a conical figure, in the midst of extensive plains. The greatest elevation is about 7,000 feet. The climate is moist, but it is temperate, considering the situation of the island within the tropics, and the soil is fertile, the vegetation being almost unsurpassed in luxuriance.

Rivers.—The largest is the Aparri, or Cagayan, which rises in the central ridge, flows almost due north, and, after a course of 180 miles, falls into the sea at Aparri. The other rivers are the Pasig, one of the seven branches of which communicates with Manilla; the Abra, Agno, Pampanga, and Cabucao. There are several lakes, the largest being Bay Lake, more than 100 miles in circuit, with the island of Talin in the centre, and Bonbon, or Taal, with an active volcano in the centre.

Pro.—Rice, sugar, banana (valuable for its fibres), cotton, coffee, tobacco, cinnamon, and the ordinary tropical produce.

Minerals.—Gold, which is washed from all the streams, iron, copper, sulphur, coal, marble, agates, jasper, and carnelians.

Manf.—Cotton and silk tissues, embroidery, wood and ivory carvings, leather, and carriages. Boat building is actively carried on.

Area.—57,500 square miles.

Pop.—38,616 are enumerated—Tagals, or pure Indians, and descendants of Chinese, Japanese, and the Negritos, the aborigines, who are in a savage state.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The island is divided into 19 provinces. The chief towns are MANILLA, the capital; Aparri, Bidondo, Cavité, and Santa Cruz.

LUCRETIA, lu-kre'-she-a, a celebrated Roman lady, was the daughter of Lucretius, governor of Rome, and the wife of Collatinus, a relation of Tarquin, one of whose sons, Sextus, ravished her, and she committed suicide on the following day. Her death occasioned the liberty of the Romans, who, excited by Brutus, expelled the Tarquins from their city. Sextus fled to a town of the Gabii, where he soon after perished. The sad fate of Lucretia is the subject of one of Shakspeare's finest poems.

Died about 509 B.C.

LUCRETIUS, TITUS CARUS, lu-kre'-she-us, a Roman poet and philosopher, was born of a good family, and educated under Zeno and Phædrus, both of the Epicurean sect. Cicero highly commends him for his learning and eloquence. His poem "On the Nature of Things" displays a vast amount of knowledge and daring speculation, and is partly founded on the doctrines of Epicurus. Lucretius has been translated into English, with notes, by Creech, and has been published in Bohn's "Classical Library." Little is known of his personal history, but Eusebius says he died by suicide.

Born 95 B.C.; died 52 B.C.

LUCULLUS, LUCIUS LICINIUS, lu-kul'-lus, a celebrated Roman general and consul, who gained a great victory over Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, B.C. 74, and conquered Bithynia. He also defeated Tigranes, king of Armenia, father-in-law of Mithridates, and took his capital; but the severity of Lucullus to his soldiers gave such offence that he was recalled, and the command given to Pompey. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph, and then retired to private life, possessed of immense riches, displaying an extravagance of luxury which has become proverbial. He collected a prodigious library, and patronised learned men.

Born about 11 B.C.; died 57 B.C.

LUDAMAR, lood'-a-mar, a county of Central Africa. The inhabitants are Moors, who rear cattle, the skins of which are made into saddles, bridles, and pouches. The chief towns are Benowm and Jarra. Lat. 14° 28′—15° 38′ N. Lon. 8°—10° 18′ E.

LUDE, LE, loode, a town of France, department Sarthe, on the left bank of the Loir, 25 miles S. of Le Mans. There are a handsome château, on a hill overlooking the river, and several antique and highly decorated houses. Manf. Linen, woollen, and leather. Pop. 3,800.

LUDEN, HEINRICH, loo'-den, German historian, studied at Gottingen, and in 1806 became a professor at Jena. His historical works relate chiefly to German history, and are of a patriotic character.

Born near Bremen, 1780; died at Jena, 1847.

LÜDENSCHEID, le(r)d'-en-shide, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, 21 miles S.W. of Arnsberg. There are two Protestant churches. Manf. Buttons, files, buckles, hardware, and cotton. Calamine (carbonate of zinc) is found in the vicinity. Pop. 7,500.

LUDLOW, EDMUND, lud'-lo, an English parliamentary general, who studied first at Oxford, and afterwards in the Temple; but the civil wars breaking out, he quitted the law for the army, and served under the earl of Essex. He was a firm republican, and was one of the members of the high court of justice which sentenced Charles I. to the scaffold. On the death of Ireton, he had the command of the army in Ireland; but was deprived of it for opposing the usurpation of Cromwell. In the parliament under Richard Cromwell he obtained a seat, and was restored to his command in Ireland, but was again recalled. Just before the restoration of the king he went to Vevay, in Switzerland, where he resided till 1688, when he ventured to return to England; but the House of Commons applying to King William to cause him to be apprehended, he withdrew again to Vevay, where he died. His memoirs, which are curious and accurate, were printed after his death.

Born about 1620; died at Vevay, 1693.

LUDLOW, a market-town, municipal and parliamentary borough of Shropshire, on the Teme, over which is a stone bridge at the confluence with the Corve, 25 miles S.E. of Shrewsbury. The public buildings are the church, a very spacious and stately-looking edifice, extending in length 228 feet, and 73 in breadth, and erected in the 14th century; the market-house, and the town-hall. There are several charities, both for education and for the relief of the distressed. The castle, now in ruins, was a place of great importance as a stronghold against the incursions of the Welsh. In it Arthur, eldest son of Henry VII., was married to Catherine of Aragon, afterwards wife of his brother, Henry VIII.; and in 1634, Milton's Masque "Comus" was performed here. Pop. 5,100.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

LUDWIG, or LOUIS I., KARL AUGUST, king of Bavaria, eldest son of king Maximilian Joseph. While Crown Prince he devoted himself to the study of science and the fine arts, and formed the splendid collection of sculpture known as the Glypothek. In 1810 he married the princess Theresa of Saxe-Hildburghausen, and succeeded to the throne in 1825. He continued his encouragement of the fine arts, erected several magnificent buildings (see MUNICH), and promoted public works. His intolerance to all except Roman Catholics, and his discreditable association with the notorious Lola Montez (see MONTES), excited the indignation of his subjects, and the revolutionary disturbances of 1848 led to his abdication in favour of his eldest son Maximilian.

Born 1786; died 1868.

LUDWIG II., king of Bavaria, grandson of the above, and son of Maximilian II., succeeded to the throne in 1864.

Born 1845.

LUDWIGSBURG, lood'-vigs-boorg, a well-built town of Germany, in Würtemberg, on the Neckar, 8 miles N. of Stuttgart. It has a royal castle, with a fine picture gallery and gardens, and several churches, and a large arsenal, being the principal military depôt of the kingdom. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen fabrics, leather, earthenware, tobacco, needles, and jewellery. Pop. 16,100.

LUINI, or LOVINI DA LUINI, BERNARDINO, Italian painter, who studied at Milan, in the academy presided over by Leonardo da Vinci, whose style he imitated with great success. He was famous as a fresco painter, and executed many fine works at Milan, Lugano, and Pavia.
Born at Luini, near Lake Maggiore, about 1460.

LUIS, SAN. (See SAN LUIS.)

LUITPRAND, lwe'-pran, Lombard historian, was secretary to Berengarius, regent of the kingdom of Italy, who also employed him as his ambassador to Constantinople. He afterwards became bishop of Cremona, and was sent, in 962, by Otho I., emperor and king of Italy, on a mission to Rome. In 968 he went on an embassy to Constantinople, where he was thrown into prison by the orders of Nicephorus Phocas, for his zeal in defending the interest of his master. After remaining in confinement some months, he returned to Italy. He wrote the History of the Affairs of Europe in his time, and other works valuable for their historical information.
Born at Pavia, early in the 10th century; died about 970.

LUITPRAND, king of Lombardy, succeeded his father Ansprand in 712. His hostility to the Greek settlers in Italy, involved him in continual quarrels, and his successes excited the jealousy of Pope Gregory II. In consequence of illness in 736, he associated his nephew Hildebrand with him in the government. He afterwards assisted Charles Martel to drive the Saracens out of Provence, and besieged Rome, but Charles assisting the pope, he raised the siege. He was an energetic and able ruler, and Lombardy prospered under his administration.
Born 690; died 744.

LUKE, ST., luke, the Evangelist. His native country is unknown. Eusebius and Jerome state that he was born at Antioch; but Clement, Tertullian, and Origen make no mention of the fact. According to some, he was one of the seventy disciples sent forth by Christ; and he is expressly mentioned as a companion of St. Paul in his travels. Tradition affirms that, subsequently to St. Paul's first liberation from prison, St. Luke went to Achaia, and there wrote his gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, and that he died at an advanced age.

LUKOW, loo'-kof, a town of Russian Poland, on an affluent of the Krzna, 16 miles S. of Siedlie. There are a castle, several churches, a monastery, and college. Pop. 4,200.

LULLY, RAYMOND, (RAIMUNDO LULLIO), lool'-le, known as the "enlightened doctor." He led for some years a dissolute life, and served as a common soldier. Falling in love with a young woman who had a cancer, he applied himself to the study of chemistry and physic, for the purpose of discovering a remedy for her complaint, in which he is said to have succeeded. He afterwards became subject to religious impressions, and studied theology, philosophy, and the Arabic language. He went to Tunis in 1292, and held public disputes with the Mahometan teachers, and afterwards in Majorca, Cyprus, and Armenia; and in 1306 went again to Africa, where he was treated with great severity, and, refusing to become a Mahometan, was expelled the country; and after suffering shipwreck, reached Pisa. He subsequently preached in Paris, and induced the pope to found professorships of the Oriental languages at Paris, Oxford, Salamanca, and other places. In 1314 he again went to Africa; but the people of Bugia attacked him, and stoned him to death. His works on theology, physic, philosophy, and law, have been frequently printed, but are very obscure. Some treatises on alchemy frequently, but unwarrantably, appear as his.
Born at Palma, Majorca, 1234; died at Bugia, 1315.

LULLY, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, a celebrated musician. He became page to Mademoiselle de Montpensier, niece of Louis XIV., who caused him to be taught music, in which he acquired such excellence as to be made superintendent of music to that king. Lully composed a number of operas and the music of several of Molière's plays.
Born at Florence, 1633; died at Paris, 1687.

LURISTAN, or LOURISTAN, loo-ris-tan', a district of the province Irak-Ajemi, of Persia, bordering on Khuzistan and Faro. It is very mountainous, but there are many fruitful valleys. The inhabitants lead a wandering and pastoral life, and are fierce and warlike.

LUS, lus', a province in the south-east of Beloochistan, bounded on the S. by the Indian Ocean. Generally mountainous; but fertile along the banks of its rivers. Area, 5,200 square miles. Pop. 60,000.

LUSATIA, lu-sāt'-she-a, an old province of Germany. (See GERMANY.)

LUSIANA, loo'-se-a-na, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, 16 miles N.E. of Vicenza. Manf. Venetian straw hats. Pop. 3,700.

LUSIGNAN, loo-seen'-yawng, a town of France, department Vienne, 14 miles S.W. of Poitiers. There are still some remains of one of the strongest fortresses in France. Manf. Serge and leather. Pop. 2,400.—This place is the cradle of the Lusignan family, which, during the crusades, became the sovereigns of Jerusalem and Cyprus.

LUSIGNAN, GUY DE, a celebrated French warrior of noble family, who went to the Holy Land in the time of the crusades, and espoused Sibylla, daughter of Amaury, king of Jerusalem, whom he succeeded; but he afterwards conceded that title to Richard I., king of England, and received the isle of Cyprus in return.
Died 1194.

LUSSURGIU, SANTA, loos-soor'-je-oo, a town of the Island of Sardinia, 8 miles S.W. of Cagliari, situated in a mountain hollow, probably the crater of an extinct volcano. There are several churches and a monastery. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth. A large annual fair is held, and there is a considerable trade in wool, cattle, and dairy produce. Pop. 4,500.

LUTHER, MARTIN, lu'-ther, the great religious reformer, was the son of Hans Luther, a miner and metal worker, who trained him with considerable severity. In 1501 he was sent to the university of Erfurt, where he studied philosophy and the civil law, and when only 21 years of age took the degree of doctor of philosophy; but walking one day in the fields with a fellow student, his companion was struck dead by lightning, which so affected Luther, that he determined to retire from the world. He accordingly entered a monastery of the order of St. Augustine, where he led a pious and studious life; and there happening to meet with a Latin Bible, he read it with the utmost care and avidity, and was struck with the manifest difference between the doctrines of the gospel and the practices of the Roman church. He was ordained a priest in 1507, and afterwards removed to Wittenberg, where he became a teacher in the new university, and in 1509 took the degree of bachelor of theology. In 1512 he went to Rome on some business connected with his monastery, and, on his return, was created D.D., and became professor of divinity. In 1517, Leo X. published plenary indulgences or remissions from the temporal penalties of sin and the pains of purgatory. These indulgences were sold in Germany by the Dominicans in the most shameful manner, and gave offence to all religious persons, and to Luther in particular, who published a "Thesis on Indulgences," at Wittenberg, in which he exposed, in the strongest manner, the iniquity of the odious traffic. The propositions of Luther's Thesis were opposed by Tetzel, the papal agent; but the people at large were convinced that the truth lay on the side of Luther. The dispute growing serious throughout Germany, the emperor earnestly pressed the pope, Leo X., to exert his influence to put a stop to it; and, accordingly, though not very willingly on the part of the pope, who really admired Luther's talent and courage, Luther was cited to appear at Rome, which he prudently declined. Leo also demanded the elector Frederick to deliver Luther up to the papal legate, which he refused, at the same time requesting that the cause might be heard in Germany. To this the pope consented, and Luther appeared before Cardinal Cajetan, at Augsburg, to whom he gave a full account of his faith; but being required to make an implicit submission to the decrees of the pope, he zealously refused. On this, Leo issued a bull, threatening to excommunicate all who should presume to deny his power to grant plenary indulgences. Luther, on the other hand, appealed, in a public declaration, from the pope to a general council. The followers of Luther increased rapidly; Erasmus approved of his conduct in a great measure, and corresponded with him, but had not the courage to declare himself fully. The learned and amiable Melanethon attached himself firmly to Luther, and, by his prudence and moderation, rendered him essential service. In 1519, Luther had a dispute at Leipsic, with Eckius, professor of divinity at Ingoldstadt. In 1520 the pope issued a formal condemnation of Luther, which was immediately termed, by the reformer, "the execrable bull of antichrist;" and, calling the students of Wittenberg together, he flung the pope's bull and decretals into the fire. The year following, he attended the diet of Worms, by virtue of a safe conduct from the emperor Charles V.; and when his friends endeavoured to dissuade him from going, by urging the case of Huss, he said, that "if there were as many devils at Worms as tiles upon the houses, he would go." He was here required to retract his opinions, and to promise submission to the pope, both which he resolutely refused. On his return through a wood, he was seized by a party of horse, who conveyed him to a castle belonging to the elector of Saxony, where he was so secretly kept, that no one knew what was become of him, except the persons concerned in the affair. In the meantime, the emperor published an edict against him, and put under the ban of the empire those who should defend him. Luther, however, was secure in his retreat, which he called his Hermitage and his Patmos; and employed his time in conferences with his chosen friends, and in writing books. After an absence of ten months, he again made his appearance at Wittenberg, where he wrote a severe reply to Henry VIII. of England, who had published a book against him on the doctrine of the Eucharist. About this time he published a translation of the New Testament into German, which was universally read, though proscribed by imperial authority. In 1523, Erasmus was prevailed on to write against Luther, and chose for his subject the freedom of the human will, which he defended against the reformer, who replied in a treatise entitled "De Servo Arbitrio," which was answered by Erasmus in another, called "Hyperaspistes." In 1525, Luther married Catherine von Bora, a nun, who had escaped from a convent; on which his enemies accused him of immorality and impiety, but Luther defended his act on scriptural grounds. In 1529 the emperor convened a diet at Spires, to procure aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise means for allaying religious disputes. In this assembly it was ordered that the mass should be universally observed throughout the empire. Against this decree the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, and other princes, entered their protest; on which account the reformed party acquired the name of Protestants. These princes then entered into a league for their mutual defence against the emperor. In 1530 was drawn up by Melancthon the Confession of Augsburg, which was received as the standard of the Protestant faith in Germany. In 1535, Luther's translation of the Bible into German was published. In 1537, Luther was attacked with a dangerous illness, but recovered, and went on writing books, and labouring to promote the great work of reformation. The mind of Luther was ardent and impetuous, of indomitable resolution and courage, but honest, and earnestly bent on the discovery and propagation of religious truth. His manners were becoming his profession, and his whole life evinced a zeal for the glory of God and the welfare of man. He was a multifarious and voluminous writer. A fine memorial was erected at Worms in 1868.

Born at Eisleben, Saxony, 1483; died 1546.

LUTON, lu'-ton, a market-town of Bedfordshire, on the river Lea, 18 miles S. of Bedford, between the ranges of the Chiltern Hills. There are a very fine Gothic church and a new church. Manf. Straw hats. Pop. 23,959.—A station on the London and North-Western and Great Northern railways.

LUTTERBERG, loot'-ter-bairg, a town of Germany, 23 miles from Brunswick, in the district of Hartz. Pop. 1,300. Here Christian IV., king of Denmark, was defeated by Tilly, in 1626.

LUTTERWORTH, lut'-ter-werth, a market-town of Leicestershire, on the Swift, 14 miles S.W. of Leicester. The pulpit in the church, which is a large and handsome building, is the same in which the celebrated Wickliffe addressed his congregation. There is also a portrait of the great reformer, who died and was buried here. Manf. Hosiery and ribbons. Pop. 13,356.

LÜTTRINGHAUSEN, le(y)t'-tring-hou'-sen, a town of Prussia, province of Düsseldorf. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton stuffs, and agricultural implements. Pop. 9,300.

LUTZEN, loot'-sen, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, 11 miles S.W. of Leipsic. Pop. 2,700.—This place is memorable as the scene of two great engagements; one, in 1632, in which Gustavus of Sweden was killed; and the other in 1813, when the French, under Bonaparte, defeated the combined forces of Prussia and Russia.

LUX, ADAM, loox, a German enthusiast, an ardent partisan of the French revolution, who represented Mentz in the Convention. He afterwards took the part of the Girondists, and attacked the leaders of the Reign of Terror, demanding that he should be made a martyr. He was so violent that he was sent to the guillotine. One of his daughters inherited his morbid peculiarities, and committed suicide for love of Jean Paul Richter, whom she knew only by his writings.

Born at Oldenburg, 1766; died at Paris, 1793.

LUXEMBOURG, FRANÇOIS HENRI DE MONTMORENCY, Duke of, loox-em-boorg, a famous marshal of France, was the posthumous son of François de Montmorency, count of Boutteville, beheaded under Louis XIII. for fighting a duel. At the age of 15, he was at the battle of Rocroi, under the great Condé, and greatly distinguished himself by his daring. He served as lieutenant-general at the taking of Franche-Comté, in 1668, and in the Dutch campaign of 1672, about which time he effected a famous retreat with an army of 20,000 men against 70,000. In 1675 he was made marshal of France. A ridiculous charge was trumped up against him by Louvois, and he suffered 14 months' imprisonment in the Bastile, and was banished to his estates. After 10 years he was recalled, and appointed to the command of the army in Flanders, and in 1690 he gained the battle of Fleurus, which was followed by the victories of Leusen, Steenkirk, and Neerwinde. He was feeble and deformed in body, but in respect of energy and military talents one of the foremost generals of the age.

Born at Paris, 1628; died 1695.

LUXEMBURG, loox'-em-boorg, GRAND-DUCHY OF, a district in the south-east of Belgium, adjoining the Belgian province of the same name. It is connected with the Netherlands, in the person of the sovereign, but has a constitution and administration of its own, and is, by the treaty of London, of May, 1867, a neutral country, under the protection of the great European powers. The surface is generally level, and the chief products are corn, hemp, flax, hops, and wine. Minerals.—Iron, lime, and slate. Area, 1,592 square miles. Pop. 198,000, mostly Walloons, and the remainder Germans.

LUXEMBURG, capital of the above grand duchy, on the Else, 76 miles S.E. of Liége. There are an old and a new town, the former on an almost precipitous rock, and formerly one of the strongest fortresses in Europe; but since the treaty of 1867, the fortifications have been demolished. The new town is at the foot of the hill, along the banks of the river. There are a fine cathedral and many handsome buildings. Manf. Wax and leather. There are breweries and distilleries, and a large general trade is carried on. Pop. 15,000.

LUXEMBURG, BELGIAN, a province in the south-east of Belgium, traversed by branches of the Ardennes, which have an average height of about 2,000 feet. The surface is rugged, with large tracts of forest and morass, and the soil poor. Minerals.—Iron, lead, copper, marble, freestone, slate, and gypsum. Area, 1,690 square miles. Pop. 213,313. The capital is ARTON. Belgian Luxemburg formed a portion of the old German grand duchy, the greater part of which was allotted to Belgium when that kingdom was formed in 1830; but another division, by which the Netherlands obtained a larger share, was made in 1839.

LUXEUIL, loox'-e(r)-e, a town of France, department Haute-Saône, 17 miles N.E. of Vesoul. Manf. Straw hats, cherry brandy, leather, paper, cotton, pottery, and ironware. Pop. 4,000.

LUXOR, lux'-or, a village of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, 2 miles from Carnac. (See THEBES.)

LUZERN, a canton of Switzerland. (See LUCERNE.)

LUZERNE, lu-zern', a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 1,427 square miles. Pop. 133,065. The capital is Wilkesbarre.

LUZON. (See LUÇON.)

LUZY, loo-zé', a town of France, department Nièvre, on the Haleine, 40 miles S.E. of Nevers. Pop. 2,600.

LYCAON, li-ka'-on, in Greek mythology, a king of Arcadia, who for impiety and cannibalism was, with his son, transformed by Jupiter into wolves.

LYCAONIA, li-ka-o'-ne-a, an ancient division of Asia Minor, now in the Turkish province of Konieh.

LYCIA, li'-se-a, an ancient division on the south coast of Asia Minor.

LYCOMING, li-kō'-ming, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 1,080 square miles. Pop. 57,000. The capital is Williamsfort.

LYCON, li'-kon, Greek philosopher, principal of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He anticipated some of the modern educational theories, objecting to corporal punishment, and stimulating feelings of honour and shame among his pupils.

Died 226 B.C.

LYCOPHRON lik'-o-fron, a poet and grammarian, who lived at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and formed one of the seven poets known as the Pleiades. He was a voluminous writer, but only one of his poems has come down to our times,—that entitled "Cassandra,"—which is a long and enigmatical work that has been much commented on by the Greek grammarians. Ovid states that he was killed by an arrow.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

LYCURGUS, li-kur'-gus, the famous Spartan lawgiver. The records of his birth and of the period of his existence are very obscure; but he is stated to have been the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydectes, who succeeded his father. After the death of Polydectes, his widow offered the crown to Lycurgus, though she was then with child; but he refused, and faithfully discharged the duty of regent and guardian during the minority of his nephew Charilaus. When the young prince came of age, Lycurgus left Sparta, and travelled into several countries to observe their laws and manners. On his return home he found the kingdom in a state of confusion; the king endeavoured to reign despotically, and the people would not obey. Lycurgus undertook to reform the government, and introduced the most rigorous laws, yet such as were admirably adapted to civilize a disordered people. After this he quitted Sparta, and is supposed to have died in Crete, at an advanced age.

Died about 870 B.C.

LYCURGUS, an Athenian orator. He is said to have studied philosophy under Plato, and rhetoric under Isocrates. He was the friend of Demosthenes, and a zealous advocate for liberty. One of his orations is included in Reiske's collection of Greek orators.

Died 323 B.C.

LYDGATE, JOHN, lid'-gait, English poet, an Augustine monk of St. Edmund's Bury, in the reign of Henry VI. He was a poet and successor of Chaucer. As a poet he was most versatile and prolific. Ritson, in his "Bibliographica Poetica," has enumerated no fewer than 251 short works by him. The "History of Troy," "Story of Thebes," and "Fall of Princes," are his best poems. He is also said to have been a good mathematician and an accomplished scholar.

Born about 1370; died about 1450.

LYDIA, an ancient division of Asia Minor.

LYDUS, JOANNES LAURENTIUS, li'-dus, a celebrated Greek writer, who, during 40 years, filled several important posts at the court of the emperor Justinian. Three of his works have survived; these being treatises on the "Magistrates of the Roman Republici," on "The Months," and on "Omens and Prodigies."

Born about 490; died about 560.

LYE, EDWARD, lī', an English clergyman, who devoted himself, with the greatest success, to the study of the Saxon and Gothic languages and literature. Besides other important works, he gave to the world a "Dictionary of the Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Languages," which was published in 1772, a few years after the compiler's death.

Born at Totnes, 1704; died 1767.

LYELL, SIR CHARLES, lī'-el, a distinguished modern geologist. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and commenced practice at the bar; but his private means making him independent of his profession, he gave himself exclusively to the study of geology, to perfect his knowledge of which he travelled extensively in Europe. In 1832 he was named professor of geology at King's College; but this appointment he soon afterwards resigned. From the commencement of the publication of the Geological Society's Transactions, he was a regular and valuable contributor. In 1830 appeared the first volume of his great work, "The Principles of Geology." This was completed in 1834, passed through many editions, and attracted the attention of the whole geological world. Another extraordinary book by him was produced in 1838, entitled "Elements of Geology." These two works have exercised the most marked influence upon geological inquiry since the date of their first publication. Sir Charles Lyell made two visits to the United States of America, and published many memoirs relative to the geology of the New World. The continent of Europe was also travelled over, and its geological facts described by him. A general account of his journeys in America was published by Sir Charles Lyell, entitled "Travels in North America," and "A Second Visit to the United States." His scientific observations, both in the New World and on the continent of Europe, were produced in the "Transactions of the Geological Society," reports of the British Association, and in English and American scientific journals. His great services to the cause of geological science obtained for him, in 1848, the honour of knighthood, and in 1864 he was raised to a baronetcy. He was twice elected president of the Geological Society, was President of the British Association in 1864, and in 1855 his university conferred upon him the title of D.C.L., and the university of Cambridge the degree of LL.D. His work, published in 1863, "The Geological Evidences of the Antiquity of Man, with Remarks on the Theory of the Origin of Species by Development," created a great excitement, not only in the scientific world, but among general readers.

Born at Kinnordy, Forfarshire, 1797; died in London, 1875.

LYME REGIS, re'-gis, a municipal and parliamentary borough, seaport, and watering-place of Dorsetshire, at the mouth of a small stream, the Lym, 9 miles W. of Bridport. There is a good harbour, with a semi-circular pier. The principal buildings are a parish church, custom-house, townhall, and assembly rooms. Pop. 2,333.

LYMINGTON, li'-ming-ton, a municipal and parliamentary borough, market, seaport-town, and bathing-resort of Hampshire, at the mouth of a small river of the same name, 18 miles S.W. of Southampton. There are a church, town-hall, custom-house, theatre, baths, and workhouse, besides shipbuilding-yards and salt works. Pop. 4,360.—A station on the London and South-Western Railway.

LYNCHBURG, linch'-berg, the capital of Campbell county, Virginia, United States, picturesquely seated on the James river, 120 miles S.W. of Richmond. It has several churches and chapels. Manf. tobacco, cotton, and iron. Pop. 16,000, nearly half being coloured.

LYNDHURST, lind'-hurst, a village of Hampshire, in the New Forest, 8 miles S. of Southampton. Pop. 1,600.—In the neighbourhood, the spot is shown where William Rufus was slain, in the New Forest. All the forest courts are held at Lyndhurst, where is also the residence of the lord warden of the forest.

LYNDHURST, JOHN SINGLETON COPLEY, Lord, lord chancellor and statesman. His father, an eminent painter, descended from an Irish family, had emigrated to America, where the future English peer first saw the light. When about two years of age, his father took him to England, where he was ultimately educated, first by a private tutor, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he gained high honours. He was elected fellow of his college, and received the appointment of "travelling bachelor;" upon which he visited the United States. On his return to England, he commenced the study of the law, and in 1804 was called to the bar. Although his great abilities were generally admitted amongst the members of his own profession, still he was almost unknown to the general public till the year 1817, when he assisted Sir Charles Wetherell in defending Watson and Thistlewood on their trial for high treason. His singular talents, as displayed on this occasion, recommended him to the governing party of the time; and, although he had hitherto evinced liberal views in politics, he embraced the offers made to him by the Tory party. In 1818 he became chief-justice of the county palatine of Chester; and soon afterwards entered parliament for the borough of Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight. In 1819 he rose to the grade of king's serjeant, and was in the same year knighted and appointed solicitor-general. In the following year he conducted the prosecution in two great trials,—the Cato-street conspirators, and that of Queen Caroline in the House of Lords. He became attorney-general in 1823, and in 1826 he was made Master of the Rolls. When the question of the Roman Catholic emancipation came before the House of Commons, in 1821, he energetically opposed the measure; but two years afterwards he strenuously supported it, declaring that he "felt no apprehension for the safety of the church." He had previously accepted the chancellorship, and had been created Lord Lyndhurst. In 1830 he was appointed chief baron of the Exchequer, and in that capacity earned the highest distinction as an acute and impartial judge. During the proceedings consequent upon the introduction of the Reform Bill into the House of Lords, so strenuous was his opposition, that he was regarded as the head of the Conservative party in the Upper House. At one period it was actually proposed to him to form a new ministry, in conjunction with the Duke of Wellington; a project which fell to the ground on account of the refusal of Sir Robert Peel and other moderate Conservatives to join his cabinet. In 1834, he again became lord chancellor, under the Peel administration; but he retired with his party a short time afterwards. In 1841, however, Sir Robert Peel returned to power; whereupon Lord Lyndhurst, for the third time, accepted the chancellorship, and retained it until the retirement of his chief, in 1846. From that period, his speeches in the House of Lords became fewer in number, but carried no less weight with his hearers. When past the great age of 80 years, he delivered remarkable speeches relative to the war with Russia, on Cambridge University reform, the Wensleydale peerage, and the defences of the country; and at the age of 88, made a vigorous speech on the occasion of the dispute between the Lords and the Commons relative to the Paper Duties Bill.

Born at Boston, United States, 1772; died in London, 1863.

LYNE, line, a river of Scotland, rising on the borders of Edinburghshire, and, after a course of 20 miles falling into the Tweed above Peebles.—Another, of England, in Staffordshire, which falls into the Trent.—Another, of Northumberland, which falls into the sea.

LYNN, lin, a city of Massachusetts, United States, 9 miles N.E. of Boston. There are 30 churches. Manf. Boots and shoes, in connexion with which more than one-third of the inhabitants are engaged, and morocco and other fine leather. Pop. 38,000.

LYNN REGIS, or KING'S LYNN, a municipal and parliamentary borough, market-town, and seaport of England, in Norfolk, on the Ouse, about three miles from its mouth, and 26 N. of Ely. Four rivulets run through the town, over which are a number of small bridges. On the land side, the town is wholly surrounded with a deep fosse and portions of the old wall. There are five churches in the town and two in the suburbs, West Lynn and Gaywood; a handsome custom-house, guildhall, and a hospital. It has an active export and import trade in coal, wine, corn, timber, hemp, wool, and Canadian produce. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 18,475.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

LYON, li-on, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 2,000, LYON, a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 858 square miles. Pop. 17,326. The capital is Emporia.

LYON, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 375 square miles. Pop. 6,500. The capital is Eddyville.

LYON, a recently formed county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 1,980 square miles. Pop. 6,257.

LYON, a county of Nevada, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 2,000. The chief town is Dayton.

LYONS, or more properly LYON, li'-ons (Fr. lé'-awng), a large and celebrated city in the S.E. of France, and the second in point of population, the capital of the department of the Rhône, situate on the tongue of land inclosed between the Rhône and the Saône, 316 miles S.E. of Paris. It is surrounded by fortifications extending for 13 miles round the city. The streets are dark and gloomy, except in the more modern parts of the town, such as the Place Belle cour and the quays along the Rhône, where they display considerable elegance. Of the public buildings, the most noted are the town-hall (the finest in France) and the large hospital called Hôtel Dieu. The cathedral, one of the oldest churches in France, is a large building in the Saracenic style, and has four towers, and the church of Ainai deserves attention as a relic of antiquity; and of the other churches of the city, those of the Chartreux, St. Nizier, Notre Dame, and St. Bonaventure, deserve to be visited. The church of St. Irenæus stands on the site of the martyrdom of that bishop. The other buildings are the archiepiscopal palace, the arsenal, the exchange, the mint, and the public library. Lyons has a variety of antiquities, the remains of an aqueduct, a theatre, reservoirs, and mosaics. Of its literary institutions, there are an academy of sciences, founded in 1700, and an academy of fine arts in 1724. It has a primary and secondary school, school of design called "Institution de la Martinière," a national college, and a state veterinary school. The two rivers are crossed by 19 bridges, and the quays, 28 in number, are very fine. There are several important suburbs, the chief being La Guillotière, Les Brotteaux, and La Croix-Rousse. Manf. For these Lyons is celebrated; particularly for its extensive fabrics of silk (employing about 140,000 hands), gold and silver brocade, plain, double, and striped velvet, richly embroidered taffeta, and satin; also gold and silver laces or galoons, gauze, ribbons, nets, and silk stockings; hats, leather, carpets, coloured paper, chemicals, and earthenware. The printing and bookselling of this place are the next to Paris in importance. Pop. 376,613.—Lyons (Lugdunum) was founded about 42 years before the Christian era, and suffered greatly during the revolution, from the conflicts of hostile parties.

LYONS, capital of Wayne county, New York, United States, 169 miles N.W. of Albany. Manf. Leather, carriages, and essential oils. Pop. 5,000.

LYONS, or LYON, GULF OF. (See LION.)

LYONS, EDMUND, Lord, a distinguished British admiral. He was sent, at a very early age, to Hyde-Abbey School, near Winchester; but little time was spent in a merely school education, as he entered the navy as a volunteer of the first class in 1800, when he was but ten years and a half old. He was first sent on board the Royal Charlotte yacht, and, after seeing some service in the Mediterranean, accompanying Sir John Duckworth's expedition to the Dardanelles, and assisting at the demolition of the redoubt on Point Pesquies, on the Adriatic shore, he returned to England in 1807. The same year he went to the East Indies, where he gained considerable distinction. Returning home in ill health, he was promoted to the command of the Rinaldo, 10, in which vessel he formed one of the squadron which, in 1813, escorted Louis XVIII. to France, and the allied sovereigns to England. In 1828 he assisted at the blockade of Navarino, and superintended the naval expedition sent to co-operate with the French in the reduction of the castle of Morea, the last remnant of the Ottoman power in the Peloponnesus. He was afterwards employed in cruising about the Mediterranean, and on one celebrated occasion entering the Black Sea in the first British man-of-war that had ever passed the Bosphorus, and actually visiting the scene of his future labours—Sebastopol. In 1835, Captain Lyons, who had, in the meantime, received the honour of knighthood and the insignia of several orders, exchanged the naval for the diplomatic profession, being appointed minister plenipotentiary at the court of Athens, which post he filled from 1835 until 1849. In 1849 he was appointed British minister to the Swiss confederation, and, in 1851, was sent to Stockholm in a similar capacity. There he remained until, in November, 1853, war being then imminent, he was appointed second in command of the Mediterranean fleet. If at the outset only second in command, Sir Edmund Lyons was from the first the ruling spirit of the British fleet, and to him was due, in an incalculable degree, the success which attended the English arms on the shores of the Euxine. He organized and conducted the expedition to the Crimea, took an active part in the bombardment of Sebastopol, and with great difficulty succeeded in overruling the plan of the English and French commanders, and making Balaklava the naval basis of operations. This was, perhaps, the most important of all the services rendered by the admiral, and he well deserved the peerage which it earned for him.

Born near Christchurch, Hants, 1790; died 1858.

LYS, or LEYE, leece, a navigable river of France and Belgium, rising near Lysbourg, the department Pas-de-Calais, and, after a course of 100 miles, falling into the Scheldt at Ghent. At one time it formed the boundary between France and Germany.

LYSANDER, li-san'-der, a famous Spartan commander in the Peloponnesian war. He prevailed on Ephesus to withdraw from its alliance with Athens, and he entered into a league with Cyrus the Younger, at whose court he had spent part of his youth. He also defeated the Athenian fleet, after which, in 404 B.C., the city itself fell into his hands; and thus terminated the Peloponnesian war, which had lasted 27 years. Lysander overturned the democracy, and restored the government of the Archons. After this he endeavoured to seat himself on the throne of Sparta, but was unsuccessful. He was slain at the battle of Haliartus, in the Bœotian war.

Died 395 B.C.

LISIAS, li'-se-as, one of the ten Athenian orators. He assisted Thrasybulus against the Thirty Tyrants. Plutarch mentions 425 of his orations; but of these only 35 remain, with fragments of some others.

Born at Athens, 458 B.C.; died about 378 B.C.

LYSIAS, general of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, who sent him against Judas Maccabæus, by whom he was surprised and defeated, with the loss of 5,000 men. Lysias saved himself by flight, and, after the death of Epiphanes, returned to power, as regent, under Antiochus Eupator. He laid siege to Jerusalem; but learning that Philip, who disputed the regency with him, had taken possession of the capital of Syria, he raised the siege, marched against Philip, and defeated him. Both Eupator and himself were subsequently abandoned by their partisans, and slain by their guards.

Died B.C. 162.

LYSIMACHUS, li-sim'-a-kus, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he made himself master of Thrace, where he built a town called by his own name. He afterwards seized Macedonia, and expelled Pyrrhus from the throne. He was killed in battle by Seleucus.

Died 282 B.C.

LYSIPPUS, li-sip'-pus, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who is said to have been a self-taught artist. His greatest works were the statue of a man wiping and anointing himself after bathing, which was placed before Agrippa's baths at Rome, and a statue of the sun, represented in a car drawn by four horses, at Rhodes.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

LYSKOVA, or LISKOWA, lis-ko'-va, a market-town of European Russia, government of Nijni Novgorod, on the right bank of the Volga. There are a castle and six churches. A large horse and cattle fair is held annually. Pop. 4,000.
